This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

deny than to limit the right to bring a second appeal. By making any limitation we incur the hazard of unjust and unequal discrimination. What sort of limitation shall we have? Shall we open the court of appeals to the heavy cases of the rich man, and close it to the small case of the poor man? Shall we open it to an equity and close it to a common law action; open it to a constitutional and close it to a statutory action? If we do this, how shall we answer for it, that all men are equal before the law? Shall we make commissions? As has been suggested, these commissions will prove remarkably tenacious of life; and instead of one court of appeals we shall have two; and the very remedy that we seek, the very end we wish to obtain by having one court, that is, harmony of decision, will be utterly destroyed by having two. Again, sir, I insist that the court of appeals, or any court like the court of appeals, to which a party has an unrestricted and unlimited right to bring a second appeal, is unnecessary. One trial and one appellate court for one case is enough. If gentlemen will look into the Constitutions of other States they will find that most of them rest their judicial systems upon one trial and one appellate court. Two appellate courts for one case rest upon the principle that one of these courts is inferior, and the other superior, that one is bad and the other good, that one is experimental, the other final. I would like to know what right we have to make a poor appellate tribunal? I would like to know what right we have, as framers of the organic law of the State, to compel a suitor to take his case through a poor court, through a poor appellate tribunal, in order to reach a good one? If we can make a good court of appeals we can make a good general term, as well. If the general term is good, we need not go beyond it; if it is bad, we should not make it. If we can bring into the court of last resort the best judicial minds of the State we can bring them into the general term as well. If we will bring them into the general term, we shall not need a court of appeals. I submit it is a palpable absurdity to compel a suitor to take his case through a court, the decisions of which he is not bound to respect, and which he may whistle down the wind at pleasure. No man is obliged to respect a decision of the present general term. He may abide by it if he chooses, but he may abide by any chance as well. Again, I am opposed to two appellate tribunals, as a matter of right to the citizen, for this additional reason: that to delay justice is to commit wrong. "It is to the interest of the State that litigation should end," is a maxim as wise as it is old. To delay justice is to deny it; and the State that delays justice is but little better than the State that denies it, for while it is delayed it is denied. How long is justice delayed under the present system of two appellate tribunals? After a case has been decided in general term the failing party has two years in which to bring his appeal to the court of appeals. He may then rely upon having six more years before it shall be decided. Eight years delay, in all, and then after the decision of the appellate court is reached, in the vast majority of cases, the decision of the inferior appellate tribunal is affirmed. Thus it happens, the court of appeals, itself, being the judge, that in the vast majority of cases this delay is unnecessary and unjust. How vexatious it is, the weary, waiting, heart-sick suitor best can tell. I submit, it is better that justice should be speedy, if sometimes wrong, than always slow, and sometimes right. I am quite sure that justice, rude, ignorant, but speedy, is better than justice, learned, technical, and slow. The State prospers in repose, and the repose of the rights of the citizen is the repose of the State. In the plan I propose I deny the right of appeal to the individual suitor to the court of last resort. I do this for the very purpose of harmony. Gentlemen contend that we should have a court of appeals like the present system for the purpose of harmony. I aver that the claim of harmony, as connected with the present court of appeals is a downright swindle. There is no such thing as harmony, as a part of the policy of the State. The State cannot bring into the court of appeals a single case. It is not within the power of the State to take any disputed question to the court of last resort, and there obtain the opinion and decision of that court. When a question is decided one way in the first district, and another way in the second district, the State has no power to settle that question. It rests upon the mere whim of the suitor, it rests perhaps in his poverty, whether that case shall go to the court of last resort; so that when you say you have this system for the purpose of harmony, you say what is not true. You have to wait upon the caprice of a suitor; and in that respect your system is wrong. In the system I propose, no citizen shall have the right to appeal; but in the conflict of decisions, where the court in one district has decided in one way, and the court in another district has decided in another way, it shall be the duty of the general term to send that case to the extraordinary term, and let it there be decided. This ought to be done without additional cost or expense, and upon the same printed case and briefs. Such a system would promote harmony of decisions; the State would be able, through its judiciary, to compel it; it cannot now. To illustrate: it is about twenty years since an act was passed in regard to the rights of married women. Under that law the question is daily arising in different parts of the State whether tenancy by the curtesy has any existence. In some districts it has been decided in one way, and in other districts in another. The State itself, through its judiciary, has been utterly unable to decide that question in the court of appeals. Why? Because the suitors themselves were unable or unwilling to carry these cases to the court of appeals. But under the plan I propose, when a conflict of that kind arises, it shall be the duty of the general term to send the case to the court of last resort, in order that the question may be decided, and in order that we may have, in fact as well as in name, harmony of decision throughout the State. I know the remarks which I am now submitting will jar somewhat upon the prejudices of the older members of the profession in this body. I know the tendency of our studies is, to conform us to the precedents of the past we have long had two appellate courts in this State. The maxim via antiqua, via tuta, sooner or later, forms a part of every lawyer's creed. None know better than the members of the legal profession, the delays which are incident to the present system; and none know better than they that this delay almost always prevents justice, and very rarely promotes it. I think that in framing the organic law of the State, we ought not inquire what is best for ourselves, but for the State. Since the multiplicity of business is so great that any one court cannot discharge it, where the right to bring appeals is unlimited; and since two appellate tribunals are unnecessary in any one case, let us have but one, and that one a good one, to which a citizen has the right to appeal; and let us have a court of last resort to which the State, through its judiciary, may send its doubtful cases for official adjudication. Let harmony be the policy of the State, not the whim of the suitor.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair must hold the amendment to be out of order; it is not germane to the subject.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move to strike out the words "shall be ineligible to a second term," and insert in place thereof " and shall not be elected for a second term." It may be that the two expressions mean the same thing; yet I think it will be found convenient in practice to make the change. By a subsequent section in the report of the committee it is provided that the Governor and Senate may fill temporary vacancies in that court until the elections come round when they can be filled by the people. The question will arise probably at no distant day whether one of these retired judges who has served out his elected term can be appointed by the Governor and Senate to fill one of these occurring vacancies, and to avoid ambiguity of expression I propose the language shall be "and shall not be elected for a second term." These old retired judges will be very useful material for the Governor and Senate to use in the filling of occasional vacancies.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

Mr. GOODRICH—I desire to offer the following substitute for the proposition under consideration:

The SECRETARY read the substitute as follows:

SEC. 2. There shall be a court of appellate jurisdiction, called the court of appeals, composed of seven judges, to be elected by the electors of the State. The judges of the present court of appeals, elected thereto and in office when this Constitution goes into effect, shall, for the remainder of their respective terms be judges of the court of appeals hereby established; and the other judges first elected shall be classified, so that one of the judges of the court shall go out of office at the end of every second year. After the first election, the judges elected to the court of appeals shall severally hold their office for fourteen years.

Mr. GOODRICH—Mr. Chairman, I have listened with no ordinary interest to the discussions which have taken place in reference to the organization of the court of appeals. All agree that improvements in our judicial system are demanded. In that system a court corresponding with the court of appeals is a necessity. For, the supreme court, which is the great business court of the State, must be divided into different branches, as no one court, acting as a unit, can possibly perform the judicial labor arising out of the business affairs of so large a State. With these different branches in that court, acting under one name as so many different courts, whether they be eight or some number less, there would be no uniformity in the law of the State, unless there shall be created over them some appellate court that shall act as a unit in reviewing and bringing into harmony and uniformity their conflicting decisions. That is the office of the court of appeals. In reference to this court, the committee have already determined that the tenure of office for the seven judges that are to compose it, shall be fourteen years. The pending substitute of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] proposes to make the judges all ineligible for reelection. To that I am opposed. It is insisted by those who maintain that the judges of this court shall not be eligible for re-election, that to make them so tends to impair their independence —to take from them that uprightness and impartiality so essential to the character of a good judge. On the same ground it has been urged that they should not be elected at all, but should be appointed by the Governor and Senate. If by an "independent judiciary" is meant a judicial system which creates and continues in office judges under circumstances most favorable to integrity in the discharge of their duties, all must agree in desiring such an independent judiciary. The question is, is the elective system—do frequent elections, as applied to judges, any way tend to impair that independence on their part? In the same sense, certainly, it is equally essential that all officers of the State, in both the legislative and executive departments, should also be independent and impartial in the discharge of their duties. If the elective system cannot be applied in the selection of judges, with safety to their independence and integrity, I do not see how it can be in the selection of the other officers named. In short, this claim that to elect by the people judicial officers, and to elect them for such terms as will admit of their reelection, if they prove themselves worthy and the people are desirous of continuing them in office, tends to debase and demoralize them, is a doctrine which, if carried out in all its legitimate consequences, would, in my judgment, lead to a total overthrow of the whole system of popular elections. Its utterance here fills me, therefore, with surprise and alarm. In support of it, we are told that in England judges are appointed; and that there their appointment for life, or during good behavior, has been found to be necessary to their independence. It is to be remembered, that political society in that country differs in its structure entirely from what it is in ours. There, the body politic is made up of three distinct estates — the crown, the nobility and the commons — each having rights and interests of its own, and each being, in respect to ter, is hostility to the others, insomuch that English history is to a great extent but a record of the struggles which are perpetually going on between these jealous and contending elements. Under such a state of society a life tenure for judges, receiving their appointment from the crown, may well be a necessity; since, were it otherwise—were they to be appointed for a term of years, and thereafter to be dismissed or retained in office at the pleasure of the appointing power—they would indeed lose their independence and become incapable of deciding impartially in all cases in which the rights or interests of the people or the nobility should be opposed by the interests or the known wishes of the crown. The history of the life tenure of the English judges shows it to have obtained precisely from this consideration. Now, with us there are no such separate and conflicting interests, no such rival powers, to be jeopardized by making judges, as well as all other officers strictly dependent on the people, in whom resides the true sovereignty of the State, and in whom center all—all the great interests of State. I do not deny that frequent elections tend to make the judge feel his dependence on the people, nor that that feeling on his part is not directly calculated to make him discharge the duties of his office in a manner conformable to their supposed wishes; but what I claim is that thus feeling and acting makes him all the more independent and impartial in his decisions between suitors, because no one who has the slightest qualifications for that office can fail to comprehend that impartial justice is what the people demand of the judge and that any departure from that in the discharge of his duties is sure to meet with their severest condemnation and reproach. Under our form of government a sense of dependence on the people is therefore one of the strongest incentives to the faithful discharge of duty on the part of all the officers of State. Accordingly, while I deny that there can be the slightest necessity for rendering the judges of the court of appeals ineligible for a second term, the influence of such a provision, if adopted, will be bad every way. On the judge himself it will be bad; because, in making a re-election impossible, one powerful motive for the faithful discharge of duty is wholly lost on him. It is also unjust to the people, to whom it denies the right to continue in office one whom they have proved and may have found to be capable and faithful, and whom, therefore, they might re-elect with the certainty of securing the services of a valuable judge. In every way, in my judgment, the proposed restriction is both unnecessary and unwise. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], in the amendment which he has submitted, also proposes that in the first election of the seven judges of the court of appeals no elector shall be allowed to vote for more than five of their number, including the chief justice, thereby securing to the minority party, at the election, the certainty of selecting two of the judges. Sir, this representation or election by the minority, though I know how illy prepared I am to discuss it, I can clearly see to be absurd, not to say trifling and puerile. It ought to be a sufficient objection to it that it is a direct and conceded departure from the established principles of our system of government, which is, throughout all its departments and details, strictly a government resting on the will of the majority To the extent of the two judges the proposition is to make it a government by the will of the minority, even though that minority be ever so meager and insignificant. There is neither principle nor sense or propriety in the proposition. It completely ignores all the utility derived from party contests, where the opposition extends to the whole ticket, and where, in order to succeed on the merits of its candidates each party is compelled to put in nomination its best men; for, in all such cases, the very intensity of partisan zeal is made to subserve the interests of good government. In all such cases, too, it is only the nominations that are made by parties; the prerogative of choosing is reserved to the people, and to the majority of the people which does not by any means always coincide with the strongest party. Under this minority representation, so-called, the minority party, if it chooses to waive the contest as to the five judges, has nothing to do but simply nominate any of its adherents for the two judges and they pass into office, not by the will of the majority of the people, not even by the will of the majority of the minority party, but by a constitutional necessity from having been put in nomination by a partisan convention To say nothing of its absurdity, such a mode of selecting judges for the highest court of the State cannot but be unwise in the extreme. I know it is sought to be defended and justified under the plausible pretext that its tendency will be to keep the court from becoming partisan in its character. Its adoption is urged upon that ground. But, sir, how is it now? Are judges elected as partisans? The most that can be said is that their nomination is from parties; but it is the people, always the majority of the people that chooses, out of the number of candidates presented, which of them shall be judges. The choice is not the act of a party merely, but the act of the people. Nor does it always happen that the candidates are chosen who are presented by the strongest political party; but whether they are or are not, the choice itself, in every instance, is the act of the people; and therefore the judge goes on the bench as the people's rather than his party's judge. But how will it be with the judge whose selection is to be left to the minority under this scheme for minority representation now proposed? Can their selection be in any sense the act of the people? No, sir; the people have nothing to do with it. Their selection is purely the act of a mere party convention; and judges who are thus selected and placed on the bench, not only without the sanction of the majority of the people, but also, it may be, in direct hostility to and in spite of it, cannot fail to carry this conviction with them, and therefore to consider themselves, as in fact they will be, mere partisan judges. So far, therefore, from its having any effect to keep the judges of the court from becoming partisan in their character, the whole scope and tendency of the scheme is directly the other way. It is the very thing that will force that character upon the judges. From every consideration of principle and of policy, I am utterly opposed to the insertion of so pernicious an element in the organic law of the State. For these reasons I trust the amendment which I have moved, and which strikes out of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] both this proposition of minority representation and that of rendering the judges of the court of appeals ineligible for re-election, may prevail.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair must hold that the substitute offered by the member from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich] is out of order. All of the propositions contained in it have been passed upon in committee, and some of them as many as three times.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Smith, as amended on motion of Mr. A. J. Parker and Mr. Prindle, and on a division, it was declared carried, ayes 50, noes not counted.

Mr. GOODRICH—Will my amendment now be in order? If so, I will make the motion.

The CHAIRMAN—The amendment cannot be entertained, every proposition it contains having already been passed upon.

Mr. GOODRICH—I submit that the proposition has not been passed upon at this stage of the action on the section, and will ask whether that does not change it?

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair sees no possibility of ever ending the debate upon this article if propositions passed upon, reconsidered, and again passed upon, can still be considered even in new combinations, and therefore must hold that it is out of order.

Mr. McDONALD—I move to amend the section so as to continue the present judges in office.

The CHAIRMAN—The amendment is not in order. That question has been postponed by a vote of the committee, on motion of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], until all the various sections of the article shall have been considered.

Mr. RUMSEY—I proposed an amendment some time ago to this section, and I ask that it be now considered.

The CHAIRMAN—It can only be done by reconsideration of the vote by which its consideration was postponed until the sections relating to the supreme court shall have been considered.

Mr. RUMSEY—I am satisfied that it should take that position.

Mr. LANDON moved to add at the end of the section the following:

"No right of appeal to the court of appeals shall exist, but the general terms may by order send such causes to be there heard as may seem necessary in order to promote harmony throughout the State."

Mr. LANDON—We cannot get rid of the court of appeals, but it seems to me to be the duty of this Convention so to restrict the right of appeal that there shall at least be harmony of decision throughout the entire State.. That harmony can never exist so long as the act of appeal shall depend upon the individual. If we have a good general term the suitor does not need to go to the court of appeals. But in that class of cases where one district decides one way, and another district decides another way, it should be the policy of the State to send those causes to the court of ultimate resort, in order that they may there be finally decided and that harmony may exist, whether the suitor desires it or not. I say it is a humbug to say we have harmony of decision or can have it when the State cannot by any system of her own send cases to the court of ultimate resort. If the right of appeal is left open and unrestricted, this court cannot do its business any more than the court we now have; but we will have harmony if we make it the policy of the State to send causes to the court of appeals to reconcile conflicting decisions. Causes of a political nature may also be sent there if you choose. Send causes there which are of a constitutional nature. The State does not owe it to the citizen to give him two courts of appeal, but the State owes it to herself to be able, notwithstanding the caprice or poverty of the individual, to have harmony of decisions throughout the State.

The question was put upon the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Landon, and it was declared lost.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I desire to offer an amendment; I move to add to the present section the ninth, tenth and eleventh lines of the section reported by the committee:

"The judges of the court of appeals shall have power to appoint and remove a clerk of said court or reporter thereof and such attendants as shall be authorized by law;"

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I will ask the gentleman to accept an amendment to that proposition, in these words:

"Any five members of said court shall form a quorum, and the concurrence of four shall be necessary to a decision. They shall have the appointment, with the power of removal, of the reporter of the court and clerk, and such attendants as may be authorized by law."

Mr. LIVINGSTON accepted the amendment.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I would like to ask the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] if it would not be better to authorize four judges to hold the court? I will hereafter move an amendment to the amendment that four judges be authorized to hold the court, and I do it for the purpose of enabling the court to sit continuously and transact its business from month to month. If there are seven judges and four hold the court, it will be entirely practicable to continue the business of the court perpetually.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—The amendment, as accepted, presents what was included in the third section of Mr. Goodrich's minority report, modifying it only so as to provide for the appointment of clerk as well as of reporter. I, for one, much prefer that five judges should be requisite to hold the court, and four to decide. It is indispensable that four should agree in deciding; and if you say that four only of the judges may sit, you must have a unanimous vote before a case can be determined. There are in the court seven judges. It seems to me no more than reasonable to require that five shall be necessary to constitute the court; generally all seven will be present. It would be a bad policy to allow so small a number

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair would state that ...e proposition of the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] involves also the appointment ... the clerk and the reporter.

Mr. COOKE—Then I call for a division of the ...estion.

The CHAIRMAN—The question then is on the ...endment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. ... Cox], as amended and upon which a division ... asked.

The question then recurred on the second ...anch of the amendment relating to the appoint...ent and removal of the clerk and the reporter ... the court, and of such attendants as may be ...thorized by law, and it was declared carried.

Mr. HALE—I move to reconsider the vote by ...ich the number of judges necessary to consti...te a quorum has been fixed, and I do it upon ...is ground: Heretofore, as stated by the gentle...an from Ulster [Mr. Cooke], the provisions in ...gard to the number necessary to constitute a ...orum have been left to be made by the Legis...ature, and also the provisions in regard to how ...any of the judges shall agree in order to decide ... case, and the Legislature have always said that ... case of failure to agree upon a second re-argu...ent the judgment should be affirmed. Now, if ...is provision is inserted in the Constitution, it ...ems to me that we shall be in this dilemma, ...at in case of the failure of four judges to agree ...s provision is made to meet the difficulty.

Mr. COMSTOCK—It seems to to me that this had all better be left to legislation. The Constitution of 1846 was entirely silent as to the number of judges required to make a quorum. It declared that the court should be composed of eight judges, and the question arose at an early day whether, even under legislative authority, less than eight judges could sit and hold court. It was determined, however, that they could—that the general law of judicial bodies not less than of parliamentary bodies only required that a majority should be present—all having a right to be present, yet the Legislature did afterward act upon it, and, by the Code of Procedure, or by the judiciary act, provided that a quorum should consist of six of the eight judges, and that the concurrence of five should be necessary in a decision. If we put this provision into the Constitution where no change can be made in it hereafter until the next revision, it is quite reasonable to anticipate some difficulty from it, because a condition of things may arise, as suggested by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], in which it might be desirable to enact by law that four should constitute a quorum, to the end that there might be judges not sitting in court, but laboring upon the cases already argued. I hope, therefore, that the motion to reconsider will prevail.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Hale to reconsider, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred on the adoption of the first branch of the amendment relating to the number of judges necessary to constitute a quorum.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I certainly must differ from the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] as to the probability of any embarrassment arising from this provision. Suppose four judges do not agree, what then? Why then the case must be re-argued, but if the whole seven sit, as they probably will, there will be very little probability that four will not concur. I do not myself see how any difficulty is to grow out of it, and it seems to me that it is better to settle this now, and provide that five shall constitute a quorum, and that four shall concur in a decision. The great difficulty about disagreements has grown out of the fact that our court has consisted of eight judges, and they disagreed only when they stood four to four. That we avoid here, as the court will consist of seven, and I do not think there will be any great difficulty in securing the concurrence of four, so that it will very rarely, if ever, happen that a re-argument will be necessary. I do not know what more the Legislature could do to avoid the possibility of a disagreement.

Mr. HALE—Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE—If five consitute a quorum, suppose only five sit?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Then four must concur to decide a case.

Mr. HALE—But suppose they do not?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Why, then it follows as a matter of judicial law that the case must be re-argued.

Mr. W. C. BROWN—I offer the following amendment:

"The number of judges to form a quorum, and the number necessary to concur in a decision shall be prescribed by law."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. W. C. Brown, and it was declared carried.

The question then recurred on the first branch of the original amendment as amended.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I do not think that we need any such provision as that. It is unnecessary to say in the Constitution that the Legislature shall act upon this; leave it to the general rule governing such bodies until the Legislature does intervene.

The question was put on the first branch of the original amendment as amended, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HALE—I would inquire what amendment was just lost?

The CHAIRMAN—It is in relation to the number of judges required to constitute a quorum; that portion of the amendment is stricken out, and the portion of the amendment which provides for the appointment of a clerk and a reporter is adopted.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Then I offer the following instead of it:

"Any five of the judges of said court shall form a quorum, and the concurrence of four shall be necessary to a decision until otherwise provided by law."

Mr. COOKE—Is not that substantially the proposition which has just been voted down?

Mr. ANDREWS—I do not see any necessity for fixing a general rule by the amendment just made, when by the qualifications attached to it the matter is referred to the Legislature.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I am very much afraid that unless you require five judges to sit in court, the Legislature may authorize a less number to hold court, and thus destroy the influence of the court. They may perhaps divide it up so as to make two courts, and thus create the very evil that we desire to avoid. Now, it seems to me that we should at least provide how many shall hold the court, otherwise the question will arise in the court at once whether any less than seven can do so.

Mr. SPENCER—I would like to ask the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] if any evil has occurred up to this time or even been apprehended from the difficulty which his amendment suggests?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I think an evil existed before in the number of the court and in the provisions which the Legislature made in regard to it, so that there should be four for affirming and four for reversing a judgment, thus making a re-argument necessary. I believe that if this provision be adopted re-argument will not be necessary in more than one case in a thousand.

Mr. BARKER—We deem it necessary to say how many judges shall constitute the court, and I think it would be wrong to leave it in the power of the Legislature to say that less than a majority of that court should constitute a quorum. Without this provision it might be that one judge sitting in review could make a decision as the decision of the court; but in my opinion, when less than five of the judges are able to attend at a term, the term should be dissolved, and the court adjourned until the next stated term.

Mr. COOKE—To obviate all this difficulty, I propose an amendment to the amendment. I propose to amend by providing that a majority of the judges shall constitute a quorum.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—For one, I object to that. That would enable four to constitute the court. If we are starting with a court of seven, I think we ought at least to require five to hold the court. I believe it would lower the dignity of the court and impair its usefulness to fix the number as low as four.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Cooke, and it was declared lost.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. A. J. Parker.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I think that provision is the least objectionable if we say any thing on the subject.

Mr. DALY—Before the vote is taken on that question I desire to say a few words. A question was asked me yesterday, in the course of debate, which has become the subject of an article in the Argus, and of comment in the debate this morning during my absence. The question asked me was in relation to the corruption of the judiciary. I desire to express no opinion upon that subject now; I merely desire that what I said yesterday in respect to it may not be misunderstood. I understood the question asked me yesterday to be whether I had ever heard of corruption on the part of the judges of the State since the adoption of the Constitution of 1846; and so understanding the question, I answered it by pointing to an article in the North American Review, containing charges of corruption, without meaning to say or to assume that those charges were true or untrue, and without professing to have any personal knowledge on the subject. In the article in the journal to which I have referred, it is stated that I was asked whether I had any personal knowledge of the taking of a bribe by any judge; and I find upon inquiry that the question was probably put in that way, for it was so taken down by the stenographer. Supposing, very naturally, that the gentleman who asked the question did not intend to imply any personal knowledge of that character on my part, I did not understand it in that way. If I had so understood it, I should have answered very distinctly that I had not any such knowledge. I understand that in the Convention this morning, during my absence, the gentleman who asked the question yesterday recurred to the subject, and said that it appeared upon my statement that the corruption of the judiciary of New York was confined entirely to the city of New York. The corruption of the New York judiciary, or any question of that nature, is a very delicate subject to interrogate me, an existing judge of that city, upon, or for me to speak upon, as I am necessarily one of the parties involved in any such inquiry. I desire, therefore, merely to reiterate now what I supposed I had said yesterday, and what I certainly meant to say in reply to that question, that from what I have heard about the corruption of e judiciary, it is not confined to the city of New rk, and that I have heard charges of corrup- n made in other parts of the State besides that y, quite as grave as any made in the article in e North American Review. If I am rightly formed of what the gentleman [Mr. Graves] said this morning, he will do me the justice to believe hat he misunderstood the remarks I made yester- ay, when he quoted me as an authority for the atement that corruption in the judiciary, if it exists, is confined exclusively to the city of New York.

Digitized by Google

Mr. VAN COTT—I move to amend by strik- g out the words at the end of the amendment, until otherwise provided by law."

Mr. COOKE—Then it is identical with the estion we have once passed upon and voted own.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair is of opinion that hat would leave the amendment precisely as it as been already intended.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. A. J. Parker, and it was declared carried.

Mr. GRAVES—I move to add at the end of the section the following: "The court shall con- tinue its session at each term thereof until the causes upon the calendar shall be heard or decided, or put over, or disposed of by the consent of the parties."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Graves, and it was declared lost.

The SECRETARY read the third section as follows:

SEC. 3. Upon the organization of the court of appeals under this Constitution, the causes then pending in the present court of appeals shall be- come vested in the court of appeals hereby created. Such of said causes as are pending on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, shall be heard and determined by a commission to consist of five commissioners of appeals. But the court of appeals hereby cre- ated, for cause shown, may order any cause thus pending before the said commissioners, to be heard in such court. Such commission shall con- sist of the judges of the present court of appeals elected thereto, and a fifth commissioner, who shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. SPENCER—I offer the following amend- ment: Strike out after the word "created," in line four, and insert the following:

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

"In case there shall at any time be such an accumulation of business in the court of appeals that the same cannot be disposed of speedily and promptly, and the fact of such accumulation shall be duly certified by the court to the Governor, he shall, prior to the final adjournment of the Legislature, after being so certified, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint five commissioners, with power to hear and deter- mine such cases pending in said court, as shall by said court be assigned for the purpose. Such commissioners shall hold their office for not less than one year, nor more than two years, and un- til they shall have disposed of the business so assigned, and they shall receive the same com- pensation as judges of the court of appeals. Any vacancy occurring in the office of commis- sioner shall be filled in such manner as the Leg- islature shall by law direct.

Mr. SPENCER—My object in offering this amendment is twofold. In the first place that the business of the court of appeals may be left entirely under the control of that court, and not be subjected to the disposal or control of any other tribunal, or any other department of the government. It seems to me eminently proper that it should be so. We have endeavored by the article we have framed in regard to the court of appeals, to secure as far as practicable the great ends of such a court, that of unity and that of permanency, in order that the law may be made, as nearly as may be, certain and reliable. Another object which I have in presenting this amendment, is with a view at the proper time and place to offer another amendment, which shall secure in the court of appeals the services of those judges who now constitute the court of appeals, and I shall do so for the purpose of con- tributing so far as it is possible, by that measure, to the permanence and stability of the court, in order to secure the objects which I have already named, certainty and reliabilty in the administra- tion of the law. The members of the present court of appeals having for some considerable time been members of that court, and accus- tomed to its business, and acquainted with its previous decisions will impress upon the new court which shall be organized under this Con- stitution, if one shall be, something of their own method of business, and something of their own construction of the law as it has been declared by that court. On the contrary, if there shall be a court entirely new, observation and experience show that it is likely to lead to the same fluctu- tions and uncertainties in law under which we have suffered for so long a time. By the creation of a commission in the form provided by the amendment, the decisions of the court of appeals proper will stand as the law of this State, while the decisions of the particular cases referred to the commission will be the law for those cases only, and will be in a measure subordinate to the decisions of the court proper, and not possessing the same weight of authority.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move to amend that amendment by inserting after the words "not less than one year," the words "and not exceed- ing two years." I am certainly opposed to estab- lishing such a permanent body as this commis- sion would be, to hold office to all eternity.

Mr. SPENCER—I have no objection to accept- ing the amendment of the gentleman, but it may possibly, at the end of that time necessitate the issue of a new certificate and a new appoint- ment.

Mr. McDONALD—I move to amend by saying, "not less than one year, nor more than three years." With the accumulation of causes now on the calendar of the court of appeals, it is very evident that the commissioners will have to sit longer than one year or two years, in order to dis- pose of them.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. McDonald, and it was declared lost.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. Spencer.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I hope this amendment will not prevail. It is offered, as I understand it, as a substitute for the provision reported by a majority of the Judiciary Committee. Now, I do not believe in creating a court of appeals for the purpose of doing the business that will belong to that court, and at the same time recognizing in the Constitution the fact that we are creating a court which will not be competent to discharge the duties which will devolve upon it. By inserting this provision, we will enable the court to be just as indifferent to the discharge of their duties as it pleases, because when they shall, by their indifference, have suffered the accumulation of business, all they have to do is to establish and certify to that fact, and the Legislature will be bound to go on and relieve them, by a commission, from the results of their own indifference. We now recognize the fact that there is an accumulation of business that is to be disposed of, but to acknowledge by this provision in the Constitution that the court we are here organizing is not going to have the capacity to do the work of the court of appeals, seems to me unwise.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Spencer, and it was declared lost.

The SECRETARY read the fourth section, as follows:

SEC. 4. If any vacancy shall occur in the office of said commissioners, it shall be filled by appointment by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and if the Senate is not in session by the Governor, but in such case, the term of office shall expire at the end of the session of the Senate next after such appointment. The said commissioners shall appoint from their number a chief commissioner (and may in like manner fill all vacancies in such appointment); (and may appoint and remove such attendants as shall be provided for by law). The reporter of the court of appeals shall be the reporter of said commissioners. And the decisions of said commissioners shall be certified to and entered and enforced as the judgments of the court of appeals. The said commission shall continue for three years, unless the causes committed to it are sooner determined. If at the end of three years from the time of entering on its duties, all the causes assigned to such commission shall not have been heard and determined, the residue shall be heard and determined by the court of appeals hereby created.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move to amend by striking out "three," in line fifteen, and inserting "two."

Mr. COMSTOCK—I do not think that would be expedient. The duration of that commission was carefully considered by the Judiciary Committee, and it was thought to be unsafe to make it positively less than three years. There is an arrearage of one thousand cases or more now pending in the court of appeals, and it will probably take a commission, or any other tribunal, over two years to dispose of them. It was thought best, on the whole, to constitute the court with a commission for three years.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move to amend in the thirteenth line, where the word "three" occurs by changing it to the word "two." All I have to say is that if we constitute a court with seven judges we do it with the idea that it is to be a working court, and that they are to work at this calendar of accumulated business at least a portion of the time. It seems to me that the new business that will come before the court will not keep the new court consisting of seven, employed, but that they will have much time to devote to closing up the old calendar.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. E. A. Brown, and it was declared lost.

Mr. BICKFORD—I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the third section.

The CHAIRMAN—The amendment may be received under the head of general amendments. But it may be received now if there be no objection.

A DELEGATE—I object.

The CHAIRMAN—Objection being made, the amendment cannot be received.

The SECRETARY read the fifth section as follows:

SEC. 5. At the end of ten years from the adoption of this Constitution by the people, the Legislature shall have power to provide for the appointment of a commission to hear and determine such causes as may be transferred to it by the court of appeals, in such manner as the Legislature may direct.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I move to strike out this section.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. A. J. Parker, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY read the sixth section as follows:

SEC. 6. There shall be a supreme court having general jurisdiction in law and equity, subject to such appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeals as may be prescribed by law. The Legislature, at its session next after the adoption of this Constitution, shall divide the State into four judicial departments, and each of said departments into two districts, to be bounded by county lines. The city and county of New York shall form one district. There shall be thirty-four justices of the said supreme court; ten thereof in the department in which is the city and county of New York, and eight in each of the other departments. But the Legislature shall have power to provide for an additional justice in each of said departments. One-half of the justices in each department shall reside in each district of such department at the time of their election.

Mr. HALE—I move to substitute for that section the sixth section of Document 140.

The SECRETARY read the substitute as follows:

SEC. 6. There shall be a supreme court having general jurisdiction in law and equity, subject to such appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeals as may be prescribed by law. There shall be in the State twelve judges of said court. The existing division of the State into eight districts shall continue, subject to the power of the Legislature to change the same, as in this article provided. In the first judicial district there shall be four, and in each of the other judicial districts two justices of the supreme court; and the Legislature may provide for additional justices, not exceeding one in each district.

Mr. HALE—The importance of the subject which is now before this committee can hardly be overstated. It is a subject in many respects more important even than that upon which we have just been passing. It is true that the supreme court is in some respects subordinate to the court of appeals. But it is the great court of original jurisdiction of the State. It is the court which comes nearest to the people, and which affects the people most directly and most universally, and with which the people in their ordinary business become the best acquainted. The powers of the judges of this court are in many respects greater than those of any other officers of the State. In a very large class of cases—cases which are said to be in the discretion of the court—there is no appeal from the decision of the supreme court. And there are many of the decisions of that court which are not the subjects of appeal, yet are of momentous consequence to the individuals concerned. And a great proportion of the cases which are appealable through the inability of the parties to incur the expense of an appeal, or from their want of that love of litigation which is necessary to induce men to nurse their lawsuits during the period of five or six years which must now elapse before a case can be decided in the court of appeals, go no farther than the supreme court. The supreme court is in fact, though not in name, to the great mass of litigants in this State the court of final resort. I think, therefore, that we should approach this question with quite as much care, and quite as full deliberation as any other question that will come before the committee. I propose to look briefly at the judicial history of this State so far as it relates to the organization of this court of original jurisdiction. It will be noticed that the amendment which I propose, and the plan which is contained in document 140, which I had the honor to submit, does not affect in any way the question of tenure, or the mode of the creation of the judges, whether by election or by appointment. It relates solely to the organization of the court, and whatever may be the final result of the deliberations of this committee upon these subjects, the question of organization is a distinct question, and the amendments which I propose would be equally proper under any system. For nearly fifty years in the history of our State the supreme court was in fact as well as in name the supreme court of the State of New York. It was a unit. It consisted of five judges. Those five judges held the circuits in different parts of the State. They also sat in banc and reviewed the determinations made at circuit. A convention was called in 1821 for the purpose, among other things, of changing that system. They met then, as we meet now, to discuss the existing judiciary, and the question whether changes were important or necessary. In examining the debates of the Convention of 1821 you will find that the organization of that court was complained of in one respect, and in one respect only—the inadequacy of the force to do all the business of the State. There were complaints of the judges—no complaints of any lack of ability or of corruption on their part—but complaints that they were political judges, and that they sometimes showed partisanship, not in their decisions on the bench, but in their conduct off the bench, and especially in the council of revision. Those complaints were made on the floor of the Convention, although two of the most distinguished judges of that court—James Kent and Ambrose Spencer, were members of that Convention. I have examined those debates with considerable care, but I can find no complaint there of the system, the system which made the court a unit, and which enabled those judges to sit in banc and also to hold circuits and to hold the court which reviewed their own decisions. However, notwithstanding the fact that no complaint was made of the system, a change was made in it, by which, instead of the supreme court consisting of judges who did circuit and banc duty, three judges were appointed to sit in Albany in banc, and the State was divided into eight circuits, in each of which a circuit judge was appointed. There is one fact in relation to this matter which possesses an historical interest, and that is, that the change which was made by the Convention of 1821 was reported by no committee. A judiciary committee was appointed early in the deliberations of that Convention, the chairman of which was Mr. Munro of Westchester, and which contained among other members Judge Sutherland who was afterward upon the bench of the supreme court. That committee reported a system, but their report did not contemplate the change that was made. It retained the old system as to the supreme court, providing for aiding it by the addition of a court of common pleas, with president judges, with an organization similar to that of the supreme court. The report of the committee, however, was rejected, and a select committee was appointed of which also Mr. Munro was chairman. Upon that committee were Martin Van Buren, General Root of Delaware, Col. Young of Saratoga, and other distinguished lawyers of the State; and that select committee also made a report, but their report upon the subject of the judiciary was not adopted; and the system which was finally adopted was one which was introduced by way of amendment to the report of the select committee by a gentleman, I think not a lawyer, Mr. Carpenter of Tioga. The system proposed by him was adopted by the Convention, and prevailed in this State from 1822, until the change was made in the Constitution in 1846. In regard to the organization of the courts it will be seen that the change effected was a sweeping one. Judges who sat in banc under the Constitution of 1821 had nothing, whatever, to do with circuit duty. The supreme court in banc was not a court of original jurisdiction except for some special purposes. It was an appellate court, and an appellate court only. The circuit judges who were appointed in the eight judicial circuits had nothing, whatever, to do on the other hand with the review of decisions. They were simply trial judges, and their office was confined to the discharge of their duties at nisi prius. Both those systems however, had one thing in common. Co-existing with them from the adoption of the Constitution of 1777 up to 1846, there was a court of chancery, the business of which was very great; and the existence of that court, of course, very greatly diminished the business of the supreme court. Under the system of 1821 the judges of the supreme court were also members of the court of errors, as was the chancellor. In 1846 another Convention was called, a Convention which effected a change still more radical and sweeping than that effected by the Convention of 1821. The first Constitution and the Constitution of 1822 adhered to the appointing system and to the life tenure. The Constitution of 1846 abolished both. I do not now propose to discuss the question whether they did wisely in that. That question I consider as already determined by this committee, and therefore not now before it. I have my views upon the subject which have been expressed heretofore, and which did not concur with those which have prevailed in this committee. But, as I have said, the Constitution of 1846 not only changed the tenure of office, and the mode of selecting judges, but also completely changed the organization of the court; and since the adoption of the Constitution of 1846 there has been no supreme court of the State of New York. I think I speak advisedly when I say this. There has been a supreme court in name, but there has been in fact no such court. In the place of it we have what was called by Mr. O'Conor upon the floor of the Convention of 1846, an octagonal court. We have eight local courts. The evils attendant upon that system have already been somewhat commented upon, yet the system has had its defenders upon this floor. The question as to whether that system should be continued, whether we shall continue as we have been for the last twenty years without any State supreme court, is now before this committee. When the subject of the organization of the supreme court came before the Convention of 1846, there was by no means unanimity among the eminent men of that body—the many great lawyers who were upon the floor of that Convention, in regard to what change should be effected. A Judiciary Committee was appointed in that Convention, which consisted of some of the first lawyers of the State. Its head was a gentleman who afterward filled the office of chief justice of the court of appeals, Judge Ruggles, who perhaps had no superior in this State for judicial ability, and for purity and integrity of character. Among the members of that committee were Judge Brown, of Orange, Charles O'Conor, George A. Simmons, of Essex, and many other gentlemen whom I might name, and who would be at once recognized by all the lawyers upon this floor as men who stood high in the profession, and who were perhaps as able representatives of the bar of this State as could have been selected at that time. That committee, after weeks of deliberation, were unable to agree upon a report. A report was presented by the chairman of that committee which was substantially adopted by the Convention. Although that report had the approbation of the distinguished chairman of that committee, and of several other of its most distinguished members, yet it was denied upon the floor of the Convention that the majority of the committee favored it, and so far as I can gather from looking at the debates, the fact seems to have been that the majority assented to its being reported as the report of the committee without concurring in many of its details. So far as it divided the court into these eight sections it was disapproved of, not only by many of the most distinguished men of that committee, but also by many of the ablest lawyers and strongest men in the Convention, some of whom were not lawyers, and whose views are recorded in the debates. The evils which have resulted from that system were then predicted and pointed out, and to some extent they were admitted even by those who were in favor of the change. Judge Brown, in advocating the adoption of the majority report, admitted that there was an element of evil in it, that diversity of decision would be likely to exist under it, yet hoped that it would not exist to so great an extent as others feared. In advocating the system, and endeavoring to show that it would not necessarily create such diversity of decisions as was predicted by some of its opponents, the friends of this system said that the judges in these courts would interchange; that provision would be made so that judges in one district should not be confined to that district, but could go all over the State, and by thus constantly exchanging places upon the general term bench and communicating their views to each other, they would be able substantially to agree upon all principles of law. And I may as well say here that an attempt was made by the Legislature after the adoption of that Constitution to carry out that idea. A provision of law was made that the judges should interchange; that they should hold courts in different districts, and for some time that system prevailed in the State. But it was found by the judges that it was an exceedingly inconvenient system for them, and so the law requiring this interchange was repealed, and for the last twelve or fifteen years there has been no such interchange. Judges from the rural districts have sometimes been called to the city of New York to aid in the transaction of business there; but in the country districts this exchange of judges is almost unknown. The judges of the third district confine themselves here and hold their general terms in the city of Albany, and the judges in each of the other districts confine themselves to the districts for which they they were elected, except, as I have said, when they are sometimes called to the city of New York.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman allow me to say that I thank him for bringing out this fact? I had expected to hear some of the legal members here who were associated with myself in the Convention of 1846, state to this Convention the fact that the interchange of circuits and opinions between judges of the supreme court was provided for by law, following the Constitution, and enforced, I think, by a phrase in the Constitution itself. I know that it was intended by the framers of the Constitution of 1846 that that should be a part of our judicial system, and I now learn from the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] ist the bar of this State are responsible for the repeal of that law; and I desire now to express the belief that if that had been properly carried out we should now not have these complaints of discrepancies between the decisions of the judges of the supreme court.

Mr. HALE—The gentleman perhaps misunderstood me in one respect. I did not say the bar, but the bench.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Then so much the worse.

Mr. HALE—I should say, however, that the change effected at the instance of the judges was undoubtedly necessary for their convenience, and not for their convenience only, but that it was absolutely necessary in order to enable them to perform their duties; and I did not mention the fact that that change was made through their influence, with the view of reflecting at all upon the gentlemen who were upon the bench at the time the change was made.

The hour of two having arrived, the PRESIDENT resumed the chair, and the Convention took a recess until seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock, and again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, of Cayuga, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the amendment proposed by Mr. Hale, who was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE—At the close of my remarks this morning I had come to the consideration of the organization of the supreme court, as adopted by the Convention of 1846. I propose to consider somewhat briefly the defects and evils which I think result from that system. I have spoken of the evils which were predicted; I will now speak of those which have followed. The first result was that instead of one supreme court in this State, we have had in effect eleven courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, whose decisions are of equal authority, and the decisions of neither of which are authority beyond its district, or more limited locality. We have eight supreme courts, one in each judicial district. We have in the city of New York a superior court and a court of common pleas. We have in the city of Buffalo a superior court. From all these courts appeals are taken directly to the court of appeals. All, as I said before, are of equal authority, and all of them have general terms. Now, under such a system, it is impossible to have uniformity of decision. The gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] conceded these disadvantages; but he says it is owing to the diversity of the human mind that we cannot have uniformity in the decisions of the supreme court. I shall endeavor to show that a degree of uniformity is not impossible; and that it is the system which produces this intolerable diversity of opinions.

Mr. BARKER—If it does not interrupt my friend, I would like to ask him a question. Will he state how any court can be organized, and where there are appeals, without conflicting decisions.

Mr. HALE—If my friend will excuse me, I will defer answering his question until I come to that portion of my remarks. It has been said that, notwithstanding this diversity of decision, in fact there was no such difficulty to any great extent. I propose to call the attention of this committee to the fact that a difficulty does exist, that it is quite as great as could be anticipated from any consideration or principle upon which these courts were organized. I will illustrate my remarks by an incident which occurred in my practice. I was applied to by a client to know whether he could recover of a common carrier damages for delay in transporting merchandise, sustained by a fall in the market between the time the goods should have been delivered and the time they were actually delivered. What was my reply? I told him that the supreme court in the eighth district had decided, in a case reported in 19 Barbour, in which a very learned opinion was delivered by Judge Marvin where precisely that case came before the court; that he could not recover; that a fall in the market was not an element which could be considered by a jury in an action to recover damages. But I also informed him that there was another decision later than that, in 22 Barbour, in which the general term in an adjoining district came to a directly opposite conclusion; that Judge Smith had, in a very learned opinion, shown Judge Marvin and his associates to be clearly wrong; that his damages could be recovered. Upon that my client's face brightened. But I was obliged to say that still later in Barbour was a general term decision in the same eighth district, in which Judge Marvin, in a very learned opinion, had reviewed Judge Smith's opinion at length, and shown that he was wrong. Now, I live in the fourth district. I have my own opinion about this matter, but I could not tell him how the supreme court of the fourth district was going to decide. Four learned judges in the eighth district had come to one conclusion, and four judges in the seventh district had come to a contrary conclusion. I had my own views as an humble member of the profession, but I could not tell my friend what the law was. My friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], and my friend from Saratoga [Mr. Pond], argue that is not an evil. When I asked my friend from Saratoga what he would do in case he found one general term had decided one way, and another general term had decided in a directly opposite way, and there was no decision of the court of appeals, he replied, in substance, that it rather gratified him, and gave him a chance to examine and investigate. If the object of a supreme court is to gratify the ambition of lawyers, or their industry, or love of investigation or comparison, then my friend from Saratoga has a very fine opportunity. I have always supposed that it was desirable there should be some certainty in the law, rather than that the desire of lawyers to investigate and draw independent conclusions of their own should be gratified. I do not think there is much weight in the argument that because a lawyer has opportunity to investigate, and compare views, therefore such a system is not an evil. We have in our reports hundreds of cases upon which the law has been decided one way by a general term in Albany, another way in Saratoga, another way in Poughkeepsie, and yet another way in New York. I will venture to say there is no parallel to this in the Union.

Mr. McDONALD—Will the gentleman allow me? I would ask him whether either of those cases were appealed, and if so, when?

Mr. HALE—I will answer the gentleman, that I do not know whether they were appealed or not. I know I could find no decision upon either of those points in the court of appeals, when at the time I speak of I investigated the question.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I can say that one of the cases was appealed, but settled by the parties before argument.

Mr. BARKER—Was the gentleman able to give his client any advice with those two conflicting opinions before him?

Mr. HALE—I was.

Mr. BARKER—I am glad to hear it.

Mr. HALE—I can tell the gentleman what it was.

Mr. BARKER—O, I don't want to know.

Mr. HALE—I advised him, as he was able to do it, to sue and have the law settled. [Laughter]

Mr. BARKER—Very lawyer-like! [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE—My friend on my right [Mr. Beckwith] mentions another instance which came under his observation, of two cases in reference to rolling stock upon railroads, in one of which it was decided to be personal property, in the other, real. One case was mentioned by my friend from Schenectady [Mr. Landon] this afternoon, in his remarks to the committee. It is a very important question, whether the married woman's act, as it is called, abolished the right of tenancy by the curtesy. In the fourth district the general term decided it did; in the first district it has been decided it did not. I do not know how it is in this district. What is the result of such a conflict of decisions in this instance? A man living in one county, a poor farmer, perhaps, loses his wife. When he inquires what his rights are as to the real property which his wife had, he is told tenancy by the curtesy is abolished, and that he has no right to the estate his wife owned in her life-time. His neighbor across the line, in Albany county, for instance, in precisely similar circumstances, is told by the law, as expounded in his district, you have a tenancy by the curtesy; you can have this little farm for yourself for your life, while your neighbor in Waterford must give up his property. Another question which arises frequently and is of very great importance, is the question of the constitutionality of laws. We all recollect how it was when the prohibitory law was enacted. The general term in the fourth district and the general term in one of the western districts decided the law was constitutional. The general term in the second district and in the first district decided it was unconstitutional. The question was finally settled by the court of appeals. But until it was settled, there was a prohibitory law in Saratoga, and none in Poughkeepsie. It is said by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] and intimated by the gentlemen from Ontario [Mr. McDonald], and others, that the court of appeals will settle all this. There are two answers to be made. In the first place, there are many cases which cannot go to the court of appeals. All cases originating in justices' courts cannot be carried to the court of appeals, except by consent of the general term. It is known to every member of the profession, and every man upon this floor, that cases of just as much importance, so far as regards the principles which are settled, arise in justices' courts as in the supreme courts. The principle involved in a five dollar suit in a justices' court may determine the right to a large estate in the supreme court hereafter. In this class of cases there is no possibility of going to the court of appeals, except by consent of the general term. But there is another answer still, and a very conclusive answer to this suggestion that the court of appeals will remedy all this. How large a proportion of the cases decided in the supreme court are taken to the court of appeals? Of the cases which are believed by the counsel, and by the parties interested to be decided wrong how many are carried to the court of appeals? I appeal to gentlemen of the profession around me here whether in one-half the cases or in one-fifth the cases in which they believe they are erroneously beaten they advise their clients to go to the court of appeals after their defeat in the supreme court? And why? Because the risk and the cost is so great. If a man with a case involving two hundred dollars has it erroneously decided, if he goes to the court of appeals he must run the risk of having to pay perhaps five hundred dollars costs of the opposite party, besides paying his own lawyer and the lawyer in Albany for arguing the case. The court of appeals is a fine relief for a poor man who is suffering from an erroneous decision of the general term which may be in conflict with a decision of another general term! The suggestion reminds me of an anecdote told of a modern English judge when he was sentencing a poor man for bigamy. When asked the usual question whether he had any thing to say why sentence should not be passed upon him he replied: "Why, your lordship, it is a very hard case for me; my wife ran away with another man, and left me with a large family of children; I could get no woman to stay with me to take care of them unless I married her." "Why," says the judge, "you did very wrong; you should have brought an action for crim. con. against your wife's seducer; that would have cost you perhaps a hundred pounds. Then you should have brought your bill in the ecclesiastical court for a divorce a mensa et thoro; that would probably have cost you two hundred pounds. Then you should have gone to the house of lords and got a divorce a vinculo; which would not have cost you more than a thousand pounds. Then you could have married again." "But, your lordship, I am a poor man; I have not ten pounds in the world." "That makes no difference; it is the glory of the English law that it makes no distinction between the rich and the poor." And the poor man was sent to Botany Bay without any further remarks. This sarcasm, applied to the old English law of divorce, illustrates well the relief afforded by the court of appeals to a poor man. The relief is there, but it is impossible or ruinous for him to seek it. I disagree with the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend], and the gentleman from Saratoga [Mr. Pond], that there is any thing just about such a system. The first principle of law is that it shall be uniform. It was said so long ago as the time of Cicero that the principles of law were universal; that they were the same everywhere and in all ages; that they were one, as God, the great source and founder of them, was one. Lord Bacon acknowledged the same principle when he says: "There are in nature certain fountains of justice whence all civil laws are derived but as streams"—though he recognizes the practical modification to which these great principles are subjected by adding: "And like as waters take tinctures and tastes from the soils through which they run, so do civil laws vary according to the regions and governments where they are planted, though they proceed from the same fountains." But there is no occasion for variance in any one State even though it be as populous as New York. We should have a uniform law. Most of the litigation in this State is finally determined in the supreme court. It is not nominally a court of last resort; but practically it is, as I said before, to most men. There is another evil which results from this great want of unity of the supreme court—that is the immense increase of reports. Among the advantages that were claimed for the present system in the Convention of 1846, Mr. Jordan, who was upon the Judiciary Committee, argued with a great deal of zeal that it would put a stop to the intolerable avalanche, as he called it, of reports. He spoke at considerable length, and with a good deal of feeling, of the burden under which the lawyers of 1846 were resting by reason of these numerous reports which were coming in upon them. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], who addressed the committee yesterday, made a statement on this subject. I have investigated it and arrived at a slightly different result. I have looked into the matter pretty carefully and ascertained the number of reports since and before the adoption of the Constitution of 1846. Before, as I make it, there were one hundred and twelve volumes of reports for the whole judiciary history of the State from 1777 down to 1846.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any law in this State that compels a man to buy the reports of the supreme court?

Mr. HALE—I am very happy to say there is not. I must add, however, that no lawyer in full practice deems it safe to be without the great majority of these reports.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I do not think he would suffer without them.

Mr. HALE—I think if there was a law by which the whole forty-seven volumes of Barbour and the thirty odd of Howard, and all of Abbott, could be abolished, although I admit there are many learned and able opinions among them, the bench and the bar would, on the whole, have reason for thanksgiving and joy.

Mr. CHESEBRO—So I think.

Mr. HALE—My friend from Fulton [Mr. Smith] hands me a statement by which he makes one hundred and seventy-eight volumes since 1846, and one hundred and fifteen before. There is another evil still, which I think has not been mentioned as resulting from eight district courts. That is the belittling of the judiciary. And when I speak of belittling, I do not mean to say any thing against the character of the judges. My friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] and the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] seem to see every thing in the present system, to quote from the gentleman from Rensselaer himself, through a rose-colored glass; they can see no imperfection whatever in any man who now sits upon the bench. I am very sorry I am unable to see through the same glass from which they seem to derive so much comfort. It would afford me great gratification if I could concur in their views. I admit that the great portion of the judges on the bench are men of ability, learning, and integrity. I do not admit that this is universally the case. But when the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] asks me, or any body else, to point out some particular judge against whom an accusation of unfairness, or want of learning or ability, can be brought, I respectfully submit that he asks a very unfair thing. It would be very unfair for me to particularize any judge who is not present, and say he has not integrity or capacity, or learning or argument. It is enough for us to point out the defects of the system; and when we do that we are not to be charged with making insinuations, or intimations against the character of particular judges. It has been my lot, under the present system, to practice to a limited extent in three judicial districts in this State; and I have had opportunity to know something of the judges in four judicial districts. I can certainly say that many of the judges whose acquaintance I have had the honor of having during that time have been men for whom I have the highest respect; they have been good judges and learned and honest men. But I think I have seen in each of these districts the propriety of a change. Not that many of these judges would do any thing really wrong, or connive at it, but they are on intimate relations with each other, they review each others decisions, a very delicate matter, and seldom reverse them. They sometimes appoint each other referees, and sometimes each other's sons, and each other's old law partners. I speak plainly about these things, because they are matters of common remark. I do not speak of any particular judge; I say it is a not unusual custom, so far as my knowledge and personal observation extends.

Mr. McDONALD—Has not the Legislature provided by law a mode by which the judges are compelled to choose a referee selected by the parties? And how does the gentleman propose to remedy this difficulty?

Mr. HALE—The last question of the gentleman I shall answer when I get to that part of my remarks. The first question I will answer by saying I do not now recollect what the Legislature has done; but I would ask the gentleman, whether, if he was before the judge with business important to his client, and the opposing counsel should suggest, he will refer this case to Mr. So-and-so, if your honor please—he being a relative or friend of the judge—whether he would be likely to say: "I must object to Mr. So-and-so, and insist upon some other referee."

Mr. McDONALD—In answer to the gentleman I will say this: that in the trial district in which I practice, none of the judges have sons, except one; and I never knew him to give a reference to that son.

Mr. HALE—I am glad to hear this from the gentleman.

Mr. CHESEBRO — Although I concur with many of the views expressed by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], I desire him to explain to the committee how he will change this evil of which he complains.

Mr. HALE—As I said, when I get to that part of my remarks I will try to elucidate the subject, It may be it cannot be done, but I think the plan I suggest will do it to some extent. I am now pointing out the evils. I propose to come to the remedy pretty soon. I think these evils may be deemed to exist. I think they have been felt by every practicing lawyer in the State to some extent. It seems to me that the great work before this Convention is to endeavor to give some unity to the judicial system of this State as far as relates to the supreme court, and I may be allowed to say here, Mr. Chairman, that upon that point, with great deference to the character of the distinguished members of the committee on which I have had the honor of being placed, I was unable to concur with the plan which was presented by them. I believe it to be an improvement to some extent upon the present system, but I do not think it is as great an improvement as we ought to make. The plan proposed by the majority of the Judiciary Committee is this: It is to divide this State into four departments, each department containing two districts; eight judges to be elected in each department, four of them to be assigned from time to time to hold general terms. I think that is an improvement upon the present system inasmuch as it is a reduction of these local courts from eight to four. In the assignment of four judges to hold the general term for a lengthy period, I think that it is an improvement, but, as I said before, I do not think it is as great an improvement as we ought to have. It does away with the octagonal court, but it gives us a quadrilateral court, and I am not quite sure but what the evil of conflict of decisions between four general terms thus constituted would be as great as between the eight general terms that we now have, excepting, of course, as the number of the conflicting terms will be four instead of eight. I am not certain whether four general terms, rendered in a measure independent of circuit duty, would not naturally take a little more pride in having their own established decisions than the general terms do as at present constituted. The next plan proposed is that of Mr. Goodrich, in his minority report. Mr. Goodrich's plan is to have three departments: the first and second districts to constitute one; the third, fourth and fifth districts the second; the sixth, seventh and eighth districts the third department. He proposes that there shall be a presiding judge in each department, who shall always sit at general term; that general term shall always consist of five judges, the presiding judge in the department to be one, and two judges from each of the other departments to sit with him, making five, having three general terms. I think that is an improvement upon the report of the majority of the committee so far as it reduces the number from four to three, and also so far as it requires the majority of the court, four out of the five judges who are holding general term to be taken from other localities than those in which they do circuit duty. The great objection is that it still leaves a trinity—if I may be allowed the expression—of our courts, and that there might possibly be a difficulty in obtaining two judges to reside constantly, or nearly constantly, as they will have to in order to hold these general terms, out of their own districts. I would like to hear Mr. Goodrich's own views upon this subject, as I presume we shall in due time. The third plan which has been presented on this floor, and which was presented to the Judiciary Committee, and which I then felt strongly favorable to, was a return substantially to the system of 1821, to have a separate appellate court. I think the proposition has been made in the Convention by Mr. Cooke, to have an appellate court of a certain number of judges who shall be confined to general term duties; to have the number large enough so that it may divide, interchange among themselves and hold general terms in different parts of the State, and to have circuit judges separate and apart from them, who shall do general term duty only. As I said before, I felt very favorable to that plan. I find, however, upon looking at the debates of 1846, that the members of that Convention who spoke upon the subject were almost unanimously of the opinion that it was desirable that the same judges should be employed in circuit and in general term duty I find, too, that among the judges of the State, there is a very general opinion that it is better, that we have better judges by giving them both these kinds of duty. I am not so much impressed with that as many are; but it is certain that the weight of authority and of opinion is that way Mr. O'Conor, in the debates of 1846, maintained that the system of 1821 was in almost every respect a model, and said that its "capital error," to use his own language, was in the entire separation of bench and nisi prius duty. From deference to that opinion, which has prevailed so extensively, and been entertained by so many gentlemen of experience in the profession, I have endeavored, in the plan which I have presented. and which will be found in document No. 140, to devise something which would combine, so far as possible, the advantages of the system of 1821 with the system of having judges attend to both circuit and banc duties. And I may mention in this connection, what I omited to state before that in the Convention of 1821 Judge Spencer's plan for judiciary reform was to retain the old bench of five judges, of which he was a member, but to add two or three circuit judges who should assist them in holding circuits and in that duty only, retaining these five judges who did both banc and nisi prius duty. I present this m with a great deal of diffidence, and no doubt ny of the details can be improved; but the n that I have aimed to get at is this: that we ould have a bench of judges elected—if we ad-ere to the elective system—by the people of the ate at large, who should have the main control

f the appellate business of the supreme court, ho should at the same time perform some circuit uty, and who should be aided to some extent in eneral term duty by the circuit judges in re-ion. But, of course, if the plan were adopted the etails would have to be settled by the Legislature; ut my intention is to give the judges elected by he State at large the bulk of the appellate busi-ess, and the circuit judges elected by the people f the respective districts the bulk of the circuit nd special term duty. I have in this plan, for he purpose of distinguishing those elected by the people of the State at large from those elected by he people of the several districts, called the former "judges" and the latter "justices." Of course I should be in favor of applying to their election the principle of minority repre sentation—if I may so call it—the principle of having each elector vote only for a portion of the judges, which we have adopted in the case of the court of appeals; but the plan does not of course depend upon the mode of election or apportionment. In addition to those twelve judges my plan proposes four justices of the supreme court in the city of New York, and two in each of the other judicial districts of this State which are to remain as they are now. The two gentlemen from Ontario [Messrs. Chesebro and McDonald] have inquired, and also the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] how I proposed to cure the evil of conflicting decisions. By looking at the second section they will see what my proposition is. It is that there shall be held once each year a State term of the supreme court, for which seven of these judges shall be assigned, four of them constituting a quorum. I do not propose that there shall be any appeal from the general term to this State term, nor from the circuit court directly to the State term, but that they shall hear such causes as any general term or as the Legislature may direct to be heard there. There are but two classes of causes that now occur to me which should be sent to the State term. I would provide by law that no law of the State should be declared unconstitutional by any general term of the State court. I provide in my plan for general terms to be held as now in the different districts by not less than three judges, or two judges and one justice; but no justice to sit at general term in his own district. I would have no law of the State declared unconstitutional by the general term, but I would provide that if the general term should come to the conclusion that the law was unconstitutional they should suspend judgment and direct the case to be heard at the State term, and if it was there decided to be constitutional, that is the law of the State until it is reversed by the court of appeals.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I would like to ask the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] whether he would give power to a single judge holding a circuit to pass upon the constitutionality of a law.

Mr. HALE—My plan does not provide for that. I merely said what legislative provision I would be in favor of to make effective the proposed constitutional provision. That would be a matter for future consideration. I do not know that there would be any harm in providing that if a circuit judge deld a law to be unconstitutional an appeal should be directed to the State term.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I will ask if the humblest magistrate in the State, the justice of the peace, does not consider it in his power to declare a law unconstitutional.

Mr. HALE—It undoubtedly is in his power. Practically I have never known a justice to assume to decide a law to be unconstitutional.

Mr. CHESEBRO—He might.

Mr. HALE—He might unquestionably.

Mr. BARKER—Would the gentleman allow the supreme court sitting at chambers or special term to grant an injunction against carrying out an act that was apparently unconstitutional, and wait for the supreme court?

Mr. HALE—I would most certainly give him that power. But it is the final judgment that I would postpone until the decision of the State term. I am merely stating what legislative action I would recommend to secure advantage from the proposed State term. Of course that is a matter of detail. I would not, if I were to suggest any law upon this subject, provide that a law which a magistrate deems to be unconstitutional should, notwithstanding, be allowed to be enforced. I would give him power to stay action on it until there should be a determination at the State term. Another case, which I think is very important, is this: when a general term should come to a conclusion directly adverse to a reported decision of another general term, I would have them, instead of announcing their decision in conflict with that, refer the matter to a State term and settle the law for the State. And another feature of the plan which I have offered, I would call the attention of the committee to, which is:

"Provision shall be made by law for designating one of said judges as chief judge of said court, who shall preside at the State term, and for designating what judges and justices shall hold general terms, special terms and circuit courts, and preside at courts of oyer and terminer; and subject to the provisions of this article, any judge or justice of said court may hold circuit courts and special terms, preside at courts of oyer and terminer, or sit at general term in any county."

I would give authority to the Legislature to provide for the designation of particular judges to hold a particular kind of court. There is one evil with which I presume all gentlemen who practice in the country are conversant. In causes which are called equity causes it is almost impossible to get a hearing before a judge of the supreme court. It is not so, perhaps, in the first district, because they have a special term for the hearing of issues to be tried without a jury, and I believe they have also in Westchester and Kings counties: but throughout the rest of the State there are no special terms designated for the trying of issues without a jury, and the result is an evil which I presume all our country lawyers have felt that it is almost a necessity that there should be a reference of all but jury cases, and the parties be thereby subjected to great expense.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—So far as the fifth district is concerned, we have special terms. I understand that in the fourth district they have them oftener than we have.

Mr. HALE—In the fourth district they have special terms at the justices' chamber every fortnight, but for motions only, not for the hearing of trials. Of course, to take witnesses from distant parts of the district to the places where these special terms are held would be almost impossible. That, of course, should be left to the judiciary act, but I would provide that at least one special term for the trial cases without a jury should be held in each county every year. I think it is due to the profession that they should be empowered to bring their equity causes to a trial before a judge, and not be compelled to go before a referee. I do not submit this plan, Mr. Chairman, with confidence. The idea is one regarding which I have conversed with a great many prominent lawyers in the different parts of the State, who have concurred with me in my views, and considered a plan like it as practicable and desirable. It may be that the committee will think otherwise. If so, I shall most cheerfully acquiesce in that decision, and shall concur in any plan which will tend in any way to obviate this great difficulty of which I have been speaking, resulting from the present division of the supreme court into eight independent local courts.

Mr. McDONALD—In answer to the many theories, I propose to show the results of actual experience, and thus judged, I maintain that the absolute success—not theoretical, but the absolute, practical success of the judicial system of the State of New York for the past twenty years is as great as the success of any other judicial system for the same length of time in any State or in any country. Experience has shown three defects, and hence there are three changes that should be made in order to make it as perfect as any known system of judiciary can be. These three defects were referred to by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale]. They are the contradictory decisions of the supreme court, the want of sufficient force to do the business, especially in the supreme court in the first district and third, allowing a judge to sit in review of his own decisions. If by any means we can remedy these three defects, we will have a system which in other respects has been shown by experience to be as good as any established, and if these defects are remedied we shall have a system of which this State will be proud. In regard to the practical results of the mode of election and the term of office for the past twenty years, especially of the supreme court in this State, I refer to the record. I speak not of individual judges—it would not be proper to speak of them here, but it is proper to refer to the list of judges elected under the old Constitution and under the present Constitution, and take them in their aggregate and I fear not to make a comparison. I know that gentlemen talk about Justices Kent and Spencer. There were other justices. There were Justices Sutherland and Whittlesey. They were good and honest men, worthy citizens and able judges, but we seldom hear their names mentioned by those who are so eloquent in praise of the old judiciary, and so it is in regard to other justices. Character and reputation of distinguished men, especially after death, like a good oil painting, improve by age. The halo of years envelopes it, and distance of time lends enchantment to the view. We forget their faults, if they had any, and the luster of their virtues brightens. Not only length of time produces this result, but often and in the aggregate always want of personal knowledge and acquaintance has a like effect. We hear of the great men in the Senate of the United States and in the House of Representatives and when we go there and personally see them we find them still human and mortal. Before we go we may suppose that those sixty or seventy senators, and the House of Representatives are the greatest men in the United States, but when we go there we find they are human, like all other men. They have their habits, and in the aggregate are not so great as we thought. We are disappointed, and thus it is with all bodies in which are men of character and public reputation, not excepting, and I had almost said, especially this Convention. There is still another consideration. Reputation depends fully as much upon comparative merit or contrast, as upon absolute superiority. The extreme of this was with the ancients. On account of their general ignorance their great men are handed down to us as gods. The stars are only visible and beautiful because of the darkness which surrounds them; and so with regard to great men—their reputation depends more upon the worth and abilities compared with the average condition of the people of their time. As the splendor and brightness of the parabolic head light of the locomotive is only produced by the darkness about it and is diminished by the rising light of coming day, so the reputation and luster of the great and good in any age are less prominent and marked on account of the increased diffused light of general education and information about them. But, as we have said before, when we are referred to the former judiciary—to the judges of former years and systems, only a few of the most distinguished are mentioned, and the reputation of the others is not inquired into—those judges who, though honest, and who did their duty, were unfortunately—I do not say incapable of doing their duty—but were not as capable as those other great men to whom we are so often referred. Now, let us look at the list of judges. Take the judges under the first Constitution. I refer to the Civil List of the State, in which book they are all recorded. Under the Constitution of 1821, we are always referred to John Jay and to James Kent. Besides those we find the names of John Lansing, Jr., and Richard Morris, and Morgan Lewis. Although these men were able and great judges, do you ever hear any reference in regard to them? Take the circuit judges; we have Robert Yates, John Sloss Hobart, John Lansing, Jr., and so on through the list. In the glorification of the judiciary of olden time, do you ever hear over five or six of the most distinguished referred to? When they refer to that great judi-

diary of the olden time they point to Ambrose Spencer, to James Kent and John Jay; but do you ever hear in a speech in regard to and asserting the superiority of former systems of judicature, the name of John Sloss Hobart, Robert Yates or John Lansing, Jr.? I have no doubt that those were good judges; that they were capable; that they were honest, but they were not as learned and as capable as those whose names are so frequently mentioned, and the halo of these is cast over the whole. Thus they would have you believe when they cite Ambrose Spencer, James Kent and such men that all their brother judges were like unto them. When you come down to the judges under the Constitution of 1821 take the chief justices. There are four judges that are well known and they are always named. Take the other justices. We have Marcy, Sutherland, Nelson, Bronson, Cowen, Beardsley, Jewett, Whittlesey, McKissock. Now, with regard to Whittlesey and McKissock, they were honest, capable judges, upright and good men; but do you hear any thing of them now when the old judiciary is glorified? When they talk of the old court they talk of Judge Marcy, Judge Nelson, Judge Bronson, and that is very proper, but the trouble about it is they only cite the most distinguished judges, and would have the people think the court was composed of all such men, while the weakness of human nature does not allow that all should be so great men. Take the circuit judges. We have Edmonds, Kent, Betts, Emott, Strong, etc. When they talk about that bench you hear nothing about Throop, nothing of Mosely, of Beardsley, of Skinner; yet they were good judges—they were honest, upright, capable judges, and they did their duty well. But there happened to be among them a judge who had a better reputation, who was more brilliant if not more able. I do not know that he was any better. I am only speaking of general repute. These gentlemen were before my time. They talk about James Kent and John W. Edmonds, and thus of thirty judges you will hear only about six of them named. Thus, when they make glowing speeches about the judges they mention the six and they would make you believe that all had the same reputation and ability. So, when they refer to England, and her judiciary, they will mention half a dozen names, and will cite these most able and distinguished judges to you as the exemplars of the whole. Let us come down to 1846, what is the result? I submit that if there was any difference in the judges of 1846, in office, the people made a good selection therefrom. Look at the list. They took Bronson, Duer, Edmonds, Denio, and others like them. All I claim is that in making their selections they made a good selection from the judges then on the bench. Let us now look at the aggregate result of the operation of the elective system since 1846. Take the court of appeals, what is the result? In the court of appeals we have had fourteen different judges, including the lately elected judge we have had fifteen. We started with four, six have resigned. Thus the people were compelled to select ten judges; and they have selected only four more than they were compelled to. Look at the list, and without saying any thing in regard to any particular member, I fear not to compare the court of appeals of the State of New York, as an aggregate, with any list of judges for the State of New York or any other State, for the same length of time. Even under the unfavorable circumstances of close scrutiny, personal acquaintance, and general intelligence before referred to. We talk not about judges as individuals. Take the list as you find them as recorded, and when you read them over I will guarantee that any man will say that the people, in the twenty years that they have had the choice, have made as good, if not a better choice than any appointing power ever did. And as regards the appointment to fill vacancies since 1846, I will submit that the appointment of Samuel A. Foote, from my own village, was every way worthy. He was a man of great ability and great learning, but by the change in politics he was succeeded by Alexander S. Johnson, a man of no less ability, chosen by the people. Let us now look at the elections for the supreme court. There have been one hundred and nineteen choices made. At the first election thirty-two were chosen. There have been ten elections since of eight members at each election, making 80, and seven extra judges in the first district—making in all one hundred and nineteen. There have been actually selected eighty-seven different judges. There have died in office ten, resigned six—making sixteen. Thus that number have been appointed, so that the people have actually selected seventy-one different judges. They selected thirty-two at first, and the aggregate makes seventy-one. There have been in service, re-elected since 1846, five judges. They are William B. Wright, Charles Mason, Thomas A. Johnson, Richard P. Marvin, Henry Welles. I submit whether the people have shown want of discretion, whether the people have been mistaken in choosing these five men continually for over twenty years. Since 1846 there have been twenty-eight judges re-elected. And I come now to the practical answer of experience to the argument in favor of ineligibility to a second term. We have heard this theory here ably advocated, but I submit the theory is denied by the practical results of actual experience. It is argued that a judge should be independent. Independent of what? He should be independent, they say, of the people that appoint him, of the source from which he is to get a re-election. That may in theory appear to be an evil. But there are greater evils. All are naturally lazy. Man naturally has many habits, and if you put a man where he knows he has his position for life, unless he is impeached (I speak not against any particular man), and they do not, some of them, get lazy, and care little about their work, and are not as good judges as when they first commenced they will prove themselves the most remarkable set of men that were ever seen. I submit, judges are human, and you must put them in a position where humanity will be in check. Where you elect them every eight years they do remember where the power is that is to re-elect them, and they do those things which naturally would bring a re-election. What further do they say? They allege that judges make decisions to secure the support of men of influence. But what is the result? It is this, that out of the seventy-one judges, the people have re-elected twenty-eight; and I submit that it would be difficult to make a better choice in the aggregate. I refer to the actual trial of the plan for twenty years. The names of those who have been rechosen by the people after trial, are as follows: David P. Ingraham, Josiah Sutherland, Selah B. Strong, John W. Brown, John A. Lott, William B. Wright, Ira Harris, Malbone Watson, Henry Hogeboom, Alonzo C. Paige, Daniel Cady, A. B. James, E. H. Rosecrans, Platt Potter, Daniel Pratt, William F. Allen, Joseph Mullen, William H. Shankland, Hiram Gray, Charles Mason, Ransom Balcom, Thomas A. Johnson, Henry Welles, E. Darwin Smith, James G. Hoyt, Richard P. Marvin, Levi F. Bowen, James Mullett, Noah Davis, Jr., James C. Smith, LeRoy Morgan. I point to that list as a practical denial of all theory as to the impropriety of allowing judges to be re-elected; and I submit that the people of the State of New York have made a better selection, on the average, than would, in all probability, have been made by any appointing power.

Mr. HALE—How is it with the judges who were not re-elected?

Mr. McDONALD—Many good judges were not re-elected; but I am now answering the argument that there should be no re-election, because by re-election you get poor judges, figuring politicians, and I am in answer trying to show that in fact, by actual experience, the re-election by the people secures the best judges. I submit if there be any difference between the seventy-one judges, those twenty-eight are not below the average. Gentlemen do not wish any judges re-elected, they say all the politicians will get in office. That is the claim. Show me the politician in that list that has been re-elected. This is not theory. This is absolute trial for twenty years of allowing the people to elect and re-elect: who are so easily deluded, and do not know how to choose a judge. I now come to another view, and that is the comparison between appointment and re-election of judges since 1846. There have been appointed in this State the following judges that the people have afterward re-appointed and re-elected: Augustus Bockes, James C. Smith, Levi F. Bowen, Noah Davis, Jr., James G. Hoyt. These five have been appointed and afterward elected. I submit that people were not unwise in thus re-affirming the Governor's appointments. I come now to a test that I wish to call attention to because it applies to the city of New York as well as elsewhere. I hold before me a list of all judges that were appointed since 1846 and not afterward elected, and the name of the judge that was elected in the place of each one. Let us see if it shows any want of competency in the people to choose, and whether the Governor and Senate, or the people are the most liable to mistake. The first appointment was James G. King, Jr., of New York city; in his place James J. Roosevelt was elected. The next is Edward P. Cowles. He was appointed twice. He was succeeded in the first place by Henry E. Davies, now of the court of appeals, and in the second place by Daniel P. Ingraham.

Mr. SILVESTER—Does the gentleman claim that Edward P. Cowles was not a good judge?

Mr. McDONALD—No, sir; but I claim that if there is any difference between the choice of the Governor and the choice of the people, that the people made at least an equally good selection. Not that the Governor has not made a good choice. I say nothing against individual judges, I am taking class by class. I am examining the result of experience by the mode of appointment and by the mode of election for eight years, and re-election, and while I say nothing against Edward P. Cowles, I submit that Henry E. Davies and Daniel P. Ingraham are his equals, in reputation, at least. The next is Charles A. Peabody, and he was succeeded by Josiah Sutherland. I think if there is any difference in this instance it is in favor of Mr. Sutherland. The next was Benjamin W. Bonney, and he was succeeded by George G. Barnard, and it is claimed by some that this was not the most discreet choice. I know nothing about it, but if it be so it is the only mistake that occurs on the list. The next was Gilbert Dean, and he was succeeded by James Emott. The next was Lucien Birdseye, succeeded by John W. Brown. The next was Deodatus Wright, succeeded by Wm. B. Wright. The next was Levinus Monson, succeeded by Ransom Balcom. The next was Henry W. Taylor, succeeded by Theron R. Strong, and I do not think that any injustice is done to Henry W. Taylor, in saying that Theron R. Strong was his equal as a judge. Without saying a word against any individual I submit that the choice of the people is equal in the aggregate, if not better than the list of the appointments during the same time. Here is the result of our new system. The people had no experience before 1846. They had never been allowed in this State to select judges. The Governor and Senate had selected them ever since the State had been organized, and if experience is worth any thing, other things being equal, the Governor and the Senate ought to have been better able to select judges, but the list shows that they are not. Let me now call attention to another matter. It does not generally happen that a Governor selects a judge from the political party in opposition to him. By appointment of judges their choice is confined more strictly to parties than by election. If you look over the list of elective judges you will find more judges elected by the people against their political majority, than you will ever find appointed. In the district from which I come we have had two—Samuel L. Selden, and Theron R. Strong. Here we have two cases, and I understand there are cases in other districts; and I venture the assertion that when you look at the aggregate you will find that the preference of the people, on account of political considerations, in the selection of judges, has not been so strong as the preference of the Governor and the Senate. They stick closer to political ideas, and do not as easily yield those political preferences in selecting a judge.

Mr. RUMSEY—Does not the gentleman know that it is a fact that in the district in which he resides, the bar, and not the people at large, have uniformly nominated the judges, and they have got good ones?

Digitized by Google

Mr. McDONALD — Yes, sir; and I suppose that will be the fact so long as there are lawyers and judges; but if the bar unfortunately nominate a judge not so well qualified, I think the people will right the matter and elect the better one, as they did in our own district in selecting Judges Selden, and Strong. Here the lawyers were wrong, the people right. That is the result of the system, and it seems to me that when eminent members can rise here and point to some great names in English history, can cite you to Lord Mansfield, Hale and Bacon (may the Lord save his character)—and all those various Lords, yet when you come down to an actual test, when you leave theory and refer to facts you will find that theories are contradicted by fact, and that the mode of electing by the people and for eight years has proved to be as good if not the best mode that ever was tried.

Mr. AXTELL—I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any proposition before the committee for changing this system from election to appointment?

Mr. McDONALD—No, sir; but it is simply because those in favor of selection by appointment do not see fit to put that proposition forward. I submit it to the minds of the great majority here, who are in favor of the life tenure and the elective principle, if they do not believe in the old system by appointment, and if their argument here is not founded upon and would not lead them to that result?

Mr. VAN COTT—If no one dares to favor the system of appointment, is it worth while to discuss the merits of the system?

Mr. McDONALD—It is so far as this: that the same arguments that are urged for the system that they do not want they admit here bears out the system of appointment, which they would prefer. That is the trouble with them. Their secret wish is appointment, but they only argue in favor of long terms and ineligibility, and we offset their arguments by showing that the practical result has not been so good as the result by election. But if I have succeeded in proving that for twenty years past the mode of election by the people is equal to the old mode of appointment, I have accomplished my purpose. With regard to appointment, that distinct question is not here, but it is connected: it has been discussed by both sides, and it therefore illy becomes gentlemen, at this late hour, to refer to the fact that that question is not directly in issue. Let us now consider how to remedy the difficulties that exist. They do not arise from the short term, nor from the fact that the judges are elective. The gentleman asks me if I think eight years is the best term. I think it has proved to be a good limit. I find this, at least: that by re-election we get no poorer judges. It is desirable that the term of office of the judges of a court will be such that they will be long enough together so that their minds will naturally act together. In the court of appeals the necessity is greater. It is the court of last resort, a court that is expected to make uniform decisions; and for that reason their term of office should be longer than that of the supreme court. Eight years for the supreme court has proven to be about right. Another thing. There have been, it is said, two or three failures in the choice, on account of political elections. As I understand, in the city of New York, it is alleged, there have been only two political elections. But the city of New York is exceptional as to its political condition when compared with other portions of the State, and if the people of the city of New York want their judges appointed, let us yield it to them. But they should not force this upon the rest of the State who do not want it. If their peculiar situation is such that an appointive system is better for them, we will grant it to them. I am satisfied that, except in the city of New York, the system we have works well and better in the aggregate than any other system that we have had. The system of the minority report I believe will remedy the evils of the present system with the least change. The proposition of the minority is this: that this State be divided into three departments; that the first and second judicial districts as now constituted shall be the first department; the third, fourth and fifth the second department, and the sixth, seventh and eighth districts the third department. I favor this system for this reason: that it accomplishes the result desired; it remedies the evils of which we complain without disturbing the present system. We have a system; we are all accustomed to it. The people are accustomed to it; and it is, above all, desirable, if we can, to remedy the defects and keep as close as we can to the present system. This, I think, does it. These judges are to be elected by departments. When you put the second judicial district within the city of New York, I doubt if any such judges as those of which we hear complaints (if they be true) will be nominated, because, in the second district, there will be men enough who are not bound by party ties as strongly as many in the first district are at present.

Mr. YOUNG—Who are the judges in the city of New York so much complained of?

Mr. McDONALD—I can only tell you by reputation. I understand that Judge Cardozo is said by some persons not to be as good a judge as Judge Ingraham nor Judge Barnard, as good as Judge Sutherland. Elect by the people for a short term in the second district and first district united in one, and you will have a district in which these so called wrongs, if they actually exist, will not be perpetrated, and in the other district it will remain the same. The judges are the same in number. You increase the force in the first district by four judges, and in the rest you will have just the same as you do now. For myself I am in favor of continuing all the judges of the court of appeals and supreme court in office. There are eight judges just elected, five of whom have been elected without opposition. In the third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh districts, the judges were elected this year without opposition; as regards the first district I know nothing about it. I understand that the choice between the judge going out and the judge coming in is not satisfactory to all the people, but as to the other districts I think all will be satisfied and will say that the selections have been good. As to five districts as I have shown, they have been twice certified by the people, and thus certified I think it would be bad grace for this Convention to legislate them out of office. I call upon those gentlemen, who have expressed such anxiety that judges should not be put out of office and hence favor long terms, to see to it that they do not put these judges out of office in less than two years from the time that they were elected. The principle might as well be applied to the judges now hardly in their seats as to the men who have been in their seats for fourteen years. A man who has been tried eight years and certified by the people, after that ought not to be turned out. For these reasons I think above all things this Convention should not be guilty of defeating the choice of the people and turning thirty-two judges out of office, and that the gentlemen on the other side should be the last to favor any such plan. By the method proposed in the report of the minority, we would in a great degree get rid of the contrariety of decisions which is complained of in the eight districts. We would have a general term of five, and that general term made up of two from each of the other departments, with the presiding justice of the district in which the court is held. You thereby have a State court, and although there are three general terms, yet as they are composed of judges of each district, I submit that contradictory decisions would not be likely to be made. It seems to me therefore that the plan prepared by the minority would accomplish the desired result. It is a plan by which the judges shall not be removed, as in the plan proposed by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale]. I hardly see how the difficulty can be avoided upon that plan. It seems that by his plan the State court would be more ornamental than useful in this court of twelve judges of whom seven are required to make a quorum, while in the other court the number is seven and the number required for a quorum is only five.

Mr. HALE—Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? If he will look at my amendment he will see that it is provided that the quorum in the court shall be four.

Mr. McDONALD—I was wrong in that regard and stand corrected. I am, however, not wrong with regard to the number of judges, and I do not see but the State supreme court under this system would be a mere figure-head after all. He has yet the general term, from that he goes to the State term, and then he goes to the court of appeals Now, by either of the other plans if you pass the general term you go immediately to the court of appeals and get your final decision. I am therefore in favor of the plan of the minority for the reason that it cures all the evils of the present system with the least possible change.

The question was put on the substitute offered by Mr. Hale and it was declared lost.

Mr. SPENCER—I offer the following amendment:

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the amendment as follows:

Strike out of the section all after the word "law" in line three, and insert as follows:

"The State shall be divided into eight judicial districts, of which the city of New York shall be one, the others to be bounded by county lines and to be composed and equal in population or nearly as may be. There shall be four justices of the supreme court in each district, and as many more in any district as may be authorized by law. The justices of the present supreme court shall be justices of the supreme court hereby established, during the term for which they are respectively elected. Provision shall be made by law for the election of justices of the supreme court by the electors of the several judicial districts."

Mr. SPENCER—Mr. Chairman, I have very carefully considered the several plans for the organization of the supreme court which have been presented to the committee, and am compelled to say, that so far as I can discover, not one of them seems to be an improvement upon the present system. And unless there is something which shall appear to be a clear and satisfactory improvement upon the present system, I think we ought not to make any change. The judicial business of the State has been carried on under the present system for twenty years, and has become adjusted to the present organization of the court, and it seems to me that it would be entirely unwise to make any change, unless there is some great evil to be avoided, or some very great advantage to be gained. The State has been organized into judicial districts, and there does not seem to be any reason for present change in the adjustment of those districts. Centers for doing the business of the general terms have been established in all or nearly all of them, and at very many of those centers libraries have been located by the authority of the Legislature, for the convenience of the judges and of counsel. I do not know that any plan proposed here would necessarily cause a departure from the present arrangement in that respect, but it seems to me that a division of the State into departments instead of districts, and the necessity of organizing a different plan for holding the general terms of the supreme court would necessarily lead to a departure from the present mode of doing business, and the necessity of locating the business at points different from those at which it is located at present, all of which would result in very great inconvenience. There have been several evils complained of as belonging to the present system; but there has been no mode proposed, at least no satisfactory mode, by which more than one of these evils can be avoided. The great difficulty which seems to be at present in the minds of the most of those who have discussed this subject is that there is a conflict of decisions in the supreme court; but it seems to me that no plan has been presented adapted to avoid that evil. I think it entirely impossible, under the present proposed structure of the supreme court, to devise any plan by which this difficulty will be avoided. You cannot have in the supreme court as it is proposed to be constituted by any one of these systems, that unity and permanency which are necessary to secure uniformity of decisions. There must of necessity be more than one supreme court; and when there is more than one supreme court, the several courts being composed of different men, their decisions will necessarily be conflicting. We have to look, where we ought to look, to the highest tribunal of the State to settle the law of the State. We have had a considerable variety of local tribunals, and yet nobody has heard a complaint that the decisions of the superior court of the city of New York were in conflict with the decisions of the supreme court, or that the decisions of the court of common pleas of that city were at variance with the decisions of the superior court; or that the decisions of the superior court of the city of Buffalo were in conflict with the decisions of the supreme court in the same judicial districts. But we have all these local courts, and however the supreme court may be constituted they will still be subordinate local courts, and consequently their decisions will be peculiar to the localities in which they are made. So that so far as that evil is concerned, it is one that cannot be avoided The other evil which is spoken of is that judges sometimes sit in review of their own decisions I do not regard that as so great an evil as other gentlemen here seem to think it, for where a judge sits in review of his own decisions there are always at least two other judges who, if he is wrong, ought to control him. But this evil is one which may be avoided in the present system, as it will be no longer necessary that any judge of the supreme court shall sit in the court of appeals; there will be four judges in each judicial district who may hold the general term, and the business may be so regulated that no judge shall sit, or at least that no judge shall have a voice in the decision of a case, which was heard in the first instance before him. And the difficulty may be avoided by constituting a general term composed of three or four judges, selected from the judges of the State at large, to hold the general terms and sit permanently for that purpose.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I find, sir, in glancing over the discussions that have taken place in the previous Conventions and in other bodies, in relation to the judiciary of this State, that there has been no time in which it has not been easy to find fault with any existing system. As long ago as 1812 I notice that a modification of the system, or rather an addition to the number of judges was proposed by the Legislature, and the law encountered the veto of the Council of Revision. Complaint was then made that that court, consisting I believe at that time of five judges, serving as circuit judges and as the supreme court, failed to keep up with the business of the State. And at that time the people of this State could not have exceeded a million in number, only about twenty-five per cent of our present population. In 1821, and before that time, complaint was made against the old supreme court, mainly by distinguished politicians, that the judges were political judges, and charges were made against them on that score, that they were giving their attention to political affairs, and lending their influence to political schemes, and in some instances to pecuniary schemes inconsistent with their position and their character as judges; and complaint was also made that the business was not kept up. In regard to the court of chancery, too, at that time, although Chancellor Kent kept up his business, it was said that the business of the court was increasing so largely, and solicitors from all parts of the State were being admitted to that court to such an extent, that very soon it would be impossible for the chancellor to discharge the duties of his office—to keep pace with the accruing business. Other complaints were also made. A charge was made that the judges spent their time in electioneering. The old supreme court was dispensed with, and a new supreme court, consisting of three judges, was established. Eight circuit judges were appointed to hold circuits and preside in courts of oyer and terminer, also possessing powers as vice chancellors. That was the system from 1822 to 1847. Complaints were next made of that system, and one manifest and universal complaint was that one chancellor who had eight or nine vice-chancellors to assist him, was unable to perform the business of the court. And in 1847, the calendar of the court of chancery contained according to my recollection, a thousand or more causes, and it took several years to reach a case upon that calendar. So of the supreme court; its business was entirely beyond the power of the then existing judicial officers to transact it promptly. In 1840 the population of the State had increased to about two millions and a half. In 1846–7 it had increased to very nearly or quite three millions, with a like increase of business, and complaint was made of that judicial system, as wholly insufficient, and it was set aside by the Convention of 1846. The judicial system established in 1821 embraced not only the court of errors, the supreme court, the court of chancery the circuit courts, the vice-chancellors' courts, and the courts of oyer and terminer, but also county courts in each of the sixty counties of the State, making some three hundred judges, and in 1846 a change was made conferring upon the supreme court organized under the Constitution of 1846, all the original civil business that was formerly transacted in the courts of common pleas. The change put into the supreme court the business that was formerly transacted in the court of chancery, and also in the supreme court including the vice-chancellors' courts and the circuits Now, of course, that was an experiment, a new system. The court was organized in eight districts, four judges in each district, except the county of New York which had five. I desire now, to call attention for a moment to this court to see whether it is justly liable to the charges that are made against it—for I repeat that it is very easy to make charges and complaints as to the supreme court as organized under the Constitution of 1846. I ask what was desired from it, and what was expected from it? Why, sir, that it should do the business that had been done previously in the courts of common pleas, all the original civil business in these courts; it was also to take the business of the court of chancery, transact that, and the business of the eight circuits, and the eight vice-chancellors' courts and transact that. Then we had the Code established under a requirement of this Constitution of 1846. And here let me digress a moment. Complaint is made of the number of books of reports that have grown up in the profession since 1846. Their name is legion, and to a great extent they have grown out of the interpretation of the new laws, consequent upon the changes made and provided for by that Constitution and in the settlement of the practice (so far as it has been settled) under this Code of Procedure. But let us see whether this system of eight districts, and, as it is called by gentlemen, eight supreme courts, is justly liable to the complaints that have been made against it. Has it done the business? As a general thing, sir, I say it has. It has done its own proper business, and the business that was transacted in all those other courts; and transferred to the present court, and outside of the city of New York, I do not understand that there is any considerable complaint that the supreme court judges have not heard and decided with reasonable promptness, all the causes that have been brought before them—that they have not been competent to do it, or that they have not done it. The number of those causes I am unable to state, but I shall guess at it for the purpose of seeing how much business, so far as the number of causes is concerned, has been transacted. That court has taken up and done the business of all these other courts, and speaking generally, in every district throughout the State the calendar is clear or nearly clear—every circuit calendar, except perhaps in a few large places, is substantially cleared up. And, sir, so far as I know, it is not charged that these courts are not able to do and have not done all business which is not strictly jury business. They have held special terms in all the counties where issues are joined which parties have not seen fit to try before a jury, have been tried. Now, complaint is made further that we have had diversity of decisions in different portions of the State in different districts. I grant it, and I ask every gentleman within the sound of my voice to go into his own library or into the State library and open the first book of the reports of the State of New York he sees and look at the index and see how many cases that have been decided in this State and in England, and in the courts of other States, have been reconsidered, reviewed and commented upon, explained, doubted, and overruled from term to term, from year to year, from generation to generation. Sir, you cannot open a book but what you will find some such cases contained in it. Uniformity of decisions in courts of justice is as inconsistent with the history of the world as uniformity in the appearance of different men's faces or the sound of different men's voices. Chancellor Kent on a certain occasion made a decision in court. The unsuccessful counsellor said, "Your Honor decided the other way last year." "Certainly I did," replied the chancellor, "and I have become entirely satisfied that I was wrong last year, and I now decide in this way." I once had a case in the old supreme court heard at the general term held by one judge only. I depended upon the published decisions of that court, and I cited more than one of them, but notwithstanding he admitted that, the judge said that his opinion was the other way, and so decided, thus overruling previous decisions of the same court. As I have already said, uniformity of decisions can never be had, in my opinion, in any court, for any considerable time. Suppose one court does decide one way and another court another way, what harm? Such differences of opinion are incident to human nature. But gentlemen want uniformity in decisions. I would like to know where they are going to get uniformity in decisions under a new statute such as the general railroad act; an act with provisions so numerous and multifarious and so constructed as to be capable of being interpreted one way by one clear head, and another way by another clear head. Cases arise under this law in different parts of the State at the same time. One interpretation is given to its provisions in one case and a different interpretation in another locality. No uniformity is practicable in such cases. What is to be expected in the way of uniformity in any possible court that you can constitute? You cannot try all the cases in any one court, that is impossible; and you have got to take, in the first place, the decisions of the first court into which you bring your case. I would certainly like very well not to have the same court decide both ways as they did in my case, or what was nearly that, but I had no way to help myself, and one of the ablest men on that bench told me with his own lips, that he changed his vote from one side to the other, "and," said he, "it was a very difficult question, and I do not now know whether it was decided right or not." If you are going to have uniformity of decisions you will have to get something above humanity out of which to make your judges. How will it be with this very Constitution upon which we have spent so much labor, and which we hope to make so deservedly acceptable to the people? We provide here for general laws on a great variety of subjects. When litigation comes up in regard to these provisions of the Constitution and in regard to the provisions of law that are to be enacted under the Constitution, I would like to know how you are going to get the superior court of Buffalo, and the court of common pleas of New York, and the general term of the third and the fifth districts, all to decide alike in regard to the meaning of the Constitution or the scope of the laws enacted under it. Each court will decide one way or the other according to its best judgment, and if another court sees the matter in a different light, and decides the other way, why we have a court of appeals to remove whatever there may be inconsistent in those decisions, and remedy all the supposed mischief. Sir, I do not discover all this mischief that is spoken of here, in the diversity of decisions rendered by different courts. As I have said, you cannot have uniformity in whatever way you attempt to secure it. There is no way to secure uniformity, no way to have one court to try all the cases, but then you must keep the same judges on the bench from generation to generation, and even then perhaps as in my own case, to which I have alluded, the same judge will overrule himself, as he ought to do, if he finds out that he has been wrong. The want of uniformity is incident to all courts in all places at all times, and must be so from the very nature of things. Another suggestion has been made. In the first part of our sitting, we had the story repeated over and over again that our Legislature was corrupt. After a little while had it that the canal officers were corrupt, now we have it that the judges are corrupt. I not asserted as a positive fact, but from the most inferences from the arguments that are here, it must be admitted that it has been assumed that corruption exists in our judiciary. We have heard a very learned dissertation, based, so far as it has any force at all, upon the assumption that our courts, as at present constituted, are more or less corrupt, unreliable and untrustworthy; and we have been referred back to Great Britain, two hundred years ago, and one hundred and sixty years ago, when a state of things existed not quite similar to ours, but so far similar as to make it valuable for an argument. We are told that the English judges at that time were corrupt; that their tenures were uncertain; that they depended upon the will of the appointing power or the monarch, in that case, and were under its control for continuance in office, and, as I understand the argument, because they were dependent for continuance in office upon the crown, they were corrupt; and Scroggs and Jeffries and Lord Bacon are referred to as instances of the character and reputation of the judges of England during those years. I simply desire to ask the gentleman who made that argument [Mr. Daly] if he supposes that the judicial offenses of Lord Bacon were the necessary consequences of the mode of his appointment to office, and were not all these supposed crimes and offenses which have been charged upon Lord Bacon the result of the vices of the age and the country in which he lived, rather than the result of the mode of appointment to office? Did England stand then in respect of morals, law and general intelligence of its people as it stands to-day, or as it has stood for the last hundred years? Has the character of the judicial officers of Great Britain improved since that time more than has the general character of the people and of the governing classes of that country? Has the improvement in the character of the judges been more rapid than the march of science, art and general intelligence and improvement in that country? I say no, sir. Why, sir, at the time the gentleman speaks of, the monarch herself had not a knife and fork to eat her dinner with. Up to that time, and at that time, riots, uprisings of the people, religious dissensions and revolutions were constantly occurring in that country. From that time until now there has been a great improvement, but I deny that it has been greater in regard to the character of the judiciary than in all other respects. But, sir, it is said that after there was a change in the mode of appointment and the tenure of good behavior or life tenure was made the rule, the character of the judges improved; and the argument is that the improvement was from that cause, and we are told that we must change our mode of selecting our judges, or at least we must extend the period for which they hold office, if we want to have a good judiciary—if we desire to secure the same good results that have been secured in Great Britain by the change made there. From all this, the inference is plain that these gentlemen believe that we have a corrupt judiciary system, from which we are to relieve ourselves in this way. Now, sir, I deny both the premises and the conclusion; I deny that the judicial system of this State is open to the charge of corruption, or of truckling to popular opinion for the purpose of securing re-elections. The instance is not named where the thing has occurred, and it cannot be named. These gentlemen do not attempt to name an instance, but throughout their remarks upon this question we find a loose, general, unsupported assumption that such is the fact, in regard to our judiciary. Now, sir, I deny it. I say that our judges have been industrious, able and faithful. If they have committed errors, they are human, and all the men in the world are human. For my part I cannot conceive of that state of mind existing in any of our judges which would induce them to turn to the right hand or to the left in their decisions, for the purpose of securing votes; but I say that if such things have occurred under our system, it does not follow that under the appointing system, a judge would not, out of gratitude to those who helped him to get the appointment, swerve from the line of duty to accommodate his friends in this way. I understand that the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] is substantially to retain the present judiciary system so far as the supreme court is concerned. I am in favor of that proposition. I have seen nothing yet, which to my mind, will secure the people better judicial services, or more prompt discharge of judicial duties. We are accustomed to the present system, and if there evils in it they can be remedied without changing the entire system. One of the faults complained of now, is that the judge who sits at circuit, also sits at general term. At one time this was supposed to be a great advantage to the judge, and I still believe it to be so. I believe, too, that a judge is largely benefited by going about and holding circuits. If he is shut up in general term altogether, in a very short time he will cease to know any thing, except what he reads in books, and he will read always with the same old spectacles, and see nothing but what an "old fogy" can see; but going around holding circuits, and getting a knock here and a knock there, from the counsel on the one side, and on the other, his brain will be enlivened and stimulated, and he will be made to see things more clearly and distinctly than if shut up in his office with his musty old books. I have no desire, sir, to trespass longer on the patience of the Convention, but I do not believe that it is worth while for us to throw by a good thing for something more cumbrous, more intricate and more complex, without any corresponding advantages that we are certain to attain by the change. Our system is complex enough as it is now, but the division of the State into four subdivisions would make it more complex still, and you would have the judges traveling from one end of the State to another, or at least halfway. But as has been said, that experiment was tried and failed, or at all events became unsatisfactory, and as a general proposition I have not a particle of doubt that our present system is as simple, as good, and as efficient as any thing that we can contrive. There is another point that I wish to mention. At every circuit that I have attended for a long time, as a general thing, the judge has not assumed to say what the law was in some particular case, but has said, "I will hold so and so, for the purpose of enabling you to get the decision of the general term. This is a doubtful question and I am not certain in regard to it." Thus the judge does not commit himself, and he goes to the general term entirely uncommitted; and in a large proportion of the cases that go to the general term the original decision is of this character. Now, is there any good reason for excluding a judge from the general term bench under the circumstances. But I will not go any further into detail at this time.

Mr. SILVESTER—I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Silvester, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the report of the Standing Committee on the Judiciary, had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had directed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. A. F. ALLEN—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. A. F. Allen, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, December 7, 1867.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, Mr. ALVORD, PRESIDENT pro tem., in the chair.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. Mr. RAWSON.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. GOULD—I received a letter from Mr. Archer this morning, stating that he is sick, but that he will return as soon as his physician will permit him. Under these circumstances I ask for him indefinite leave of absence.

No objection being made, leave was granted.

Mr. WALES—The chairman of the Committee on Industrial Interests has requested me to make the following report:

The SECRETARY read the report as follows:

The Committee on Industrial Interests, not otherwise referred, respectfully report:

That they have had under consideration the subject of providing for legislation in reference to cruelty to animals, and deem it to be already under jurisdiction of local or general law.

That they have considered the memorials referred to them, asking for laws to equalize the legal interest on rents and loans, and are of the opinion that the question has been decided by action of the Convention upon the article of finance.

That, upon the resolution inquiring whether feudal tenures operate injuriously upon industrial interests in this State, they submit the following amendment, recommending that it take the place of section 12 of the bill of rights:

§ 12. All rents and services upon grants in fee, except to the owners of the reversion of such fee, are abolished.

A. J. H. DUGANNE,
Chairman.
EDW. I. FARNUM,
J. R. ARMSTRONG,
LESTER M. CASE.

Which was referred to the Committee of the Whole and ordered to be printed.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I move that when this Convention adjourn it adjourn until Monday evening at seven o'clock.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. C. C. Dwight, and it was declared carried.

Mr. MERRITT—I offer the following resolution and ask that it be laid on the table:

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

WHEREAS, It is now probable that the labors of this Convention will not be completed before this chamber will be required by the Legislature; therefore

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the President to confer with the committee of the Common Council of the city of Albany in relation to a suitable hall and accommodations for the sessions of this Convention, as voluntarily tendered by the city authorities, and report as early as practicable.

The resolution was laid on the table at the request of the mover.

Mr. AXTELL—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared lost.

Mr. BICKFORD—I offer this resolution, and ask that it lie on the table.

The SECRETARY read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to add to section 5, of the article on the Legislature, its Organization, etc., substantially the following:

"Of the salary provided for in this section, two hundred dollars shall be due and payable on the first day of February, in each year, and the remainder at the close of the first and main session of the Legislature for the year. During said session the roll of members in each house shall be called half an hour after the beginning of each daily session, if the session shall be held so long, and again just before adjournment for the day, and any member who shall not answer to his name on either of said roll-calls shall be deemed absent for the day, and there shall be deducted from that portion of the salary of each member, payable at the end of the first main session, for each day's absence as aforesaid, a sum which shall bear the same proportion to eight hundred dollars as one day bears to the whole number of days which the session shall last."

Which was laid on the table on the motion of the mover.

Mr. AXTELL—I offer the following resolution.

The SECRETARY read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That in the further discussion of the report of the Judiciary Committee, in Committee of the Whole, no delegate shall speak more than once on a question, nor longer than ten minutes.

Mr. COMSTOCK—We have just entered upon the consideration of this great subject. I think it very unwise to limit the debate in the manner this resolution proposes.

Mr. BARKER—I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Barker, and it was declared carried.

Mr. PRINDLE—I move that this Convention now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Prindle, and it was declared lost.

The Convention again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole upon the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, of Cayuga, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the amendment of Mr. Spencer, which the SECRETARY read as follows:

Amend section 6 by striking out all after the word "law," in line three, and insert the following:

SEC. 6. The State shall be divided into eight judicial districts, of which the city of New York shall be one; the others to be bounded by county lines, and to be compact and equal in population, as nearly as may be. There shall be four justices of the supreme court in each district and as many more in any district as may be authorized by law. The justices of the present supreme court shall be justices of the supreme court hereby established during the term for which they were respectively elected. Provision shall be made by law for the election of justices of the supreme court by the electors of the several judicial districts.

Mr. VAN COTT—I am quite willing that this matter should be discussed, but I think it improper that the question be taken upon so vital a point in the present state of the Convention.

Mr. WAKEMAN—This is a very important question, and one which should not be passed over lightly. Let us examine, for a few moments, the objections against the present system so far as regards the supreme court. I have heard but two. One is the conflict of decision. But no plan has been adopted or even proposed which will do away with the conflict of decisions. Of course, by uniting two districts and making them one, the difficulty will be partly, but not wholly, removed. The other point raised against the present system is this: that the judge will sit in review of his own decisions. This is the universal complaint, I believe. Now, have we proposed any plan by which we shall do away with this? I believe we all agree that the system should be amended so that the judge shall not sit in review of his own decision, and that this can be done with eight districts as well as four. What are the advantages of having eight districts instead of four? Every lawyer will understand that it is a matter of convenience that the general term should be brought as near the business portion of the district as possible for the accommodation of the members of the bar. In former times the lawyers of the State were obliged to employ counsel at the seat of government to attend to most of their general and special term business. They could not afford to attend awaiting the disposition of their cases at Albany; consequently the main portion of the business at the general term was done by local counsel here. By the late system, every member of the profession, however humble he may be, has the privilege of appearing and arguing his own cases. Of course he had the same privilege under the former practice, but it was impracticable for him to do so. Now the districts have all been arranged (taking, for instance, the district from which I come) so that members of the bar can go to court with the understanding that their cases can be disposed of by a particular day. They can go to court in the morning, transact their business, and return to their homes at night. So it is, I believe, in the seventh district. What are we to gain by consolidating two districts into one? It is entirely immaterial to me whether the districts are consolidated or not; it is equally convenient for me to attend court either at Rochester or Buffalo. But the question is: what can be gained for the public convenience? If we can gain any thing, by all means let us make the change; if we cannot gain any thing, of course we should not abandon what has worked well, so far, and try an experiment. The proposed change cannot entirely remedy the difficulty arising from conflicting decisions. I apprehend that at the present time the practice is so settled that we are not to have so much conflict in the decisions of the general term as we have had. I believe many of the pending questions are being settled by the court of appeals. I have great doubt that the changing of two districts into one will remove the evils that are complained of. On the subject of a judge reviewing his own decisions, I think there is more suspicion and alarm than circumstances will warrant. I have known many cases where the judge has overruled his own decisions; and other cases again where he has attempted to overrule his own decision when it was sustained by his brothers on the bench. I recollect a case of that kind very well. I know a case where Justice Marvin undertook to overrule his own decision, when it was sustained by his associates. So it is not always true that judges at the general term, when they come to examine their cases, adhere to their opinion at circuit. Yet there is a feeling amongst the profession that a judge who held the circuit has an influence in carrying a case through the general term in the same way in which it was decided at the circuit. I would remove that if it were possible, and it can be done. If you continue four judges as at present, we shall have the force of four during the entire two years. Formerly every second year one of the judges has gone to the court of appeals; consequently we have had but three judges, in point of fact. We can say no judge shall sit in review of his own decision. This will leave three judges to decide cases at general term. The point may be raised, and there may be something in it I conceive, that we have the judge who holds the circuit, yet who does not take part in the decision. That may be true to some extent; but he is present. He can do and say all that is on the point to influence the other judges precisely as though he took part in the decision. How shall we get rid of that? There is only one way of doing it entirely, and that is to allow one of the judges to be the circuit judge only. I believe it is said here and generally conceded that it is better the judges at circuit should participate at general term. If that is so, the only remedy we can adopt will be to prohibit the judge from sitting in review of his own decision Unless it is thought best to continue the justices of the supreme court as circuit judges, I shall be in favor of separating them entirely, and making it the duty of the circuit judge to hold circuits, and courts of oyer and terminer, and special terms, if you please to connect with it the ordinary business. Separate them entirely. I am not satisfied that change of districts is called for. Yet the other change is called for. If we provide that the justice who tries a case at circuit shall not sit in review of his own judgments, to a great extent the minds of the public will be relieved of the fear that his influence will be exerted in a wrong direction. Situated as we are, in the particular portion of the State in which I reside, the report of the Judiciary Committee would satisfy us very well, because a single district accommodates us as well as a double one. But it is not so in many other districts. The question is, whether or not, hereafter, we shall permit a judge to review his own decisions. I merely throw out these suggestions for gentlemen to reflect upon, and see whether or not there has been any complaint in reference to the present supreme court. The calendars generally in the rural districts have been cleared in a single week. The general term in our district disposes of the business in two weeks or less. The question is whether or not the speedy administration of justice under the present system is not to be regarded with some favor, and whether we should change it for another system when it works so well in that particular. Great complaints have been made about the court of appeals being choked up with business; and this Convention has been called to remedy it. But of the supreme court there is no such complaint, except perhaps in the large cities. I must say that I incline to the old system so far as regards the eight districts, yet I shall be glad to hear what can be said against it, for I am hear to learn. I want to hear the suggestions of gentlemen on the subject, then I propose to vote upon the best system which shall be devised.

Mr. HALE—I move that the further consideration of this amendment be postponed until Tuesday next.

The CHAIRMAN—This motion is not in order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE—Is it not in order to move to postpone?

The CHAIRMAN—Not for any definite time.

Mr. HALE—I move to pass it over for the day.

Mr. AXTELL—It is perfectly obvious that no conclusion can be reached in this committee upon any question of importance, and that whatever discussion is had upon this question will have to be repeated in the full body of the Convention. It is for these reasons that I now move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put upon the motion of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the Committee on the Judiciary; had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had instructed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put upon granting leave, and it was declared granted.

Mr. PRINDLE—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Prindle, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, December 9, 1867.

The Convention met at seven o'clock, P. M.

Prayer was offered by Rev. JOHN F. LOWERY.

The Journal of Saturday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. BELL—I ask the unanimous consent of the Convention to make a report from the Committee on the Manufacture of Salt.

No objection being made, the report was received and read, as follows:

The Committee on the Salt Springs of the State deem it important, for a proper understanding of this subject, to submit a brief statement showing the relations which the State sustains to these springs.

The salt springs are the property of the State. By the treaties of 1788 and 1795 the State acquired the title to the lands containing these salines, of the Indians, including a territory of more than one mile in width around the Onondaga lake. Previous to this time, small quantities of salt, of an inferior quality, had been made from brine obtained from shallow excavations in the earth, near the margin of the lake.

The first act concerning the salt springs was passed in 1797. It was therein provided that the reservation should be laid out into suitable and convenient lots containing some ten or fifteen acres each, and that leases should be given for the occupancy of these lots for the term of three years, to such persons as had or would erect salt works thereon, of a certain specified capacity, and pay the State a rent or duty of four cents for every bushel of salt made from the brine thus obtained. This act also defined the rights and privileges of manufacturers, and provided for the appointment of a State superintendent to collect the duties and enforce the regulations therein specified.

The quantity of salt manufactured that year was only 25,474 bushels.

The demand for salt continued to increase until it became necessary to sink deeper wells and raise the brine by machinery.

In 1812 the Legislature reduced the duty to three cents per bushel, and appropriated two acres of land for the purpose of making salt by solar evaporation. The total production of that year was 221,011 bushels.

By the act of 1817 the duty on salt was increased to twelve and a half cents per bushel, and the superintendent was required to report and pay quarterly to the commissioners of the canal fund.

The Constitution of 1821 provided that the duty on salt should not be reduced below twelve and a half cents per bushel until after the full and complete payment of principal and interest on the money borrowed or to be borrowed for the construction of the Erie and Champlain canals. This rate of duty continued to be collected and paid over as directed by the act of 1817, and required by the Constitution, until, by an amendment of that instrument in this respect in 1833, the Legislature was authorized to reduce the duty on salt to six cents per bushel, and pay the same to the Treasurer of the State to the credit of the general fund.

The increased demand for salt consequent upon opening up the country by the construction of the Erie canal, in conjunction with the annoying difficulties which had long existed among the salt manufacturers in regard to their respective rights to the use of the brine, and the necessity of furnishing a more adequate supply influenced the Legislature, by act of 1825, to direct the superintendent to take possession of all the wells, pumps and other machinery then on the reservation for supplying brine, and provide that thereafter the brine should be furnished at the expense of the State. Previous to the last above mentioned date, the wells were sunk by the manufacturers, who were also required to furnish the machinery necessary for raising and distributing the brine, at their own expense. No private wells were permitted on the reservation from that time. The duties of the State superintendent, which heretofore had been confined mainly to the inspection of salt and the collection of the revenues, were by this act greatly enlarged. Additional officers were appointed to assist him, in sinking wells and providing and superintending the machinery necessary to raise and furnish to the manufacturers a full supply of brine, in accordance with the priority of the leases for the lots which they respectively occupied. Under this arrangement, the product of salt, was materially increased, as will appear from the superintendent's report. In 1828, 1,160,888 bushels were manufactured.

A commendable zeal has ever been manifested on the part of the State to improve the quality as well as to increase the quantity of salt made from these springs. As early as 1822, the State offered and paid a bounty of three cents per bushel for all coarse or solar salt that should be sent to the Hudson river or to Lake Erie, or that should be sent from Oswego to Canada, and that manufacturers of coarse salt should be allowed a preference in the distribution of the brine. Repeated and expensive chemical experiments for improving the quality and lessening the cost of its production, have been made at the expense of the State.

On the assumption that a sufficient sum of money had been received from the duties on the manufacture of salt, as established by the act of 1817, and incorporated into the Constitution of 1821, to discharge the canal debt of the State, together with the fact that a large reduction in the tariff had been made on foreign salt by the general government, the Legislature was allowed, by an amendment of that instrument in 1833, to reduce the duty on salt; but such reduction should not be below six cents per bushel, which reduction was perfected at the next session of the Legislature.

By a subsequent amendment of the Constitution, in 1835, the duties on salt were restored to the general fund.

By the terms of the amendment of 1835, the Legislature was re-invested with the power to regulate the amount of duty that should be imposed on salt "whenever a sufficient sum of money had been received and invested to discharge the canal debt." That amendment also provided that the canal tolls on salt should not be reduced until such debt had been fully paid and discharged. To evade these embarrassing requirements, in 1841 an act was passed authorizing a "drawback" on the salt duties, which was denominated a bounty. In 1843, by an amendment, the provisions of the above mentiond act were extended to lead, coal and gypsum, which paid no duties to the treasury. Under this bounty law there has been paid from the treasury of the State the sum of $417,101. A bounty was also paid by the State upon the transportation of salt barrels carried upon the canals. In 1846, the Finance Committee of the Senate, in their report recommending a repeal of the act of 1841, giving a bounty on salt, say "The principle upon which the law in question is founded, is believed to be wholly indefensible. The price of salt to the consumer should be the cost of its manufacture, the duty paid to the State, and the expense of its transportation. Those residing nearest the works have a natural advantage over those who reside more remote. The price of salt should be enhanced in proportion to the distance at which the consumer resides from the place of its manufacture;" and conclude their report by recommending the repeal of the bounty law, and in favor of a duty of two cents a bushel on salt. By the subsequent action of the Legislature on the above mentioned report, the bounty law was repealed, and the duty on salt reduced to one cent per bushel; the immediate effect of which was to reduce the revenue which the State obtained from the manufacture of salt from $230,014.86 in 1846, to $39,513.51 in 1847.

The law "concerning the salt springs and the manufacture of salt" in force at the present time was passed in 1859. It sets out with a recital of the provisions of the present Constitution on that subject, and declares that "there shall be collected and paid upon all salt manufactured in this State a duty of one cent per bushel of fifty-six pounds, which duty shall be paid into the general fund." By this act the possession of all the real estate and personal property belonging to the people of the State, connected with the salt works and salt springs, together with the "care and superintendence of the salt springs and the manufacture and inspection of salt upon the reservation," are vested in a superintendent to be appointed by the Governor and Senate, and hold his office for three years. He is authorized to appoint deputies and assistants and establish such rules and regulations as he may deem expedient from time to time. He is also required "to provide such additional wells, pumps, reservoirs, aqueducts and machinery as shall be needful for supplying the manufacturers of salt with brine in the largest quantity and of the best quality," and report to the Comptroller at the end of each fiscal year. The forty-fourth section of this act makes it the duty of the superintendent to lease for a term of thirty years from June 20th, 1859, the several salt lots on the reservation, the fee of which is in the State, for the purpose of manufacturing salt, subject only to the regulations prescribed by law, reserving to the State the power of vacating such lease at any time by paying a reasonable value for such manufactories and their necessary appendages.

By this act the vexed question in regard to the priority of right to the use of the brine was also settled, by declaring that "no distinction shall be made in the distribution of brine, but all the erections which were in existence on the 15th day of April, 1858, shall be considered equally entitled to a supply of water from the springs, but in case there should be an insufficiency of brine to supply all such erections, then the superintendent shall classify the same in such a manner as to furnish a supply of water to each of such erections an equal portion of the time. And the superintendent shall, during the months of July and August, classify favorably to the erections for the manufacture of solar salt; but such classification shall not give said erections a supply for more than an equal portion of the time as above mentioned."

The act from which the above extracts are made, is the law now in force on this subject, and is a codification of former statutes, with numerous amendments and additions.

The present constitutional provision in regard to the salt springs and the lands connected therewith, may be found in section 7 of article 7 of the Constitution of 1846, as follows:

"The Legislature shall never sell or dispose of the salt springs belonging to this State. The land contiguous thereto, and which may be necessary and convenient for the use of the salt springs, may be sold by authority of the law and under the direction of the commissioners of the land-office, for the purpose of investing the moneys arising therefrom in other lands alike convenient, but, by such sale and purchase, the aggregate quantity of these lands shall not be diminished."

By reference to a report of the commissioners of the land-office, Convention Document No. 27, it will be seen that the lands reserved for salt purposes had, at the adoption of the present Constitution, been reduced to..... 550 acres.

Under the same provision the State has sold or exchanged,.....		127.25

In reply to an interrogatory of this Convention, in relation to the value of these lands and the salines connected therewith, the commissioners of the land-office say:

"1. We do not know the present value of the salt lands belonging to the State, and have no means of making an estimate of the approximate value thereof.

"2. We know of no way of determining the value of the salines. The State owns the water and delivers it to various individuals and companies to be made into salt, receiving from these parties such sums as has been determined by law. This sum, since 1846, has been one cent a bushel of 56 pounds.

"The value of the salines must then be considered as that sum that the State may justly demand of the manufacturers for the salt water delivered to them."

In addition to the above mentioned real estate and the salines therein contained, the State owns over three hundred thousand dollars' worth of other property which is employed, as indicated in the following schedule, in the supplying of brine to the manufacturers of salt:

The salt company of Onondaga was organized early in the year 1860, under the general manufacturing laws of this State, for the manufacture and sale of salt, with a capital of $160,000, which was subsequently increased by a stock dividend of an equal amount. Arrangements were entered into with the owners of blocks, by which all the fine salt blocks, 316 in number, were leased to this company for the term of ten years, at a yearly rent or interest of twelve and a half per cent upon an estimated average valuation of over $5,500 each. A similar arrangement was affected with the manufacturers of solar salt, by which 38,517 vats or covers were leased to the company at twelve and a half per cent on an average valuation of $40 each.

The absolute control thus secured over the manufacturers enables the company to determine the quantity of salt that shall be manufactured: the number of works that shall be employed in such manufacture; the price that shall be paid to the manufacturers, and the price at which it shall be sold.

An ordinary fine salt block is capable of making from 250 to 280 bushels of salt per day. Of the 316 fine salt blocks on the reservation, not more than one-half or two-thirds of them are kept in repair, and only a small portion of this latter class is kept in continuous operation during the whole salt manufacturing season.

The introduction of coal in the manufacture of fine salt has been attended with highly beneficial results. Its superiority over wood is evidenced in the improved quality of the salt, which can be produced at a largely reduced cost. Former apprehensions in regard to the scarcity and probable price of wood have been dissipated. The future production will only be limited for the want of adequate facilities to raise and distribute the brine, which nature has deposited in this exhaustless reservoir which underlies these works, and for the want of a remunerative market. The price of coal at the works has varied for several years past from three dollars to seven dollars per ton; it is now selling freely at five dollars. By an advantageous contract, the salt company are enabled to furnish the manufacturers with coal for the next seventeen years, at an advance of fifty cents over prime cost.

The production of salt by solar evaporation is steadily increasing, as will be seen from the tables which accompany this report. A solar cover (as the vat is called into which the brine is placed for evaporation) costs from forty to fifty dollars, and will produce about fifty bushels of salt in a season. The quality of the salt produced by this process is, for many purposes, superior to that produced by artificial heat. The following table exhibits the production of the works, and the price at which the same has been sold at Syracuse for the last twenty years:

The cost of producing a bushel of fine salt has varied materially during the last six or eight years. In 1861 the salt company of Onondaga paid the manufacturers of fine salt 11¼ cents per bushel, which included fuel, boiling and repairs; manufacturers of solar salt received during the same year 5½ cents per bushel. In the fall of 1862 the price paid for manufacturing fine salt was advanced to 16 cents per bushel.

By a reference to the testimony of John W. Barker, Esq., who is the secretary of the company and also a manufacturer of salt, it will be seen that the price which the company pays during the present year is as follows, namely: for boiled salt nineteen cents per bushel, and for solar salt eight cents per bushel; that the cost to the company for a barrel containing five bushels of salt is as follows:

The present price of salt, and the price at which it has been steadily maintained for the last three years, is two dollars and thirty-five cents per barrel; but on account of competition with foreign and other domestic salt, the company have not been able to realize that price on salt sent to New York city, or out of this State. The production of 1866 was 7,158,503 bushels, not more than one-sixth of which was sold in the State at the home or Syracuse price. The whole quantity sold that year in the State, including the northern counties of Pennsylvania and that portion of Canada supplied through the Champlain canal, was 2,071,789 bushels, at an average price of from $2.20 to $2.25 per barrel. The balance of that year's production was sold as follows: 748,314 bushels in New York city at $1.60 to $1.75 per barrel, net; 510,330 bushels in Canada, via Oswego, at $2.03 per barrel, net; 1,916,900 to lower lake ports, at $1.99 per barrel, net; 1,911,170 bushels to upper lake ports, at $2.03, net. The average net price which the company realized, for the production of 1866, is $2.03 per barrel, according to the testimony of the secretary.

If the actual business of 1866, which falls considerably below the average of the last seven years, and largely below that of 1862, be subjected to the following analyses, the net profits derived from the salines for that year will be obtained thus:

The Salt Comp'y of Onondaga in account with Salt, Cr.

This sum will represent the interest, at 6 per cent, on $4,946,575.83, which may be considered the approximate value of the property owned by the State on the reservation. Included in the above valuation are the wells, pumps, offices, reservoirs, aqueducts, machinery, etc., which are estimated at $311,710.

From an examination of this subject it is apparent that no uniform policy has prevailed in regard to these springs. The numerous petitions, reports and legislative acts abundantly prove that conflicting views have long existed between the people and the manufacturers. The liberality with which the State has raised the brine and poured it into the vats and cisterns of the manufacturers, almost free of cost, the ease with which they convert it into salt, and the protection afforded them by nearly prohibitory rates of duty and canal tolls on foreign salt, have ever presented strong inducements to them to enter into combinations which no statute laws can effectually prevent. From the character of the business, there is probably no necessary article of consumption produced in the State so readily monopolized as Onondaga salt. Under the plea of furnishing cheap salt to the people, the manufacturers have generally opposed all restrictions and duties beyond a sum sufficient to furnish a full supply of brine. While on the other hand, the State has repeatedly interfered to regulate the business and adjust the duties so as to correspond with the conditions of the country and the demands of the treasury, relying upon individual competition to give the people salt at the lowest price for which it can be afforded.

Your committee are unable to reconcile the practice which prevails in regard to the sale of salt with the principles of justice or with a sound commercial policy.

From the testimony which accompanies this report, it appears that over one million of bushels were sold to the people of this State at from twenty to twenty-five per cent more than was received from sales of their salt in other States. The rules of legitimate trade are reversed in regard to the sale of salt. The greater distance the consumer resides from the place where the article is manufactured, the less price he is required to pay. Citizens residing in the northern, western, and central counties of our State have abundant reason to complain of the unjust discrimination against them; nor can such discrimination be justified upon the plea of unprofitable sales in distant and competing markets. Should our citizens, who consume but a small portion of the production of these springs, be compelled to make up these deficiencies? The efforts of the State to restrict combinations and encourage competition, have been exceeded by the ingenuity of the manufacturers in the opposite direction.

The propriety of longer continuing the anomalous relations which have hitherto existed between the State and the manufacturers of salt, is a question which demands the serious consideration of this Convention. The reasons which originally controlled the action of the State on this subject no longer exist. Experiments which the State has caused to be made during the last century, and the steadily increasing annual production of salt, conclusively prove the capacity of these saline deposits sufficient to supply the whole State with salt.

Therefore, the question which now presents itself is not one in regard to the capacity of these springs, nor the best method of manufacturing the salt (these important matters have been fully settled), but it is, what shall be the future policy of the State in regard to them?

In the further examination of this subject, your Committee would briefly consider the following propositions:

1st. Shall the present policy in regard to these springs be continued?

2d. Shall the State become the sole manufacturer of salt?

3d. Should the salt springs be sold or otherwise disposed of under certain restrictions?

4th. Shall the duty on salt be increased?

1. Shall the present policy in regard to these springs be continued?

The Constitution of 1821 declared that "the Legislature shall never sell or dispose of the salt springs belonging to this State, nor the lands contiguous thereto, which may be necessary or convenient for their use." The only change worthy of note is that the present Constitution permits the Legislature, under the direction of the commissioners of the land-office, to sell the lands contiguous thereto, and which may be necessary and convenient for the use of the salt springs, for the purpose of investing the moneys arising therefrom in other lands alike convenient.

The present act, chapter 346, Laws of 1859, requires the State superintendent to take the care and superintendence of the springs and the manufacture and inspection of salt, to apportion the salt lands among the manufacturers, and to supply them with brine. For the expenses incurred and the services rendered, under the provisions of said act, the manufacturers are required to pay the State one cent per bushel, which is placed to the credit of the general fund. The amount of duty thus collected for the last twenty-one years, over expenses paid by the State, gives an annual average of $15,010. The net revenue for the last seven years gives an average of $52,687.57, exclusive of damages and paid for removing structures from lands sold. As has been shown, the net revenue which the State received for 1866 was $24,557.48; and the net profits of the manufactures during that year were $272,231.07. It will be observed that these calculations are most favorable to the manufacturers. In making up the account, interest at 12½ per cent is allowed them on over three and one-half millions of salt structures, and seven per cent on their active capital; while no allowance of interest whatever has been made to the State for the use and depreciation of its valuable real and personal property employed in the business. From a careful examination of this branch of the subject, your committee conclude that the present quasi-copartnership which in fact exists between the State and the manufacturers of salt, should be dissolved as soon as it can be effected with due regard to the rights of all the parties concerned.

2. Shall the State take possession of the manufactories on the reservation, as it took control of the wells and distributing machinery in 1825, and become the exclusive manufacturer of salt?

It will be seen, by a reference to section 44 of chapter 346 of the Laws of 1859, that the superintendent is authorized to lease the several salt lots on the reservation, the fee of which is owned by the State, for the purpose of manufacturing salt, subject to the same regulations and restrictions as now are or may be hereafter imposed by law; and provides that "no improvements on said lots, except the salt manufactories and their necessary appendages, shall be paid for by the State if any lease hereby authorized shall not be renewed at the expiration of thirty years, or if, before the expiration of said term, the State shall provide by law for vacating such lease." It will also be seen that, by the express conditions contained in the leases by which these lots are held by the manufacturers, the State reserves the right to vacate them at pleasure and pay a reasonable value for the individual salt manufactories and the necessary appendages erected thereon.

There is a seeming plausibility in the proposition that the State should become the exclusive manufacturer of salt in order to supply the people with so indispensable an article at prime cost. It is argued, that as the people are the owners of these salines, and as the State delivers the brine to the several blocks and vats, it will require but one step more—that of boiling and gathering the salt—to complete the whole business. As the State now performs a large and expensive part of the work, it is urged that it might, with the utmost propriety, perform the remaining portion of the process; and that, in this way only, can the people expect to obtain cheap salt. While your committee are compelled to admit the force of these propositions, they are opposed to committing to the State the management of any commercial transaction that can be as well conducted by an individual. The State should only be required to do those things for the people which they cannot advantageously do for themselves.

3. Should the salt springs be sold or otherwise disposed of, under certain restrictions?

The necessity which originally required the State to aid the manufacturers in the production of salt no longer exists. In the incipient stages of the business private capital could not be obtained to furnish the citizens of the State with a full supply of salt from these salines. That section of the State was then new and sparsely settled; transportation slow and expensive. In addition to these disabilities, the business was to a great degree an experiment. But those years of doubt and discomfort have passed away. By the blessing of a kind providence, the forest has been turned into the fruitful field. Poverty has given way to plenty. The railroad car and canal-boat now take the place of the ox cart and flat boat. Private capital now supplies State and national necessities.

Again, instead of this State possessing a monopoly, it has been ascertained that salt is one of the most abundant substances on our globe.

Nearly every State in the Union has a supply within its own borders. Reduce the customs and canal tolls on foreign salt to correspond with other articles of prime necessity, of equal value and the citizens of Syracuse will be able to purchase "Ashton's," "Turk's Island," and "St Ubes" salt at their own doors, cheaper than they now sell their own production.

The prohibition against disposing of the salt springs of the State was intended to preserve to the people the control over them, with power to regulate the manufacture and supply of salt, and to prescribe the rate of duty or rent that the State should receive for furnishing the brine. But by the operation of the act of 1859, and the practice under it, the Legislature has in effect "disposed" of these springs by disposing of the water thereof, and virtually placed the unrestricted control of the entire production in the hands of an incorporated company. Having thus practically obtained all the benefits that could be secured by a title deed together with the guaranty of the State for an abundant supply of salt water of the best quality, it is not difficult to account for their opposition to the sale of these springs and the lands and appurtenances belonging thereto.

A majority of your committee have come to the conclusion, in view of all the circumstances which surround this question, to recommend to this Convention a relaxation of the present constitutional provisions on this subject, and provide that, under certain certain circumstances, and in a definitely prescribed manner, the salt springs may be sold.

It will be observed by reference to the article herewith submitted, that such sale is not mandatory—only permissive; and that it cannot be effected surreptitiously. The care with which the subject is guarded, nearly amounts to a submission of the question to the people. It is referred to the joint judgment and action of the commissioners of the land-office and the Legislature; the former to entertain such proposals as they may deem advantageous to the State, and submit the same to the Legislature for approval or rejection.

The only question that now remains to be considered, is—

4. Shall the duty on salt be increased?

It has been shown that the net profits on the production of 1866 would pay an interest on a capital of nearly five million dollars, which represents the value of the State property on the reservation. The annual interest on this sum, at six per cent, is $296,794.55. At the present rate of duty, "after deducting salaries and expenses," the State received, in 1866, $24,557.48. Aside from this sum, your committee are not aware that the State or the people thereof, received any other valuable consideration. This, then, is the net revenue to the State from this property, which is an interest on the value thereof of less than one-half of one per cent. Should the duty be increased to three cents per bushel, as proposed by the provision herewith submitted, the net revenue to the State would, on the basis of the production and expenditure of last year, amount to $165,571.09, which gives an interest of a fraction less than three and one-third per cent on the foregoing valuation. From one-quarter to one-third of these revenues should, for a limited number of years, be devoted to the sinking of new wells and other improvements, that the manufacturers may be furnished with a full supply of brine during the best and most profitable season of the year for solar evaporation.

The State officers have frequently called the attention of the Legislature to this subject. Governor Morgan in his message to the Legislature in 1861, says: "The State now owns about one thousand acres of land, estimated, together with the appurtenances, to be worth at least two millions of dollars; and the salines themselves are of incalculable value. Yet, as will appear from the statements, they have for a number of years past averaged a net income of only about three-quarters of one per cent on their estimated value. Legislation has unwisely reduced the duties on this important staple. Were the consumption of salt confined exclusively to our own State it would be a matter of less importance whether the revenue from duty was larger or smaller; but when it passes our own borders, as five-sixths of it does, the unreasonably low tariff operates unjustly upon the people of this State. In view of which I recommend that the duty be increased to two cents per bushel."

The Comptroller, in his report to the Legislature in the same year, says: "The salt springs, lands and buildings connected therewith, are a vast estate, worth probably two or three millions of dollars. In a financial view more revenue might well be expected from them."

The committee on the manufacture of salt, of the Assembly of 1850, to which "was referred various petitions asking that the tolls on foreign salt passing on our canals may be reduced," say through their chairman, Hon. Elias W. Leavenworth, that "these springs are a source of revenue to a large amount, and have paid into the treasury of the State nearly four millions of dollars, most of which was applied to the Erie canal debt; the springs would now annually pay into the treasury more than six hundred thousand dollars a year, a sum equal to the interest on a capital of ten millions of dollars. Such is the present value of the salines of Onondaga; and, reasoning from the history of the past, not a single generation will have passed away before their power to produce revenue, and their consequent value will, with ordinary wisdom and prudence, at least be doubled. After the canals, what other property of a value approaching this does this or any other of the States possess? In case of any emergency in the future, from what other sources are such revenues to be derived? What other property can look forward to such a prospective increase in value?"

Here we have the deliberate judgment of the highest State officials as to the value of this property, and its availability as a source of revenue.

Governor Morgan, from a personal examination, estimates the land, together with the appurtenances owned by the State, to be worth at least two millions of dollars, and the salines themselves of incalculable value; that the policy which reduced the duties on this important staple was unwise, and that it operates unjustly upon the people of this State.

General Leavenworth, of Syracuse, than whom no man in the State is better qualified to judge, in 1850 estimated the value of these salines at ten millions of dollars, which, with ordinary wisdom and prudence on the part of the State, could be doubled in a single generation. With the single exception of the canals, the State possesses no property of such immense value. These springs are capable of yielding revenue to supply any emergency. To which your committee beg leave to suggest that such emergency is now upon us. At no former period in its history has the State been more imperatively called upon to avail itself of every legitimate source of revenue than at the present time. The report of the Committee on the Finances of the State augments our present State indebtedness to an amount beyond any former precedent.

The revenues from our canals are appropriated to pay the cost of their construction and enlargement. The salt springs should be made to contribute a reasonable sum toward the payment of the debt incurred by the State in the preservation of the life of the nation, and to that extent relieve the people of the heavy burden of taxation.

Your committee having given that attention to the investigation of this subject which their other duties would permit, ask leave to submit the following provision in regard to these springs, and be discharged from the further consideration of this subject:

"SEC. —. The salt springs and property appurtenant and contiguous thereto, belonging to this State, shall never be sold, leased nor otherwise disposed of, except as hereinafter provided; and so long as they remain the property of the State, the Legislature shall by law impose upon all salt manufactured therefrom a rent or duty of not less than three cents per bushel. Provided, however, that such springs and property may be sold by and under the direction of the commissioners of the land-office, and in pursuance of a special act of the Legislature approving and allowing such sale.

JAMES A. BELL,
CHARLES E. PARKER.

I concur and recommend a removal of the present constitutional restriction and the sale of the springs and property connected therewith, as provided in this report.

WM. H. HOUSTON.

The evidence before the committee, and my own reflections upon the subject, has led me to the conclusion that the best thing the committee can do is to recommend to the Convention to remove the constitutional restraint against the sale or other disposition of the springs by the Legislature.

JOHN P. ROLFE.

Mr. BELL—I am informed that two minority reports are to be made, one from the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], and the other from Mr. McDonald. Mr. Comstock is here and will himself state whether he is prepared to make his this evening or not. Mr. McDonald, I understand, asks a few days in which to prepare his report.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I desire to submit a report embracing the views of the majority of the Committee on the Salt Springs, upon the principal questions discussed in the report of the chairman. I am not able to submit it to-night in consequence of the absence of several members of the committee; and therefore I ask leave to submit it to-morrow or next day.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. ALVORD—I would like to ask the Chairman of the Salt Committee, who has made this minority report, whether he has included in it the printed testimony taken?

Mr. BELL—That was not the understanding, as I understood the announcement of the President.

The PRESIDENT—It will be ordered printed under the rule.

Mr. McDONALD—I have the misfortune to disagree in both the reports in some particulars, and therefore I ask leave to present a minority report, which I will have prepared, and will present by Wednesday morning. I had supposed that I would be able to sign one or the other of these reports until I heard them read.

The PRESIDENT—No objection being made the gentleman's report will be received under the proper head when he is prepared to submit it.

The Convention again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole upon the report of the Standing Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, of Cayuga, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the motion of Mr. Hale to postpone the consideration of the amendment offered by Mr. Spencer.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Hale to postpone, and it was declared carried.

Mr. SMITH—What is the amendment now pending?

The CHAIRMAN—There is no amendment now pending. Section 6 is now under consideration, and the question is, are there any, other amendments to be proposed to it?

Mr. SPENCER—I move that the consideration of the entire section be postponed for the present.

The CHAIRMAN—The only postponement which can be made in Committee of the Whole is to exchange the consideration of one section for the consideration of another.

Mr. SPENCER—Then I move that the committee pass by the further consideration of section 6 for the present.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. SPENCER, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY read the seventh section as follows:

SEC. 7. The Legislature shall have the same power to alter and regulate the jurisdiction and proceedings in law and equity as they have heretofore possessed.

No objection being offered to the section, the SECRETARY announced the eighth section.

Mr. HALE—I move that the eighth section be passed over and that we consider the ninth section.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Hale, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY then read the ninth section as follows:

SEC. 9. No judge, either of the court of appeals or of the supreme court, shall sit in review of his own decision.

Mr. RUMSEY—I move to strike out of the section the words "or of the supreme court." It seems to me that it is eminently proper that the judge of the court of appeals should not be permitted to review his own decision. But it has always been the practice in this State, and it is right, in my judgment, that a judge who at nisi prius makes a decision without due consideration, and who does not by doing so necessarily imbibe any prejudice for or against the opinion he may pronounce, should have the privilege of reviewing that decision in general term. It has always been so, and in my judgment it should continue to be so.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I trust no portion of that section will be stricken out. One of the very evils now to be cured is the sitting of a judge in the general term to review the decisions he has made at circuit or special term. The consequence is that, having already made up his mind, he adheres to his opinion, and there are in truth but two other judges sitting with them, and with two judges differing in opinion he controls the result. Under the system proposed there will be no necessity at all for the judge of the supreme court ever sitting in review of his own decision, for there will be in every district four judges all the time, none being required at any time to serve in the court of appeals. So they will always be able to constitute a general term of three judges without including in the number of those who sit, the judge who tried the case at circuit. I believe a very great good will be accomplished by enabling a suitor to review a decision made at the circuit before three other judges who are in no way committed in regard to the question.

Mr. RUMSEY—Will the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] tell me how he proposes to pass upon a motion for a new trial upon the evidence; whether he would suffer it to be made before a judge before whom the case was tried?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—In the first instance, the proposed practice would be to make the motion before the same judge upon the minutes, and if the party desires it, then to appeal from his decision to the general term, where the judge who had already denied a new trial should not sit in review of his own decision.

Mr. BARKER—I move to add after the word "in," in the second line, the words "general term." There is some doubt as to what may be the meaning of sitting in review, and that will leave it so that sitting at general term, if an appeal is called for, he may sit in review of his own decision upon the minutes of his own court or in special term.

Mr. HALE—I would suggest to the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] whether his amendment should not apply after the words "supreme court."

Mr. BARKER—I will change it at the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—If this amendment is adopted it might happen that one of the judges who decided the case at the general term, and who might afterward be elected to the court of appeals, would be at liberty again to sit in review of his own decision. That is one of the evils, I think, we should guard against. I would not allow a judge in any court in the State to sit in review of his own decision.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Barker, and it was declared carried.

Mr. SMITH—I move a reconsideration of the last vote. I do not desire to discuss this subject to-night, not feeling able to do so. But it seems to me that the last vote has been passed rather hastily, and without consideration by the committee. If there is any one particular in which a change is demanded, it is, it seems to me, in prohibiting the judges from sitting in review of their own decisions. It has been conceded by all, so far as I understand the matter, in the discussion hitherto, that one of the existing evils to be remedied, is the permitting of judges to sit in review of their own decisions. For, however honest men may be, they will be influenced more or less by pride of opinion; they will incline to adhere to their first positions. If we do not remedy this evil, we shall make but very little progress toward the reform that has been called for, and which is absolutely needed. I hope gentlemen will consider carefully before they reject this proposition which has been presented by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair would suggest that the vote which the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] moved to reconsider, was the vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker].

Mr. SMITH—It appears that I was mistaken in the amendment which was adopted, my attention having been diverted, but I will suggest to the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] that I think he might accomplish his object by saying that the judge should not sit on appeal in review of his own decision. We do not know that there will be any general term. We have not adopted any thing of that kind. I suppose the idea is that the judge shall not sit in review of his own decision on appeal. A motion for a new trial is a motion; it is not properly an appeal.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I hope that this matter may be considered and carefully examined before a vote shall be taken upon it. It seems to me the object of the amendment is that no judge shall sit in any court in review of any decision that he has previously made. The object the committee had in view was to secure judges who are entirely uncommitted upon the legal question before them. We should exclude a judge of the court of appeals from sitting upon a case he has once decided as judge of the supreme court. The principle is and should be that the party appealing or moving for a new trial should be entitled to a hearing before a new court, new men, judges entirely uncommitted upon the question. If it happens, as it very often will happen, that a judge has decided a case as referee, and is afterward elevated to the supreme court, he should not be permitted to be one of the three judges to sit on a review of that case. It is not fair to the party; it is not a new hearing. And the same principle should apply in the court of appeals. The amendment proposed by my friend from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] would allow judges to sit in both the cases I have supposed.

Mr. BARKER—Not at all.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—If it does not I am satisfied with the amendment. If the gentleman will express his amendment in such a way that a judge at special term may review his own decision I will be satisfied.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—Does the gentleman mean to include that class of cases where judges can grant new trials upon their own minutes immediately after the trial of cases before them?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—No, I do not.

Mr. BARKER—The prohibition in my amendment is limited; no judge either of the court of appeals or of the supreme court in general term, shall sit in review of his own decision.

Mr. WAKEMAN—I submit the amendment does not go quite far enough. Let us see what a judge may do. A case or bill of exceptions is made, upon which a motion for a new trial may be noticed before a special term. The judge who tried the case may be the judge who held the circuit. There is no appeal, but he is sitting in direct review of the bill of exceptions that has been settled by him. Now, it is said that a party may not move before him. But the other party may, if he is disposed to, and in that case the judge will be bound to review his own decision. I would allow the circuit judge to review any decision he made on a trial where a motion is made for a new trial on his minutes. Sometimes, when such a motion is made, it is based upon the decision or ruling of the judge; and when the judge comes to review the authorities he may be disposed to think he has made a mistake; and if the party who desires a new trial sees fit to move before the judge who tried the cause, he should have that privilege, and the judge should have the privilege of reviewing any ruling he has made during the trial, when a motion is made for a new trial on his minutes. But where a case or bill of exceptions is made up deliberately, and gets to special term, I think the principle should be adopted that the judge should not be permitted to review his decision on a bill of exceptions. I think we should allow him to review his decision and ruling on the trial; that is fair enough. In that case there is no advantage taken, because the party can move or not, as he chooses.

Mr. RUMSEY—What would the gentleman do in a case where the judge, doubting the correct rule of law in the matter, orders a judgment for one or the other of the parties, and sends it to the general term? Is there any reason why that judge should not review that decision? Is a judge unsafe to be trusted to review the decisions he has made at nisi prius? I have never heard of one in my life, whom I was not willing to trust with the same case afterward. The evil to be guarded against is that of sending justices to the supreme court or court of appeals after they have sat at general term, and coolly and deliberately examined a case and written an opinion upon it. I really can see no reason why we should overturn a rule that has existed as long as the common law has existed of allowing judges to review their decisions at nisi prius.

Mr. WAKEMAN—I can see no reason why a judge under such circumstances might not review his own decision, because he has made no decision in point of fact, except a mere ruling for the purposes of the case. Of course no wrong would grow out of that.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—That is no decision at all.

Mr. WAKEMAN—We have to fix some rule in the Constitution, and say how far it applies. Otherwise we had better leave it to the Legislature to fix it in particular cases.

Mr. HALE—I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] will not be reconsidered, and that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] will not prevail. The amendment of the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] carries out the idea which I think the committee held, that at general term judges should not be allowed to sit in review of their own decisions. It will be seen that there is no qualification as to what decisions they are prohibited from reviewing. The prohibition includes decisions made as referee as well as a court. The suggestions made by the gentleman from Genesee [Mr. Wakeman], that the judge should not be allowed to review his own decision at special term, it seems to me, has no force in it. An application for a new trial, if made to a single judge, should often be made to the judge who tried the cause, particularly in such cases as the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] mentions, where the judge himself is in doubt as to the propriety of his ruling. Whatever may be his decision upon the application, an appeal will lie to the general term, and then he will be prohibited from taking part in the review of his decision upon the original application.

Mr. MORRIS—This section, as it now stands, meets most cordially with my approval. I think it will meet with the approval of others besides those who are members of the bar. For one, I speak feelingly on the subject; for a case in which I was deeply interested once was decided absurdly by the referee, and that decision was confirmed by the same individual when he was elevated to a seat upon the bench. Having the same case before the same individual is, in fact, no new trial. The opinion is known before the case is heard the second time. I think the wishes of the community generally would be carried out by leaving the section as it now stands.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope that the motion to reconsider will not prevail, because I think the section as amended by the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] places exactly a proper restriction upon the right of the judge to review his own decision. It is very well known to all lawyers that the decision of a referee can only be reviewed, and is only reviewed at general term. It therefore will reach that class of cases. So the decision of a judge at the trial on special term without a jury is only reviewable at the general term. It will therefore reach that difficulty. But it is agreed that a judge ought to have the right and power to hear a motion for a new trial upon his own minutes and where the matter has not yet reached the general term. The gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] supposes a case where a judge has merely made a pro forma decision without really having a mind upon it, and for the sake of allowing an appeal in the case. Now, I regard that as a decision to be reviewed, The record shows it to be a decision of the judge; and you cannot get behind the record. Nevertheless, I do not see any public evil whatever in requiring that the very case to which he refers shall be examined and decided by a class of judges to whom the case is unknown. I think the section will about reach the evil which has been so much complained of, if adopted as amended by the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker].

The question was put on the motion to reconsider, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Rumsey.

Mr. BARKER—I rise simply to make a suggestion to the committee; whether they have duly considered the practice that prevails in the court and which must necessarily prevail hereafter to a great extent in the consideration of a great many important cases? As it is, the judge at circuit has an important case on trial before him; important questions of law are raised; he makes a decision pro forma and goes on with the trial, and at the request of parties orders the case to be heard upon case or bill of exceptions at the general term in the first instance. Now, this constitutional prohibition prohibits the judge from giving the case a full, careful and satisfactory examination and the cause may pass into the court of appeals without an opportunity being afforded the judge who tried the cause to examine the same. I think that opportunity should be retained. As has been stated it is the rule that a judge is competent to set in review of his own decision in the common law court.

Mr. PRINDLE—Is it not to be presumed that the other judges are just as capable of giving that question a fair examination?

Mr. BARKER—Undoubtedly; but I cannot see how the judge who sits in circuit is disqualified.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Rumsey, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COMSTOCK — I move to strike out, at the close of the section, the words "of his own decision," and insert, in lieu thereof, the words "in which he formerly participated;" so that the section will read, "no judge, either of the court of appeals or of the supreme court, in general term, shall sit in review of the decision in which he formerly participated." It is to reach this point: the section as it is now framed would authorize a judge who had dissented in the supreme court, and who had given a minority opinion, afterward sitting in the court of appeals, to take part in the judgment of that tribunal, which he ought not to do. The object of this restriction is to have an impartial ruling of four judges who have not participated at all in the former decision.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

Mr. KRUM—I move to strike out the word "either," in the first line. I think the amendment, "at general term," renders the striking out of the word "either" necessary.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Krum, and it was declared carried.

Mr. HALE—I move that the committee proceed to the consideration of section 12, omitting sections 8, 10 and 11. The provisions of sections 10 and 11 depend, in a great measure, upon what provisions shall be adopted in sections 6 and 8. Therefore, it is proper they should be postponed and considered afterward.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Hale, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY read the twelfth section, as follows:

SEC. 12. The judges of the court of appeals, and the justices of the supreme court, shall not hold any other office or public trust. All votes for either of them for any elective office (except that of justice of the supreme court or judge of the court of appeals) given by the Legislature or the people, shall be void. They shall not exercise any power of appointment to public office, except as is herein specifically provided.

Mr. BICKFORD—I move to strike out in the second line the words, "or public trust." I don't know what may be meant by a public trust. It strikes me there may be some very important trusts which may be called public trusts. The question was raised as to whether the position of delegate to this Convention was an office, and secondly, if it was not an office, whether it was a public trust. And so there may be many other cases where there are public trusts which it may be perfectly proper for the judges to hold. For instance, the trustees of some institution or college, or an institution in which the State takes an interest, or which is supported by the State in whole or in part. It appears to me we had better strike out the words "or public trust."

Mr. MORRIS—I propose to insert the word "public" before the word "office," in the second line, provided the amendment offered shall prevail.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Morris, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred and was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Bickford, and it was declared lost.

Mr. KRUM—It seems to me that it is almost impossible to go on with the perfection of the report of this committee, after having passed the sections which we have passed; the report is so intimately blended with all its sections that it seems to be difficult to take—

The CHAIRMAN— The Chair will state to the gentleman from Schoharie [Mr. Krum], and to the committee, that the committee will return to the consideration of the eighth section, after having disposed of the twelfth section.

Mr. KRUM—I was intending to make a motion, in view of those facts, that the commit-the rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Krum, and it was declared lost.

Mr. SMITH—I move that we postpone this section and proceed to the consideration of section 14. This is a part of the scheme of the supreme court, and there are several plans before the committee. Before we can act intelligently upon them we ought to have time to consider them in connection. The fourteenth section is upon another matter which does not relate to the plan of the supreme court.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Smith, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read section 14 as follows:

SEC. 14. Judges of the court of appeals and justices of the supreme court may be removed by concurrent resolution of both houses of the Legislature, if two-thirds of all the members elected to the Assembly and a majority of all the members elected to the Senate concur therein. All judicial officers, except those mentioned in this section, and except justices of the peace and judges and justices of inferior courts, not of record, may be removed by the Senate on the recommendation of the Governor. But no removal shall be made by virtue of this section unless the cause thereof be entered on the journals, nor unless the party complained of shall have been served with a copy of the complaint against him and shall have had an opportunity of being heard in his defense. On the question of removal, the ayes and noes shall be entered on the journal.

There being no amendment offered to the fourteenth section, the SECRETARY proceeded to read the fifteenth section as follows:

SEC. 15. There shall be in the city and county of New York the superior court of the city of New York and the court of common pleas of said city and county. And there shall be in the city of Buffalo the superior court of said city. The said courts shall severally have the jurisdiction they now severally possess, and such other original and appellate civil and criminal jurisdiction as may be conferred by law. There shall be five judges of the superior court of the city and county of New York; five judges of the court of common pleas of the said city and county of New York, and three judges of the superior court of the city of Buffalo. The judges of said courts, respectively, shall designate one of their number as chief justice, who shall act as such as long as he continues in office. Vacancies in said courts shall be filled by election by the electors of said cities, respectively, at the general election next after the vacancy shall occur. And until such general election in the same manner as vacancies in the office of justice of the supreme court as is hereinbefore provided.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I should like to hear some reason assigned by gentlemen who have this article in charge, why exception should be made in regard to the county of New York or the county of Erie. It seems to me that the full benefit of an uniform judiciary system might be extended to those counties as well as to other counties of the State. The plan of special courts, so far as New York is concerned, has been adopted since the Constitution of 1846. At that period, I know, in the minds of many who were called upon to pass upon the subject, the discrepancy was objectionable.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair must remind the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] that there is no question before the committee.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Then to bring myself in order I move that the section be stricken out, although I shall not press the motion unless sustained by others. I think, sir, in the matter of judicial law and constitutional enactment uniformity should be sought after. There may be satisfactory reasons adduced why such exceptions should exist. I do not immediately represent either of these counties, although I confess to a considerable degree of familiarity with one of them, and were I a representative to-day from the city of New York I should feel that by sanctioning in this article, exceptions of this kind, I should give my consent to that system of class legislation which has been pursued toward that city, and of which they have so much complained. There is a similar rule adopted with regard to the formation of boards of supervisors. I think this body should make no exceptions of the kind. There may be a little more business—indeed there is a great deal more business concentrated in the city of New York. I was told the other day by a leading practitioner that they had almost the whole important business of the Union thrown incipiently upon them. But the principles of law must be general and uniform. Justice in New York should be justice in Onondaga. Justice in New York certainly should be justice in Kings on the other side of the East river, or in Westchester, which is reached by a bridge only a hundred feet long. If the gentlemen, as I said, who thoroughly understand this matter will show good cause why this anomaly should be continued I will accede of course. I wish to defer generally to those who are or should be best instructed on the subject, and I now withdraw my motion unless somebody else takes a similar view and desires to press the point I have raised.

Mr. ALVORD—It strikes me that it is rather novel to make these local courts constitutional courts. They have been created by statute. The time may come when it may be necessary to create local courts in other counties of this State; and the question is, if you make these constitutional courts, whether you do not by implication say to the Legislature that they cannot extend that kind of court to any other portion of the State except to Erie and New York. Under these circumstances I move to strike out the section.

Mr. COOKE—I move the following amendment to the section: to strike out all after the words, "There shall be," in the first line, and to insert, "such courts of limited jurisdiction in cities as the Legislature shall prescribe."

The CHAIRMAN—The motion to strike out will not be maintained if there be a motion to amend.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I should regret to have that question disposed of this evening, because I believe there are not upon the floor of the Convention at this time any of the delegates from New York city, with one or two exceptions at least. It is a very grave question whether these courts should or should not be fixed in the Constitution. They are courts of the very highest importance, scarcely second in importance to the supreme court, and it is a very serious question whether they should be subjected to the will of the Legislature; so that if the judges happen to be unpopular, or possibly obnoxious to the partisan prejudices of the hour, their offices may be abolished by the repeal of the laws constituting and organizing the courts, thus infusing uncertainty and change into the jurisprudence of that great city. The question is an exceedingly grave one in every aspect, and I should regret to see it disposed of without a fuller attendance of this Convention.

Mr. ALVORD—I think it is evident from the continued absence of seven gentlemen belonging to these courts that are now attempted to be constitutionalized, and particularly from their absence during the discussion on this question of the judiciary, that they have made up their minds that they care but little about it, and certainly, so far as we are concerned, we should not attempt to constitutionalize that which is now but a creature of legislative action, unless we go in the direction indicated by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke]. If the city of New York and the city of Buffalo—represented here, the one by three judges of the superior court, the other by three judges of the superior court and one of the court of common pleas—do not see fit to attend to their duties here, we have the right to say, so far as they are concerned, whether the local courts shall be constitutionalized at all. This general provision will authorize other counties of this State, whenever they shall have a population sufficient for that purpose, to have similar courts in them.

Mr. COMSTOCK—As to the judges of the superior court of Buffalo—for that court is involved in this proposition—one of them I know has been quite sick, which has prevented his attendance here since the September session, and the others have been engaged in attending a general term of their court in the city of Buffalo, and I think are now so engaged. I believe, also, some of the judges of the superior court of the city of New York, who are delegates upon this floor, are similarly engaged. Perhaps the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] can tell whether that is so or not. He says that is so. I have no doubt that they would desire to attend the Convention and participate in the discussion of this very important subject. This is an evening in the week when it has been very rare indeed to have a quorum to discuss any question. I think, above all other questions, such a one as this should not be disposed of without a larger attendance.

Mr. BARKER—I hope the committee will not dispose of this question on the ground of the absence of the gentlemen who compose the superior court of Buffalo. One of the members from that city, we all know, has been ill for many weeks, and when in health is constantly in his seat, in the intelligent discharge of his duties. The others are, I am informed, engaged in the discharge of their judicial duties, and necessarily absent. I am satisfied, if they were here, they would not participate in this discussion, whether the court of which they are judges should be constitutionalized or not. They would refer it to the wisdom of this committee and the Convention, and I think the reflections of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] are quite unbecoming.

Mr. FERRY—It seems to me that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] is unnecessary. In the eighteenth section provision has been made in this wise "Inferior local courts, of civil and criminal jurisdiction may be established by the Legislature in cities, and such courts, except for the cities of New York, Brooklyn and Buffalo, shall have an uniform organization and jurisdiction in such cities." This clearly gives the right to establish inferior local courts, and meets the objection suggested by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] that such legislative action as has heretofore been resorted to cannot be adopted hereafter in regard to this matter. It seems that the committee have simply presented the organization of these particular courts in these cities; do not provide by constitutional enactment that there shall be no others, but leave that question open to be regulated as the Legislature shall see fit.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move that the consideration of section 16 be postponed for the present, and that we proceed to the consideration of section 17.

The question was put upon the motion of Mr. E. A. Brown, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY then read section 17 as follows:

SEC. 17. All the judges and justices of the courts of record, hereinbefore mentioned in this article, shall receive at stated times for their services, a compensation to be fixed by law, which shall not be diminished during their respective terms of office.

Mr. GRAVES—I move to amend that section by adding after the word "diminished," the words "or increased."

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope that motion will not prevail. It has led to a great deal of difficulty and a great deal of embarrassment and trouble under the existing Constitution; because it has compelled judges of the same grade —

Mr. RUMSEY—Will the gentleman allow me to state that in the report of the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature there was a provision of that kind applicable to all officers except the judiciary, and that has been adopted. It leaves the Legislature at liberty to alter their salaries.

Mr. COMSTOCK—And that is a further reason why I hope the motion of the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] will not prevail. I was about to say that the words which he proposes to insert into this provision have occasioned a great deal of injustice and a great deal of embarrassment, because judges of the supreme court and of the court of appeals of equal grade, equal ability and equal industry have been compelled to sit side by side, year after year, at unequal rates of compensation. This may be illustrated by what has taken place in the history of the present system. In the year 1857 I think it was, it came to be seen that judicial compensation was inadequate, that it was not enough to enable the judges to maintain their families; and accordingly the Legislature proceeded to raise the compensation from $2,500 to $3,500. Now, the Constitution of 1846 read just as the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] desires this to read, "which shall not be diminished or increased." In consequence of that provision, the act of the Legislature could not take effect in favor of judges sitting on the bench. It could only apply to judges elected or appointed after the act of the Legislature was passed, and the result was, that for six years judges sat upon the bench, side by side, at unequal salaries. The Legislature passed the law because they were entirely convinced that judicial salaries were inadequate, yet it was not in their power to increase the compensation of judges who had been elected only the year or the day before, and they were obliged to abdicate their offices, or else take the compensation which had been provided by law. They could not receive the measure of payment which the Legislature provided for future judges, and which, it was universally admitted, it was just and proper that they should receive. There never was any such provision in any Constitution of this State until the year 1846, and I am very sure it was inserted without due consideration of its effect. Under all the Constitutions of the State, existing before that of 1846, the salaries of the judges were raised, from time to time, according to the public conviction of what they ought to be—salaries of existing judges, I mean, and not of future judges. As the cost of living increased, and as circumstances required, in the public estimation, in the estimation of the law-making power, the law was changed accordingly, and it took effect upon the bench. I hope this amendment may not be incorporated into this Constitution.

Mr. MORRIS—I for one hope that this amendment will not prevail. I think we pay our judges, all of them, far too little. Certainly, if we expect the highest talent which the bar can afford, we must be willing to pay for it; and if we find, from experience, that the salaries given to those judges do not procure the highest talent, I for one think the Legislature should be empowered to increase the compensation until the result is attained.

Mr. GRAVES—I am unwilling to stand upon this floor and be understood as desiring that any public officer should discharge his highly responsible duties without an adequate compensation. While I am desirous that every judge upon the bench, both in the court of appeals and in the supreme court, should receive a fair equivalent for his services, I am not prepared to accede to the position taken by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], who states that there may be manifest injustice from the change of the times in continuing an incumbent at the salary fixed when his services commenced. The gentleman, of course, will readily see that there may be a change in the times so as to justify the diminution of the salary which is fixed for the judge at the commencement of his term; but you provide in this section against this equitable arrangement or this equitable application of the change of the times, so as to reduce his salary to what it ought to be. If his salary is fixed at this time at $3,500 or $4,500, with the exorbitant prices he has to pay for all the necessaries as well as the luxuries of life, if those times change so as to get back again to what they were before the war commenced, I submit whether it is just that you should pay that judge the sum of $4,500 for sitting on the bench, when the articles which it is necessary for him to purchase for his support do not require half the sum that they did at the time when he received his appointment. If you strike out of this section the word "diminished," you will then certainly present this section to the consideration of this Convention with some little degree of fairness; but you desire to retain in this section the power not to reduce or diminish his salary during his term, but to have the power to increase it, let the circumstances be what they may. It is said by the gentleman that the judge upon the bench can hardly afford to sit there and discharge his duty for the salary which was fixed at the time when he entered upon the discharge of the duties. I ask the gentleman if he has ever known in the State of New York a single instance where the judge resigned because his salary was an inadequate compensation? I do not know any. If the gentleman does he will remind me of it. I do not know of one instance where the judge, either of the court of appeals or of the supreme court, has resigned his place because there was a change of the times, and because he was compelled to pay a much larger price for the necessaries of life in proportion to the salary which he has received. This desire to add to the salary, to the fees, to the amount which the officer received at the time when he entered his office, is a growing propensity with all the officers in the community. It is not confined alone to the judges. It is not confined alone to some particular officer; but every body, now-a-days, seems to have a very strong propensity, whenever he gets into either a ministerial, an executive or a judicial office, if in his judgment the compensation is not an adequate reward for his services, to make an application to the power authorized to increase the salary and have that salary or fee increased. I desire that this propensity should be stopped, that this desire, this habit, this apparent zeal of every body who holds a public position should be stopped by some enactment either in this body or by the Legislature. I protest against leaving this matter in such a condition. When a judge goes upon the bench with a salary of $3,500 or $4,500, let him be satisfied. I do not care what you fix the sum at, the very next winter succeeding his appointment he makes application through his friends to the Legislature to increase his salary. Why? Because he says he cannot live by it. Did not he know what the salary was when he took the office? Did he not know precisely what he was to get? If he did know it, certainly he ought not to go to the Legislature asking that his salary should be increased. If he cannot discharge his duties for the price that he receives let him resign. There are enough ready to discharge those duties, perhaps as competent as he is. I protest against this practice of allowing public officers in any position to appeal to the Legislature the very moment they get into office for an increased compensation.

Mr. FERRY—I am entirely opposed to the amendment, as must be other members of this Convention who entertain views similar to my own as to the duties of these officers. It is already understood that my idea is that the remedy for the evils in our present judiciary system is to be found in open courts; and although this Convention may not be now ready to adopt that plan, I understand that there will be no objection to leaving the matter in such a position that the Legislature may if it shall see fit hereafter compel the judges to hold their courts open. Now, I do not want any obstacle in the form of a constitutional provision in the way of the Legislature when it shall see fit to do that. I have already stated here that when I had the honor to occupy a seat in the Legislature I made an attempt to compel the court of appeals to hold open court, and the main objection to it, as I understood from the judges themselves, was that their compensation was inadequate; and no one could gainsay that objection nor the argument based upon it. Now, in contemplation of this change, and hoping that it may be made, I desire that this subject of compensation shall be left open, but as the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] says, I think it would be better to strike out the prohibition against lessening salaries. Probably no one in this hall has any idea that the time will ever come when there will be an attempt to lessen; and the entire provision in regard to compensation might better be left out, in my judgment, leaving the subject entirely with the Legislature. The shorter we can make this instrument the better will we please ourselves and the people.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I wish to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves]. This question, in my judgment, is entirely exempt from one difficulty. There is not the slightest danger that the people or their Legislature will ever give too much compensation to the judges of the courts which are named in this section. This is the last danger which we have any reason to apprehend. Now, the gentleman from Herkimer asks if the judges do not know, when they are elected, what their salary—their compensation, is to be. Sir, they know what the existing law is at the time, but they do not know whether that salary will or will not be an adequate salary at some future time during their term of office. We propose here to elect judges for fourteen years if not for life. How can any man tell whether that which is adequate to the support of himself and his family to-day, will be so five years or fourteen years hence? And yet if you adopt this provision in the Constitution, it remains unchangeable and irrepealable until the next revision of the Constitution. In the mean time the judge and his family may starve, but you cannot change the fundamental law. You may drive the judge into resignation and you may be unable to get another one to sit in his place, but you cannot change the compensation attached to the office until you change the Constitution. I am asked by my friend from Herkimer whether I have ever known of any judge resigning because his salary was inadequate. I have not, sir. I know very well that a judge who has been long upon the bench and who has no professional practice to fall back upon, will retain his office as long as its compensation will enable him to keep soul and body together; but I ask if that is any reason why the people should not be just when they know and the Legislature knows what justice is. If the gentleman from Herkimer had ever reflected upon this matter seriously he would have understood better than he seems to understand, the reason of the provision that the salary of the judge should not be diminished. I admit, sir, that I would much rather have this provision stricken out of the Constitution than accept his proposition; but there is a reason of statesmanship for the provision that the judicial salary shall not be diminished. What is that reason? It is, that if you place the salaries of your judges at the mercy of the Legislature, you have then put one department of your government, which above all others ought to be perfectly independent, at the mercy of another. That is the reason why, in framing fundamental laws, we provide for the independence of the judiciary, by preventing the Legislature, from decreasing their salaries or taking them wholly away. We insert that provision not for the sake of the judge, but for the sake of preserving the various departments of government independent of one another. But, sir, there is now a special reason why a provision of the kind here proposed should not be incorporated in the Constitution. We live at a time and in a country where the currency and values are constantly changing from year to year, from month to month, and almost from day to day. Who can say to-day what the standard of value will be six months or one year hence? You provide to-day that the salary of your judge shall be $10,000 or $5,000; but can any one say how far that will go in the support of a judge and his family one year hence, or ten years hence, or fourteen years hence? It is utterly impossible to say now what will be the standard of value at any particular time hereafter. I think that this provision, prohibiting the increase of the salaries of the judges, would be the most mischievous provision which, by any possible ingenuity, could be inserted in the Constitution, and I hope it will not prevail.

Mr. HAND—I move that this section be stricken out; that there be no provision on the subject; and the gentleman's argument has convinced me of the propriety of this motion. We will suppose that when we adopt this Constitution, we fix the salary of the judge at $8,000. In these times of high prices this will be a reasonable salary, but, in the fluctuations of our currency, paper money may be abandoned and nominal values be very low, and it comes to pass that what is now worth five dollars will be worth only one dollar. Then the judge will have a salary equal to $40,000 of our present currency. That change is as likely to take place as any other. I say, therefore, that the statement of the gentleman, that we know nothing now about how values may range fourteen years hence, is an argument in favor of leaving this whole subject open, because we should not fix a salary that may not be diminished for the same reason that we should not fix one that cannot be increased. I think it is more probable that, in the fluctuations of values, the nominal value of commodities will be very much lower than it is now, than that it will be higher. If any change takes place at all, it is probable that the nominal value of the necessaries of life—those things which go to constitute the expenditures of a judge in the maintenance of his family—will be very much lower than they are now, so that the salary which we might fix now, as simply adequate, would at some future time be enormous. I move, therefore, that this provision be stricken out, and that the whole matter be left to the Legislature.

The CHAIRMAN—The question of striking out will be entertained after amendments.

Mr. HALE—I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Broome [Mr. Hand], and also in reply to the gentleman from Otsego [Mr. Ferry], as to the propriety of striking out this section. As has been well remarked by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], the reason for the insertion of this provision is a reason of statesmanship. The three departments of government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial — should be distinct and independent. And above all things, the judiciary should be made independent; and the proposition of the gentleman from Broome [Mr. Hand] would put the judiciary, so far as their pay is concerned, entirely at the mercy of the Legislature. The Legislature would not have the power to remove the judges, but it would have power to designate a particular judge and say to him, or to say to all the judges, "You shall have no salary henceforth: you shall work without pay." Now, in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves], I would say that prior to the Constitution of 1846, so far as I can ascertain by a hasty examination of the annotated Constitutions before me, there never was any such provision inserted in the Constitution of any State; but I find that since 1846 several States have, in imitation of our Constitution, adopted in their Constitutions a provision that the salaries of the judges should not be increased nor diminished. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the Constitution of Massachusetts. I think that Constitution has not been amended in any substantial respect since the beginning of the history of that Commonwealth. The provision in that Constitution is that "permanent and honorable salaries shall also be established by law for the justices of the supreme judicial court." They do not go further and say that the salaries shall not be increased; but on the other hand, the statesmen who framed that Constitution thought that it was necessary to insert this provision in order to secure the respectability of the bench and to secure the judges against the interference of the Legislature: "If it shall be found that any of the salaries aforesaid, so established, are insufficient, they shall from time to time be enlarged, as the general court shall judge proper." Now, it seems to me that if we are to make any provision in regard to the increase of the salaries of the judges, it should be one enjoining upon the Legislature the duty of increasing their salaries if circumstances show that the amount fixed at the beginning of their terms are inadequate. Such was the conclusion to which the statesmen of Massachusetts came upon the framing of their Constitution. I also find provision that the salaries of judges shall not be diminished, but no provision against their being increased in the Constitutions of Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Mississippi—in every one of the old Constitutions made prior to 1846, the contents of which are stated in the annotated Constitutions. I think, therefore, upon authority as well as upon principle, we should guard the courts by a constitutional provision, against legislative interference in the way of lessening or taking away the salaries of the judges, and that we should not take any step which would prohibit the Legislature from making the salaries of judges adequate, if circumstances should prove them not to be so.

Mr. HAND—I do not see that the gentleman has answered my argument. He wants the judiciary entirely independent of the Legislature—so that they shall not be the subjects of legislative action at all. If that means any thing it means, that if the Legislature have power to enact any thing whatever, in regard to the judges, then the judges are dependent upon the Legislature. Now, if the salaries of the judges are inadequate, as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] seems to think, and a poor judge should be barely able to keep soul and body together, or should find himself and his family reduced to starvation—I have never seen any judges of that kind myself [laughter]—but suppose such a case should arise—the gentleman proposes that the Legislature shall be called in to rescue the judge and his family from starvation, by increasing his salary. Now it seems to me that the same difficulty arises in such a case which he is so anxious to avoid—the judge is made dependent upon the Legislature for an increase of salary. There has been a great deal said by the lawyers upon this floor about the independence of the judiciary. I am not a lawyer myself—that is, not a technical lawyer—and I thank God for it [laughter], for they have shown in this body a want of appreciation of the real difficulties in our present judiciary, a want of fixed principles, a want of unity, a want of clearness in their discussions upon this question not only in the general principles involved, but in all the details in which they seem entirely afloat, agreeing in nothing, in a manner which is astonishing. If they have not done so, then I am no judge in this matter. [Laughter.] Now, sir, this talk about the independence of the judiciary seems to me perfect humbug—the idea that a branch of our government that is more important than any other, upon which every man's interests, his life, his reputation, his liberty, may at any time depend, should be elevated above the people, so that no influence of the electors or of their representatives can by any possibility reach them—it seems to me is extremely absurd. Now, I am tired of hearing that sort of thing, and I mean to say more on that subject by and by. But the gentleman has answered his own argument; because, although he insists that the judges should be independent of the Legislature, yet whenever they are likely to starve, the only way to get them out of this difficulty is to come back to this same Legislature for relief. I am opposed to putting the judges above the influence of the people, above the influence of the Legislature, above every influence or power under heaven. Their relation to the people and to the Legislature should be like that of any other important public officer, and I hope I will never live to see any branch of our government put in that position.

Mr. GRAVES—It seems to me that in the argument which is often heard from gentlemen who are in favor of retaining this section they entirely lose sight of the practical question which should control the deliberations of this Convention upon this matter. The justices or judges who enter upon the discharge of their duties are the party upon one side, and the people are the party upon the other. The judges enter into a contract to perform certain duties at a stipulated price; the people agree with them that if they will assume such a position and discharge the duties thereof, they will pay them a certain sum of money. The judges accept, or offer to enter upon the discharge of their duties. But immediately after they have thus entered upon the performance of their duties, unlike men who are parties to any other contract, they pretend that they have agreed to do this service for a sum less than what it is worth, and less than what they can afford to do it for under the circumstances, and they therefore turn around to the representatives of the people and say to them "Gentlemen, I want you to me pay an additional sum; I agreed to work for you at a less sum than what my services are actually worth." Now let us see whether there is any force in this position; because the State of New York is not a charitable institution that throws its arm of charity around the judge upon the bench, any more than around any body else. The judge has no more claim to the munificence of the people of the State of New York than has the ordinary laboring man. We have our almshouses, and our poor-houses, and our other institutions of charity, but they are not specifically directed to the relief of the judges of the court of appeals or of the supreme court. Those institutions have a prescribed mode of administering their charities, and if a judge of the supreme court, or of the court of appeals, or a county judge, wants the aid of the State as a charity, he must appeal to that charity through the ordinary channels which the statutes prescribe.

Mr. FERRY—I would like to inquire whether that argument applies to my position, that when we increase by legislative provision the duties of the judges, we should increase their compensation.

Mr. GRAVES—There is no provision in this section for the case which the gentleman alludes to.

Mr. HALE—Will the gentleman from Herkimer permit a question before he goes on?

Mr. GRAVES—Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE—It is, whether if both parties to a contract agree that it shall be modified under certain circumstances, by increasing the price to be paid, there is any thing particularly inequitable in making such increase?

Mr. GRAVES—Certainly there is, unless you make the rule general. Now, sir, the appeal of the judges is made to the Legislature, not to the persons who elect the judges, either of the court of appeals or of the supreme court, but to the Legislature, and almost without the knowledge of the constituency. In such cases the people know nothing about the application; it is an application made almost in secret, and without the knowledge of the persons by whom the judge has been elevated to his position, and with whom he contracted to do the duties of the office for a certain specified sum. Suppose I hire a young man to go into my office and discharge the duties of clerk for five hundred dollars a year, for three years. When he comes into my office board is worth five dollars a week in the neighboorhood where I reside. By a change of circumstances board is increased in price so that it is worth six or seven dollars per week; am I, therefore, absolved from my contract, or is he? Suppose, on the other hand, that the price of board diminishes so that it can be obtained at three dollars per week, shall I say to him, "Sir, I am paying you too much?" And if not, shall he say to me when board increases in price, "Sir, you are paying me too little?" Now, where is the difference? A contract is no more binding between me and my clerk than it is between the people and the judge. The great difficulty is that gentlemen do not desire to provide for a change which may make the arrangement equitable between the judges and the people. I ask is it any more inequitable that the incumbent should have his fees diminished if the necessaries of life diminish in value than it is that he should have his fees increased if the necessaries of life increase in value? Why should the judge be absolved from his contract any more than the people should be absolved from theirs? The great difficulty in this as in other matters of this kind connected with the government of the State that men make a contract to do something at a certain specified sum, and then immediately come in and pretend that they have discovered some great amount of labor to be performed in the office, or that the eating and drinking commodities of life have become more costly, and therefore they must have more pay. Now, sir, in my judgment public justice and public policy demand that there should be a uniform rule in matters of this kind, and that when a judge enters upon the discharge of his duties for a certain salary he does it just as he would enter upon the performance of any other contract, to fulfill, complete, and consummate it for the compensation which he has agreed to accept, and at the same time that it is a violation of every principle of moral right to leave the matter in a condition where the fees of the office cannot be reduced to meet the emergencies of the case, yet where they can be

-ased to meet the desire of the incumbent of
- office.

The question was put on the amendment of
- Graves, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COOKE—I move that the committee now
- report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr.
-ER, and it was declared carried.

Thereupon the committee rose and the PRESI-
-NT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under considera-
-n the article reported by the Standing Commit-
-e on the Judiciary, had made some progress
-erein, but not having gone through therewith
- directed their chairman to report that fact
- the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. CASE—I move that the Convention do
-w adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr.
-E, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 10, 1867.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. JOHN F.
-WERY.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN presented a remonstrance
- the board of trustees of the Washington
-ademy against the abolition of the Board of Regents.

Which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARTO—I offer the following resolution:

The SECRETARY read the resolution as fol-
-ws:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to amend the article upon taxation as adopted by the Convention by adding thereto the following: "And no property shall be exempt from taxation on the ground of the profession or calling of the owner thereof,"

Which was laid on the table at the request of the mover.

Mr. BARTO—I offer this resolution also:

The SECRETARY read the resolution as fol-
-ws:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to amend the article on finance, as adopted by the Convention, by adding thereto the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. The principal and interest of the gene--al fund debt, and the canal debt, under the amendment of 1854, and the floating canal debt, and all indebtedness heretofore created, shall be paid in coin.

Which was laid on the table at the request of
the mover.

Mr. MERRITT—I call up the resolution I offered on Saturday last.

The SECRETARY read the resolution as fol-
-ws:

WHEREAS, It is now probable that the labors of this Convention will not be completed before this chamber will be required by the Legislature; therefore

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the President to confer with the committee of the common council of the city of Albany, in rela-tion to a suitable hall and accommodations for the sessions of this Convention, as voluntarily ten-dered by the city authorities, and report as early as practicable.

Mr. GOULD—I move to amend that resolution by inserting, "or the mayors of other cities."
The committee, I think, should not be restricted exclusively to the city of Albany, in case greater convenience would accrue to the Convention by removing to some other city.

Mr. MERRITT—I do not suppose the Conven-tion will seriously entertain the proposition of leaving Albany before we complete our labors.
It is to be presumed that by the holidays we shall have so far progressed in the work, that a very short time after that date will be required to complete our labors. It is well known that we have all the facilities necessary to carry on the work of the Convention in this city. I do not suppose it will be necessary to impose a duty upon the committee that, in our judgment, is uncalled for, and require them to visit or receive propositions from other cities. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not prevail. I do not sup-pose it is seriously presented.

Mr. GOULD—It is very seriously presented.
I do not know that it will be desirable to move from the city of Albany at all, but while the com-mittee is charged with the subject it seems to me very desirable that they should be allowed a wider latitude than is proposed by this resolution. It may be exceedingly desirable to go to the city of New York in discussing the subject of charities, very desirable that the members of this Conven-tion should see some of the larger charities of New York in operation, that they may judge for themselves in regard to what is said for them and against them. I think it is possible they may be much enlightened by seeing the operation of a police system in the city of New York, and vari-ous other matters. I do not know that it will be desirable, still I cannot see any harm in allowing the committee a wider range.

Mr. OPDYKE—I hope the amendment will be adopted. I think there are very good reasons why this Convention, after the holidays, should remove to some place other than the city of Albany. I find by looking over the list of members in this Convention that about forty of them reside in the cities of New York and Brooklyn. That fact implies that we shall there be more certain to obtain a quorum at all times than here or anywhere else. In the next place, after the Legislature meets, the mem-bers of that body, and those who attend its meet-ings to procure legislation, will necessarily fill the hotels of this place to their fullest capacity It may be very inconvenient to obtain accommoda-tions for the members of this Convention. And then, it strikes me, there is very serious objection to the Convention sitting at the same time with the Legislature in the city of Albany: we desire to have our deliberations as distinct as possible from the deliberations of that body. I think there are good reasons, without saying why, that the Convention should meet at a different place.

Certainly there could be no harm in extending the limits of the proposed inquiry. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ALVORD—I hope we will settle this matter directly here and have no more to do with the question in reference to locality after the holidays. Now, sir, we are very nearly, I trust, through with our labors, and a fair amount of work between now and the 7th day of January will probably bring us quite near to a close, if not entirely. We have our printing done in the city of Albany, under an arrangement already made with the Comptroller. If we go anywhere else, we have to remove, at very great inconvenience, at least so far as regards the matter of printing. We very often adjourn in the evening, and desire printing done by the next morning. If we go to New York, we must have another contract, otherwise we will be unable to have our printing before us until the expiration of twenty-four or thirty-six hours after it is ordered. Another thing; we have a very large amount of impediments in the shape of documents, and these will be removed at very considerable trouble, if not expense. Again, we have State officers, and it may be necessary in the final closing up of our matters to have access to these officials for the purpose of finding out what we desire in reference to our business. I hope, therefore, taking all these things into consideration, and the fact, as gentlemen have come to the conclusion that it is a fact, that a very short time will be required by this Convention to close its labors after the 7th of January, that we will conclude to remain here. I have no doubt that we can find abundance of accommodation in Albany; I have no question whatever in regard to that matter. If gentlemen will take very little trouble they can find places where they can stop two or three weeks in Albany as well as in New York. In answer to my friend from Columbia [Mr. Gould], I think we shall find ourselves going to New York merely for a holiday; and instead of looking into the question of charities, we will look into some other questions that will not be as beneficial to ourselves and our constituents.

Mr. MORRIS—I desire that this amendment may not prevail, because the moment this resolution has been disposed of, I propose to call from the table the resolution offered by myself on the 25th of November, having in view the sending of a committee to New York for the purpose of ascertaining what accommodations may be had there. The time is limited between this and Christmas, and it will take several days for the committee having the subject under consideration, to get information concerning available rooms in Albany. It will therefore be judicious and safe for a committee to visit New York to ascertain what can be done there. In regard to conferring with the mayors of cities, I have myself personally conferred with the mayor of the city of New York, and he has given me to understand the matter is not within his control, but more properly belongs to the board of supervisors.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Columbia, [Mr. Gould] may be adopted. I believe it is a very great mistake to suppose that the labors of this Convention will be finished, carefully and deliberately finished, within the time stated by my colleague from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord]. In the first place, can any one tell how long this discussion upon the judiciary article will be continued? How long will the discussion upon the subject of charities require? How long will the discussion upon the two opposing articles offered from the committee upon the subject of prohibitory legislation require? There are two articles proposed to the Convention diametrically opposed the one to the other, and it will require a long discussion and debate in the Committee of the Whole. And then, when you take up that much vexed and very important question of the government of cities in this State, can any one now undertake to define the length of time which will be required on that subject? And finally, when we shall have closed the debate upon these different articles, and there are others which I could enumerate, it will take certainly a number of days for the Convention carefully to go over the whole work and put it in proper connection and form. According to the best estimate which I can make, and I believe it to be a true one, the whole time yet to be occupied by this Convention will not be less than sixty days. This work is on our hands now, as long as it has taken (and that is probably somewhat too long), and I am in favor of doing it up deliberately and carefully before we send it to the people for their acceptance or rejection. Now, in regard to remaining in Albany. I believe when the Legislature arrives here and the lobby, there will be but little room for the accommodation of the members of this Convention. It will be found that the hotels and houses in this city will hardly accommodate these three departments of the public service. I think, therefore, we had better adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould], in order that the whole subject of removal may come before us.

Mr. MERRITT—I would like to ask the gentleman whether he proposes to vacate his boarding place on account of the Legislature? We surrender this hall, and that is all.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I may be able to keep my room at the hotel, but that is not the whole question. There is no public necessity of remaining in this city. I cannot conceive of any purpose whatever for which we will desire to consult the State officers hereafter. If any gentleman can suggest any further information to be called from the departments, let that suggestion be made. I think there is no further occasion to be brought in communication with them. In regard to the removal of our documents, that is a very slight trouble—a very small inconvenience. I believe we shall be far less likely to keep up a quorum of this body by remaining in this city than we will by going to New York, and I would prefer going even to Buffalo.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I regret that no gentleman in this Convention has given us his opinion as the result of his deliberations as to whether the Legislature has the indisputed right to hold their sessions in this building. We might allow them to meet here on the day specified in the statutes for their convening, and then they could adjourn to some public place in this city, having first made their arrangements therefor. I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. Opdyke], we can get our printing done and have it carried down by the express companies within twelve hours after it is ordered, to the city of New York. There are a number of public buildings in that city admirably suited for our purpose. There is an arsenal there having a splendid room, but that, perhaps, would not be a fit place. I have no doubt that the authorities of the city would make arrangements for the accommodation of this body. This Convention more closely represents the sovereignty of the people than any which has ever before met under any Constitution of this State. Certain provisions of the Constitution of the United States are the only limit on its powers, and it is obvious therefore that it cannot be compelled to give way before an Assembly of delegates, however respectable they may be, and improved, as I hope they will be—hope, I say, sir—in character when contrasted with the men who have preceded them in recent years. Why, sir, it is competent for this body to-day to declare by ordinance that the Legislature shall be adjourned for two years, and then have biennial sessions of a few weeks only. No man thinks of doing it; no man has the remotest idea of proposing any thing of the kind, yet the constitutional power is here. I hope we shall go as far as even the Convention in Massachusetts did, and submit our articles, nine or ten, or any other number, if need be, to the people, upon a mid-summer's day, for their calm reflection and decision. With these views, I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould]. I hope the Convention, if they move from this city, will give the committee power to entertain some proposition or overture that may be made by the city of New York. I will further say, in reference to the duties of this body, that the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] is entirely wrong in thinking that we can close up this matter at so early a day. Our experience has shown that to be impossible. We do not know when we will get over even the judiciary article. The gentleman from Broome [Mr. Hand], last night, showed how utterly diverse were the opinions of that large body of men, the lawyers in this Convention. It is, therefore, the remaining members, who are not lawyers, "laymen," as it is customary to designate them here, who are to sit in judgment upon the arguments made here, for as a matter of legal precedence the litigants should have no vote. The Convention has made many improvements. The article increasing the salary of the Legislature is a decided improvement. There is another question which has been alluded to, only incidentally, and that was in reference to the employment of prison labor on the canals, which belongs to and is involved in the prison management. I undertake to say, as a man of business, and one with more than ordinary opportunities of public investigation, that if the Convention addresses itself properly to the subject of the management of prisons, they will be able to save in the expense of the prisons to the State in one year the large amount that the sitting of this Convention will have directly cost the people. The prisons now cost half a million of dollars every year more than they produce, while under proper management they should yield the State a profit of half a million, containing as they now do over three thousand convicts. That question alone is a subject for earnest, profitable investigation. If we can save a million dollars to the State we most assuredly should do so. The matters of public education, charities, etc., also require careful supervision.

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Gould.

Mr. ALVORD—I call for the ayes and noes on the question now before the Convention.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Gould, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Axtell, Barto, Beadle, Bell, Bergen, Bowen, E. P. Brooks, E A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Clarke, Comstock, Cooke, Daly, Duganne, Eddy, Ely, Endress, Flagler, Fowler, Fuller, Gould, Hammond, Hand, Ketcham, A. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Mattice, Merwin, Morris, Opdyke, President, Prindle, Prosser, Rogers, Root, L. W. Russell, Schell, Sheldon, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen — 41.

Noes—A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Baker, Barker, Beckwith, Bickford, Case, Corbett, C. C. Dwight, Folger, Francis, Goodrich, Graves, Hadley, Hale, Harris, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Houston, Kinney, Krum, Lee, Ludington, McDonald, Merrill, Merritt, Miller, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, Potter, Rathbun, Reynolds, Rumsey, Seaver, Smith, Spencer, M. I. Townsend, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—43.

Mr. FULLER—I move a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

Objection being made, the motion was laid on the table under the rule.

The question was then put on the adoption of the original resolution, and, on a division, it was declared adopted by a vote of 45 to 31.

Mr. MORRIS—I desire to read to the Convenvention a letter which I received this morning, in order to offer a resolution in connection with the subject. I will read the communication:

"Head-quarters Seventh regiment—"

Mr. RATHBUN—I rather think the Convention is getting tired of this. I rise to a point of order. Is not this question now disposed of?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris]. What was his proposition?

Mr. MORRIS—I desire to read a letter I received this morning, in order to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will lay his foundation by offering his resolution.

Mr. MORRIS—The resolution I desire to offer is a tender of the thanks of this Convention to the members of the Seventh regiment for offering to this Convention the use of their armory in the city of New York, provided this Convention desires to remove to that city. The letter is very short and the reading of it will best explain the resolution I have to offer.

The PRESIDENT—The communication will be received.

Mr. MERRITT—I think it will be well to refer that communication to a committee.

The PRESIDENT—The communication will first be read and received by the Convention.

Mr. SEAVER—I would inquire if there was any such communication made to this Convention?

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman desires to make it. He is in order and will proceed.

Mr. MORRIS—[Proceeding to read.]

HEAD-QUARTERS 7TH REGT. NATIONAL GUARD, CITY OF NEW YORK.

"GENERAL: In reply to your—

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a point of order. I do not want to debate it; but a private letter from any one to a member of this Convention is not such a document as the Convention can receive.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understood the gentleman to say that he had a communication addressed to this Convention.

Mr. MORRIS—Mr. President, it seems to me very proper that any one member of the Convention may be addressed on a subject which has for its object the making of that subject known to the members of this Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The communication to the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris] is not in this connection a communication to this Convention.

Mr. MORRIS—I desire to call from the table a resolution I offered on the 25th of November.

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

WHEREAS, It now seems probable that this Convention may not be able to complete its labors before the 24th of December, and

WHEREAS, This assembly chamber will be required by the Assembly immediately after the holidays, and

WHEREAS, The act creating this Convention permits it to adjourn to any other place within this State; therefore

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to proceed to the city of New York and ascertain what suitable public hall can be obtained for the use of the Convention after January 1st, 1868.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a point of order. We have just passed a resolution appointing a committee.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken.

The Convention again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, of Cayuga, in the chair.

The Chairman announced the pending question to be the consideration of the seventeenth section, which the SECRETARY read as follows:

SEC. 17. All the judges and justices of the courts of record herein before mentioned in this article shall receive at stated times for their services, a compensation to be fixed by law, which shall not be diminished during their respective terms of office.

Mr. FOLGER—I offer the following amendment:

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

Add to section 7 the following:

"In addition to any other compensation the Legislature shall provide for a per diem allowance to the court of appeals for every day's actual attendance upon the sessions of the court or upon the consultations of the judges thereof.

Mr. FOLGER—I offer this amendment because I consider it a practical means, if carried into effect, of reaching a practical difficulty and securing a practical end. I think if any one has observed he will see that the difficulty with the present judicial system is mainly the difficulty of delay in the disposition of the business, and he must have seen that that delay is mostly to be found in the court of appeals; that there it has its greatest development, if not its chief place of abode. I conceive that delay to arise from two reasons. One is that the first court of appeals was a shifting court, and not composed from year to year of the same body of judges. That difficulty has been obviated by the article already adopted. I conceive that the second difficulty exists in the fact that the sessions of the court are comparatively short, and that immediately upon its close the judges disperse and go to their homes, each one laden with a certain number of cases upon which he is to form his opinion, and at the next session to report that opinion to his fellows. He goes home and forms his own opinion, uncertain what are the views of his associates, and finds or thinks it necessary to prepare a lengthy argument, not so much to announce the law as to convince his peers of the law, as he conceives it. So every case has not only the argument of counsel at a trial, but the argument of a judge to whom the case has been committed—an argument to convince his fellows that he is right in his decision. Take the last three or four volumes of the reports of Tiffany. I think that any lawyer of considerable practice will wonder why there should have been a necessity for a three months' interval between the arguments of many of the cases there reported and the determination of it—three months' lapse of time before the decision was announced. It does strike my judgment that if seven judges of a court of appeals, immediately after the argument of these cases, had met for conference together upon them, and had exchanged their views upon them, a decision would have been arrived at upon the spot, without the necessity of a three months' interval for deliberation, and without the necessity of lengthy written opinions. Now, why do they separate and go away, immediately upon the close of a session, to their homes? It is for the reason that their salaries are so meager as a compensation for the talent, and as a support for the respectability and the position required in a judge of the court of appeals. Their salaries are hardly sufficient for their support in the circle of society in which they move. So they go from Albany to save the expense to which they would be put if remained here. So, at least, I am informed me who has sat upon the bench of that court. -ose by this amendment to hold out an in- ment to the judges to remain together in session, and in longer session, and I conceive e that end is attained, and they shall remain nger session, and in consultation after the ms are closed, we shall have reached a s of very materially disposing of the busi- f the court of appeals, quicker than it is speeed of, and will have, in a great meas- obviated the long delay in the administration stice. Gentlemen may say this is a mercen- view to take of this question. But we are ng with mercenary matters in this Conven- f questions of finance and money, and the of compensation for services by money, and holding out of money as an inducement to ser- are mercenary. We are dealing with prac- questions, and asking ourselves how, by the ation of means, we shall remove practical ulties; and human nature is a thing which s itself practically. I think if any gentle- will consult his knowledge of events that pire in this State, he must see that men are ded upon by just such inducements as these. as we go outside of this hall, we hear that if sojourn for more than three days we lose our . And if we are not above the address of ecuniary considerations of this character, why ld we say that any other body of gentlemen this State, now constituted, or to be hereafter stituted, are above mercenary considerations? y give a compensation in money to the court ppeals at all? It is mercenary, and you ad- s to a judge of that court a mercenary argu- t when you address to him the argument of y. Then why not add to the other induce- ts he has for remaining here, by giving him a diem allowance in addition to his salary? e whole matter is left to the Legislature, and y may consider the per diem allowance in ad- on to the salary, when they come to fix the ary; and they may hold out, if this amend- t is allowed, an inducement for the judges of court of appeals to remain together and finish the business immediately upon hearing the ument.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I would suggest to the gen- man from Ontario [Mr. Folger] that he put the rd "shall" in place of the word "may," so as make it imperative upon the Legislature.

Mr. FOLGER—I had it "shall," but I thought haps it would be better to leave the matter to discretion of the Legislature.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The Legislature never will it if you leave it to them. I move to substi- te the word "shall" for the word "may."

Mr. FOLGER—I accept the amendment.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I will add a word or two. I nk the gentleman is altogether right in the w he presents. No one who has not examined closely can conceive the inconvenient working the present system. We all know very well t the pay of the judges is quite inadequate for eir services. They cannot, therefore, afford to main for long periods from their homes, attend- g the terms of the court. Why, sir, if they ould commence a term in the month of Decem- ber, as the court of appeals ought to do, and should continue that term during the winter and into spring, their hotel expenses would nearly exhaust their salaries. It is not in human nature to do this, and judges are very much like other men. As the matter now is, it is the interest of the judges to forsake their duties at the seat of government where the terms are held, and return to their homes as quickly as they can. It is, therefore, the practice of that court now to hold a morning session and an afternoon session; to get a certain number of cases in their hands and run for their homes as soon as possible. I suppose it to be the object of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], in his amendment, to require the Legislature simply to provide for their expenses while attending the terms of their courts, in addition to their stated compensation, whatever that may be. I hope it will pass.

Mr. ANDREWS—I cannot support the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger]. It is claimed that the work of the judges of the court of appeals can be mainly done while the court is in actual session, that they may hear arguments in the first instance, and then decide the cases upon consultation, during the same term. The amendment provides that for this work they shall be compensated by a per diem, to be fixed by the Legislature, in addition to their salary. In other words, the purport of the amendment is that the judges ought to be paid by the day for the work which they actually do, and which is to complete their judicial labor, and to be paid their salary in addition. But, Mr. Chairman, this doubtless is not the intent of the mover of this amendment. It is intended to remedy what is undoubtedly a practical difficulty, and to induce the court to sit such a length of time as will enable it to dispose of the business which comes before it. Now, I believe, and I have no donbt it receives the general assent of the Convention, that the compensation of the judges has hitherto been inadequate, owing in a great degree to circumstances which have largely increased the expenses of living, requiring a larger income than was formerly required. Under the Constitution of 1846 the salary of a judge was first fixed at $2,500; a tolerably liberal salary under the then existing condition. In 1855, I believe, it was increased to $3,500. It has not been changed since for the reason that no change could be made under the Constitution which would entitle the judges in office to receive an increased compensation. Now, I desire not to be misunderstood. I believe that the salaries of the judges of the courts in this State should be adequate and ample to compensate them for their labor, and to draw to the bench men who, by their abilities and learning, will adorn it. But I do object to a system which shall be an inducement to the Legislature to fix a salary at an inadequate amount, and then attempt to eke it out by adding what is called a per diem for compensation during the time the court shall be in session. In my judgment it would degrade the character of the bench itself. It would subject the judges to the charge now made against the judges of this State that they leave the business of their own districts and go to the city of New York for the reason that they have by that mode of proceeding a per diem allowed them in addition to their ordinary compensation. Let us leave it, as in my judgment it is best, to the Legislature. This method of providing additional compensation which makes it the pecuniary interest of the judge to remain merely for the purpose of obtaining his per diem, and subjecting the judges to the censure and the suggestions which will be made, arising out of that fact, seems to me to be entirely improper.

Mr. FOLGER—What would be considered an ample salary?

Mr. ANDREWS—At least five thousand dollars. I think seven thousand dollars would not be too much. But we should leave it to the Legislature. Gentlemen may say the Legislature will not fix an adequate compensation. I suggest that the result of this amendment is to destroy the probability that the Legislature will act upon an enlightened view of this question, and determining the salary according to the value of the services which are to be rendered.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I concur with the gentleman who has just taken his seat in his opinion that the salaries of the judges had better be in gross. I believe with him that the salary should be ample. We should, if possible, secure the best talent in the State to occupy the bench, and if we are to do so we shall of necessity be compelled to adapt the salary to the condition of things in the country and to the necessity of meeting all the reasonable pecuniary expenses and wants of the gentlemen who occupy the judicial position. I find myself compelled to differ entirely with the suggestions of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger]. I do not believe that the best and most experienced judges in the State are as well prepared to decide questions immediately after the hearing of arguments, even after consultation with their brethren on the bench, as they will be after they have had a month or two to examine the letter of the case and the letter of the former decisions as applicable to the case before them. I believe that when men are dealing with the interests of suitors there ought to be retirement and privacy and deliberation before a decision is arrived at. Except it may be in some cases where the decision to be arrived at is obvious at a glance. I cannot believe that our judges of the court of appeals have been in error in writing long opinions, which some of us may, in some instances, have deemed to have been too long drawn out. I believe that by doing so they have more accurately arrived at the real rights of the parties, and have been better able to convince their brethren of what the true decision should be; and have furnished to the State what is worth more than all the salaries of all the judges—a discussion of the principles involved in the decisions which the judges make. I do not believe that any amount of money conceivable, as applied to the salaries of the judges, would compensate this State for taking away the discussions which the judges of the court of appeals are in the habit of annually publishing to the legal profession. I believe that it is the best part of a lawyer's education to read the opinions of the judges. My friend says they are lectures, and if my friends in the profession can obtain better lectures and at less expense anywhere, if they will inform me, I will agree to avail myself of those lectures and pay expenses. There is no difficulty; we ought to get good lectures (if gentlemen choose to call them so) from a court adequate to discharge the duties of their position. I do not believe that the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], who spoke upon this subject, following my friend from Ontario [Mr. Folger], I do not believe that he has ever done this State injustice in the reasonably long opinions which he has from time to time read before the court and which have been published in the books. I certainly have never found one of them that was not worth the full time and expense—of myself at least—in purchasing the book in which it was contained and reading the opinion. I do not believe, sir, that we can adopt a sort of "short Delworth" mode, as Jack Downing said, of getting justice. If we are to go back to the Turkish system, where two men go before the cadi and each tells his own story, and the cadi is to bastinado one side or the other; I really hope that if that mode shall be adopted in this State there will never be a mistake made and the bastinado applied to the counsel instead of the parties themselves. I certainly shall withdraw when that mode of procedure is adopted. I believe this mode of writing opinions is not in vain. I believe it to be, as it is practiced, a great benefit to the State. But while I would pay as liberally as the most liberal for the services of the judiciary, I would not, by any course that should be taken, render it for the interests of the judges to decide summarily without that investigation which alone, in my opinion, can prepare even the greatest judicial minds to decide causes.

Mr. KETCHAM—I concur entirely in the suggestions of the honorable gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews], and I offer the following substitute as an amendment, with a view to accomplishing the object indicated by his remarks:

SEC. 17. All judges and justices of courts of record mentioned in this article shall receive at stated times a compensation to be fixed by law.

Mr. FOLGER—Is not that already in the section under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair is unable to perceive wherein the amendment differs, except by striking out the last clause.

Mr. KETCHAM — My substitute omits the word "the" wherever it occurs in line one, and the word "hereinbefore" in the second line, and all after the word "law" in third line, to the end of the section, and leaves the whole subject of compensation to be determined by law, that is by the action of the Legislature, and applies to all judges and justices of all the courts of record including county judges, as well as those provided for in the preceding sections of the article, and indeed this is the main object of my substitute.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I agree entirely in the justice, propriety and policy of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger]; and I am glad to see that although there is some difference of opinion on other points, all that the salaries of the judges should be

I trust will be given them by the Legisla-I propose to offer an amendment which provide that this sum per diem, which is ed, shall be for expenses, so that the Legis-e may ascertain what are the fair and proper ses per diem and allow for these, in addito the salary that shall be fixed. I propose, ore, after the words "court of appeals," amendment, to insert the words "for ex-s." There is an apprehension felt, in this of the house, that unless this is thus exed, it may be made such a part of their com-sion, or be deemed to be such a part of their pensation as to lessen the annual salary would otherwise be fixed by the Legislae question was put on the adoption of the dment offered by Mr. Ketcham, and it was ed lost.

A J PARKER moved to amend by ing after the words "court of appeals" the ds "for expenses."

SPENCER—While, perhaps, it would not objectionable to try this mode of compensa-as an experiment, it seems to me that it ld not be advisable to incorporate it in the stitution as a permanent rule. This mode of pensation, which is here proposed, has been ployed in regard to a great variety of officers in State, and it has been found, in regard to many them, to be accompanied with great abuses, to say evils. And in regard to at least some these abuses and evils, we have found them to so great, that the rule has been changed and compensation given, not by way of per m, and for expenses, but at a fixed salary.
evil which has grown out of this method of pensation has been this: that the officer o is paid his per diem for his services managed employ himself for a great many more days an were actually necessary for the performance the services. And to such an extent did that grow, that in one case, as I have been in-med, in a given year, one official charged his ers for a greater number of days than there e days in the year. And in regard to com-sation to meet expenses, that evil has been nd to be very great, and a thousand methods ve been invented, by those who occupy official ces, of multiplying the expenses attending performance of their official duties; and as s been suggested here, a judge, although he ght to be, is not always above the influence of ese considerations.

COMSTOCK—There certainly will be no putation to prolong the services if the al-ance is for expenses only, according to the dment proposed by the gentleman from Aly [Mr. A. J. Parker]. It was not my idea t this provision would increase the sum total judicial compensation, but I thought that five ndred dollars or seven hundred dollars be-wed upon a judge in the way of covering his enses merely, would do a great deal more for e public service than three times that amount id to his annual salary.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment proposed by Mr. A. J. Parker, and, on a division, it was declared lost, ayes 26, noes not counted.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. Folger.

Mr. GRAVES—I offer the following amendment:

To strike out all after the word "received," in the second line, and to insert, "a yearly salary of five thousand dollars, which shall continue for the term of ten years. At that time the Legislature shall continue the said salary, or increase or diminish the same, so as to make the compensation a just one."

I offer this amendment because, in my judgment, this body is as competent to fix the amount to which these judges are entitled as any body that will ever assemble in the State of New York. There are here about one hundred lawyers, all of them, or most of them, acquainted with the duties which will devolve upon the judges and the responsibilities of their position. They know the expenses that are attendant upon the discharge of that duty certainly as well, if not better, than the Legislature can judge of them. This sum of five thousand dollars is, in my judgment, a reasonable and fair compensation for the judge for such services as he will be called upon to perform; that sum will pay him for his services and defray the expenses incident to the discharge of his duties. It is a fixed salary for the term of ten years. There can hardly be any doubt but the condition of our country will be such as to justify the continuance of that salary for that length of time. At the end of ten years my amendment affords the Legislature the opportunity, if, in their judgment, the circumstances or conditions of the country require it, to change that salary or to continue it at that sum. If the Legislature can fix that, why can not this Constitutional Convention? It settles all questions on the subject, and saves that constant application to the Legislature for changing of the salary which is now made almost an absolute duty of the judge if he desires to preserve his identity as a man, because he must, as a matter of course, have something to pay his expenses if he occupies that position and finds the compensation allowed him an inadequate one. And certainly, at the prices now paid, the sum of $3,500 is a meager salary for the services rendered and the talent employed. I would, therefore, give him a reasonable salary, and let that salary be fixed by this Convention for a certain length of time.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Graves, and it was declared lost.

The question was then put upon the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Folger, and, on a division, the vote was announced 26 ayes and 32 noes—no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair is aware that there is a quorum in the house. Gentlemen will please to vote.

The question was again put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Folger, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 35 to 46.

Mr. KRUM—I offer an amendment to section 17, to add after the word "services," in the third line, the word "expenses," so that the section shall read:

SEC. 17. All the judges and justices of the courts of record hereinbefore mentioned in this article shall receive at stated times for their services and expenses a compensation to be fixed by law, which shall not be diminished during their respective terms of office.

I desire to say that, as the section now stands, it limits the Legislature to a compensation for the services of the judges, while, with my proposed amendment, it gives the Legislature power to allow compensation not only for services but for expenses, and leaves the whole matter of services and expenses of judges in the hands of the Legislature.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Krum, and it was declared lost.

No further amendment was offered.

The SECRETARY read the next section as follows:

SEC. 18. There shall be elected in each of the counties of this State, except the city and county of New York, one county judge, who shall hold his office for seven years. He shall hold the county court and perform the duties of the office of surrogate. The county court, as at present existing, shall be continued with such original and appellate jurisdiction as shall from time to time be conferred upon it by the Legislature. The county judge, with two justices of the peace, to be designated according to law, may hold courts of sessions, with such criminal jurisdiction as the Legislature shall prescribe, and perform such other duties as may be required by law. The county judge shall receive an annual salary, to be fixed by the board of supervisors, which shall not be diminished during his continuance in office. The justices of the peace for services in courts of sessions shall be paid a per diem allowance out of the county treasury. In counties having a population exceeding forty thousand, the Legislature may provide for the election of a separate officer to perform the duties of the office of surrogate, whose term of office shall be the same as that of the county judge. Inferior local courts, of civil and criminal jurisdiction, may be established by the Legislature in cities; and such courts, except for the cities of New York, Brooklyn and Buffalo, shall have an uniform organization and jurisdiction in such cities.

Mr. HALE—I move that we return to the consideration of those sections that have been passed over. I believe that the committee is as full this morning as it will be, and we may as well return to their consideration.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I desire to offer an amendment to the section now pending, but it will not be as appropriate now as it will be after we shall have passed upon the preceding sections, as proposed by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale].

Mr. FOLGER—Why can we not go on with it now as well as to be jumping backward and forward in this way?

The question was put on the adoption of the motion of Mr. Hale, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 23 ayes—noes not counted.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move that we return so far as to finish the organization of the court of appeals.

The CHAIRMAN—To what section would that require the committee to return?

Mr. COMSTOCK—It would relate to the filling of the vacancies in the office of the chief justice of the court of appeals, and I will offer an amendment upon that subject if we return to it. I will offer mine as a substitute for section 10.

Mr. HALE—In regard to this matter of returning to the sections which we have passed over, it is not, perhaps, a matter of very vital importance, but these sections were passed over last evening for the reason that the attendance was small, as it usually is on Monday evening, and it was thought that this important matter might better be deferred till this morning, and that after we had taken them up this morning we should go on in order and leave nothing unfinished. This seventeenth section is one of a series of sections relating to county courts; and the organization of county courts may depend somewhat upon the action of the Convention with regard to the organization of the supreme court. For this reason, therefore, it seems to me, we should get along with our work much better, if we should now finish the court of appeals, and then take up the supreme court and determine that subject, before we proceed with our labors in regard to the county courts.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—With regard to the question put by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], perhaps he did not understand my object in asking that these former sections should be disposed of before my amendment. The reason is this: My amendment relating to the organization of county courts, its propriety will depend, in a great measure, upon the disposition made by the Convention of the previous sections passed over last evening. Their decision with regard to those sections may vary the propriety of the adoption of the amendment which I propose to offer to the eighteenth section with regard to the county courts and to the surrogate's court. For that reason I thought that we might with propriety go back and consider the sections which were passed over last evening for the reason, as stated already, by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], that there was not a full house and the questions could not be fully discussed. If they were now discussed and decided one way or the other, the propriety of the amendment which I propose to offer to the eighteenth section, will depend, in a great degree, upon that decision. This is the object that I had in view in proposing that those sections should be disposed of before the remaining sections should be considered.

The question was put on the adoption of the motion of Mr. Comstock to recur to the tenth section, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY read the section as follows:

SEC. 10. All vacancies in the office of judge of the court of appeals shall, as they occur, be filled by election by the electors of the State, and all vacancies in the office of justice of the supreme court shall, as they occur, be filled by election by

...s electors in the several departments, at the general election next after the vacancy shall occur. ... the Governor by and with the advice and ...sent of the Senate, when the Senate is in ...sion, and the Governor when the Senate is not ...session, may fill any such vacancy by appoint... which shall continue until the first day of ...ary next after such general election.

Mr. COMSTOCK—As we have now organized ...e court of appeals, it becomes necessary to ...ke a distinct provision for filling vacanies in ...t court. The office of chief justice is created ...a distinct office from that of associate judge or ...ice. It therefore becomes necessary to recast ...e tenth section, or, more correctly speaking, ...haps, to have a distinct and independent sec... for filling vacancies in the office of chief jus... and judge of the court of appeals. For that ...pose I offer the following substitute in the ...ce of the tenth section, although, when we ...e to arrange the article, I think its proper ...ce would be between the second and the third ...tions, as relating to the organization of the ...rt of appeals:

"Where a vacancy shall occur in the office of ...ief justice or associate justice of the court of ...peals, three months prior to a general election, ...e same shall be filled at such election; and un... any vacancy can be so filled, the Governor, by ...e advice and consent of the Senate, if the Sen... shall be in session, or if not, the Governor ...one may appoint to fill such vacancy. If any ...ch appointment of chief justice shall be made ...m among the associate judges, a temporary ap...intment of associate judge shall be made in like ...nner. But in such cases, the person appointed ...ief justice shall not be deemed to vacate his ...ce of associate judge any longer than until the ...piration of such appointment. The powers ...d jurisdiction of the court shall not be sus...ended for want of appointment, when the num...er of judges is sufficient to constitute a quorum. ...ll appointments under this section shall con...ue until the first day of January next after the ...ection at which the vacancy can be filled."

As we have framed what may be called the ...rganizing section of the court, the office of chief ...stice is a different one from that of associate ...dge, and it becomes necessary, therefore, to ...rovide distinctly for filling a vacancy of that of...ce. Of course, I suppose, we all agree that when ...vacancy in that office occurs, until it can be ...pplied by election, it shall be filled by the Gov...rnor, or the Governor and the Senate. But it ...ill be very convenient, and probably very proper ...n most cases, for the Governor to take one of ...ose who are on the bench as associate judges ...o fill that situation. If that should be done, the ...erson who is elected from the associate judges to ...ll the office of chief justice ought not, by the ac...eptance of that situation for a few months, to ...ose his tenure as associate judge, which may last ...r ten years. My amendment provides for that ...situation. It provides also that a vacancy, ...whether in the office of chief judge or associate ...judge, shall not be filled by election unless the ...vacancy occurs three months before the election. ...There ought to be some reasonable intervening ...period of time between the happening of the va...cancy and the election, for the people to prepare ...for that election, and to select suitable candidates ...for the high position to be filled. Three months ...seems to me not too long, possibly two months ...may be long enough. Unless some limitation of ...that kind is prescribed this may happen—this ...danger will always exist—that your chief justice ...or one of the associate judges may die the day ...before the election, and on the morning of elec...tion a single or half a dozen votes cast in some ...remote corner of the State may elect somebody ...you never heard of for that judge of the court. ...Therefore, I think that if the vacancy happens ...within two or three months before the election, it ...should be filled by the Governor and the Senate ...until the next period of election shall come round. ...This is the general purpose of my amendment. ...I have endeavored to frame it carefully to meet ...all the requirements of the question, and of the ...situation; yet it may be capable of much improve...ment.

Mr. BICKFORD—I would suggest an amend...ment to the substitute offered by the gentleman ...from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] so that it will ...read, "if the vacancy shall occur prior to the first ...day of September."

Mr. COMSTOCK—Say two months instead of ...three. The day of general election may be ...changed.

Mr. BICKFORD—State elections are generally ...held in November, and if the vacancy occurs be...fore the first day of September there is no hinder...ance to its being filled. I will modify my ...amendment so as to have it read sixty-five days ...instead of three months.

Mr. FERRY—I think favorably of this amend...ment, but I would like to know why the gentle...man from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] confines his ...proposition to the court of appeals. The section ...of which this is an amendment provides for ...judges of the supreme court as well.

Mr. COMSTOCK—That would have to be the ...subject of a separate provision.

Mr. FERRY—It is not so here.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I know it is not. I propose ...to substitute this for the tenth section, and then, ...having substituted it, to put it in its place among ...the provisions for the court of appeals. Then ...we can make another provision to fill vacancies ...in the supreme court.

Mr. FERRY—My question is not precisely ...answered. Why cannot both propositions be as ...appropriately put in one?

Mr. COMSTOCK—You cannot make the same ...provision for both, because in the court of appeals ...you have a separate and distinct officer, a chief ...justice, which you have not in the supreme ...court.

Mr. HALE—It seems to me that there is a ...little embarrassment arising from the considera...tion of this section now. This tenth section, on ...which this amendment is moved, has relation to ...filling vacancies in the court of appeals and in ...the supreme court, but the amendment which is ...proposed applies only to the court of appeals—...drops out the supreme court from this section. ...It seems to me that all embarrassment can be re...moved by proceeding at once to the consideration ...of section 6 and taking up this section after having considered section 6 and section 8. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] so far as it relates to the court of appeals suggests a plan that should, I think, be adopted. But it will be noticed that section 10 speaks of departments in the supreme court. We have not yet determined whether we will have any departments or not, and I will submit whether it is not better that we should proceed at once to the consideration of the sixth section, and defer this subject until we have settled upon the organization of the supreme court.

Mr. COMSTOCK—If we shall adopt this section as I have read it we are done with the court of appeals. That is the reason of my wish for having it adopted now. We can then pass to the other courts. To obviate the point suggested by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], I will propose it as section 5, which has been entirely stricken out.

Mr. COOKE—I agree with the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] in regard to the impropriety of proceeding with this article in the order in which we have attempted, instead of going back and taking up the omitted sections. The question of my friend from Otsego [Mr. Ferry] as to why the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] had not included the supreme court in his amendment as well as the court of appeals, is well answered by saying that, at present, we have provided for no supreme court. We do not know that we are to have any supreme court. We are commencing at the wrong end of the subject. It seems to me that, by going back and organizing a supreme court, we shall be prepared to act more directly upon the following sections. In that way we may group several subjects together, and so very much abbreviate the article.

Mr. BICKFORD—I will modify my amendment, with the consent of the committee, so that it shall read "two months."

The question was then put upon the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Bickford, and it was declared lost.

The question was then put upon the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock as a substitute for section 10, to be inserted in the article as section 5, and it was declared carried.

Mr. HALE—I move that we now take up section 6.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. Hale, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. There shall be a supreme court having general jurisdiction in law and equity, subject to such appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeals as may be prescribed by law. The Legislature at its next session after the adoption of this Constitution shall divide the State into four judicial departments, and each of said departments into two districts to be bounded by county lines. The city and county of New York shall form one district. There shall be thirty-four justices of the said supreme court; ten thereof in the department in which is the city and county of New York, and eight in each of the other departments. But the Legislature shall have power to provide for an additional justice in each of said departments One-half of the justices in each department shall reside in each district of such department, at the time of their election.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be upon the substitute proposed by Mr. Spencer, which the Secretary proceeded to read as follows:

To strike out all after the word "law," in line, 3, and insert the following:

"The State shall be divided into eight judicial districts of which the city of New York shall be one, the others to be bounded by county lines, and to be compact and equal in population as nearly as may be. There shall be four justices of the supreme court in each district, and as many more in any district as may be athorized by law. The justices of the present supreme court shall be justices of the supreme court hereby established, during the term for which they were respectively elected. Provision shall be made by law for the election of justices of the supreme court by the electors of the several judicial districts."

Mr. SPENCER—The question is upon striking out all after the third line, and inserting what has been read.

The CHAIRMAN—It is so understood, and was so read by the Secretary.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] may prevail. My reasons for it especially are that it will furnish a much more ready and convenient mode of transacting the business of the State, it seems to me, than that which is proposed in the report of the committee in the section as printed. Under this system we may have substantially the same state of things existing as exists now in the State, susceptible, however, of being amended, in such wise as the experience of the State, I think, concurs that our present system should be amended, to wit: by prohibiting any judge from sitting in review of his own decisions. With that exception I believe that our present system will better promote the interest of the State than any system which has been proposed. As I have already said in discussing another question—the business of the State is very large, and we ought, in establishing a judiciary system, to have an especial reference to the large amount of business that must be transacted. According to the report of the committee there are to be four departments in the State, and there is to be a general term for each department, although each department is to be subdivided into two districts making eight districts. Now, I anticipate very great difficulty in transacting the business of what we lawyers call the general term, if we adopt the departmental system. There will be then but four general terms in the State, and as the city of New York constitutes but a single district, a part of a department, as I understand the report, it will necessitate an additional district. It will create the necessity for an additional district that shall be added to the city of New York, having a general term in common with the city of New York. Now, the business of that city is enormous, and it will be certainly an unnecessary and extreme hardship to compel any portion of the State to mix its business with the business of that city, and hold its general term in common with the city of New York. Coming from the city of New York, if you go into any other part of the State, without having direct reference to the departments proposed to be created by the committee, it will necessitate the uniting of two extents of territory equal to two of our present judicial districts for transacting the business of the general term. Suppose it were the case that the third and fourth districts were to be united for the transaction of the business of the general term. This would unite Sullivan and St. Lawrence counties in one district and compel the lawyers to travel the breadth of that district for the purpose of transacting the business of the general term, and although, perhaps, in other sections of the State the distance traveled might not be quite as great, yet some difficulty must occur. It must occur throughout the State that any man who goes to the general term must travel about the entire breadth of the State to argue his cause, and when he gets there he will find upon the calendar of the general term business equal to two of our present districts, and must, if he would argue the cause, wait until his turn is reached in the midst of that increased business. I do not believe it to be desirable to thus put additional hardships upon the profession or upon the suitors in this State. Much has been said here about how wonderfully well the old system worked, and we have been again and again cited to the old system that existed previous to 1846. Let me for a moment call attention to the state of things that existed. We had then one supreme court. In that supreme court let it be remembered that they had only the law business of the State. The entire equity business of the State was rejected from the calendar. I examined, yesterday, the calendar of the old supreme court for July, 1846. It contained six hundred and eighty causes; and I found by examining that calendar that the entire business of the year 1843, back to a point three years and six months preceding the time when that court was held, was behindhand and undecided.

Mr. DALY—The gentleman was not present during the course of my remarks. If he had been he would have found that that particular change in the supreme court, instead of being lauded, was condemned. The very fact he has now stated was stated in the Convention of 1846 as an objection to the system.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I did not have the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] in my mind at all in the remarks which I made, but I referred to other gentlemen who had spoken in high terms of the state of things that existed under the old court, previous to the time when the gentleman favored the committee with his remarks. The business of the supreme court, then, was three years and six months behind, and in addition there was this entire amount of equity business. I was unable to reach the calendar in the court of chancery. But judging from my recollection, and I hope no gentleman in the committee will take offense from the fact that I say I am old enough to remember previous to 1846, because I do not wish to offend any one by saying so, but from my recollection of the state of things previous to 1846 I believe if you add the calendar of the court of chancery to the calendar of the supreme court of that day, you will find that in the preliminary court, in the courts before reaching the court for the correction of errors, there was an obstruction in the course of litigation in the State of New York equal to what exists in the court of appeals at the present day. And the change made in 1846 by which the business of the State was put out to eight distinct tribunals in the State was one of the most beneficient improvements that ever occurred in any country at any time: and I refer to this now for this reason: I would neither go back to the old system when you had but one supreme court, nor would I go back a step in that direction. I would not reduce our supreme courts from eight districts down to four. A result that certainly has benefited this State more than almost any thing else came about in consequence of this diffusion of business of the State. Previous to 1846, from 1821 down to 1846 there were scarcely a hundred lawyers in the State who argued their causes before the supreme court, and since 1846 every lawyer who assists in the trial of his own cause at the circuit expects to assist in or leading the argument of his cause at the general term; and there has been since 1846—I say it, believing that I shall be sustained by the recollection of every gentleman whose age enables him to remember the state of things previous to 1846—there has been an elevation of the intellect and professional character of the lawyers in the State.

Mr. HALE—I would call the attention of my friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] to the thirteenth section, by which he will see that the committee do not propose to do away with this system of holding general terms in all parts of the State. It says, "Provision shall be made for holding general terms of the supreme court at convenient places, in each of said districts." I mention this to show my friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] that no plan that has been proposed would do away with that system.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I am coming down—if the patience of the committee will suffer me to go so far—I am coming down to that view of the case by and by. If my friend from Essex [Mr. Hale] will allow me, I will leave that part of the argument for the present and go on with the course of the argument which I dropped. By bringing justice, as the phrase was in 1846, to every man's door, we have enabled every lawyer in the State to take rank with every other lawyer as an intellectual man, and have raised the standard of legal learning and acquirements by enabling every man in the legal profession to be present in the courts, listening to the discussions that are going on, and to participate in them; and we have had — and perhaps my friends will think I am too much of an optimist —but I will say this unhesitatingly, that we have in the State of New York a profession of law of which any man may be proud to be a member, and we have been as much benefited by giving every man an opportunity to participate in the discussions in the courts as a doctor or surgeon is benefited by having an opportunity to go into the hospitals, and to walk the hospitals where the diseases he has to cure are brought constantly before his eyes. It is said by my friend from Essex [Mr. Hale], that the committee have provided against the evils which I have suggested. I think not. Suppose it were the case that there was to be one general term for the third and fourth judicial districts—that the district now running from Sullivan to St. Lawrence, inclusive, are to be united in the holding of general terms. One or two courses shall be adopted. As it is at present in this district, at every successive term, every cause that is ready for argument is argued, and I presume it is substantially so in the fourth district. At the first term, there being four terms held in each year, every cause that is ready for argument can be argued, and that, too, by spending little more than a week's time. If two districts are united, either the lawyers have got to travel from one or the other of these districts into the second district, and there wait two weeks, or else there shall be a general term for one district, and subsequently a general term for the other district. They must either defer the time for the argument of the cause or increase the size of the calendar. To my appreciation it can result in nothing in the world but the injury of the profession at large. It can result in nothing but a burden to the members of the bar. Here is a lawyer in the county of Ulster that has tried his cause at the circuit. He is a man of reasonable capability, but he has but one cause that goes to the general term. That cause is carried to the general term. If he goes himself to the general term and goes to Plattsburgh, as is now done for the accommodation of the fourth district, his expenses must be paid from Ulster or from Sullivan county, if it be there, to Plattsburgh, and he must be supported by his client at Plattsburgh for two weeks to wait for the argument of his cause that would be argued and disposed of at the city of Albany, if the state of things that now exists had been continued, in three days. And what is the result? Either that the client is loaded with an expense entirely unnecessary, or that the lawyer who tried the cause is compelled to do as was done previous to 1846 in the case of a general term—to hand over his brief to some one of the favored few of the profession who alone follow the general term from district to district, and from locality to locality, and thus there will be a monopoly, and the few will transact all the business. I am not in favor of either result. I am not in favor of putting an intolerable burden upon the suitor himself, nor am I in favor of building up a section of the profession who alone shall have the prerogative of arguing causes at the general term to the exclusion and disadvantage of the rest of the profession, and thus, indirectly, of the rest of the State; because the suitor is as much benefited as any body else in having the opportunity to go before an experienced man in the presentation of his case in the privacy of office consultation whether he lives in one section of the State or another. If we elevate the general charater of the profession we benefit the State, and for that reason I am in favor of leaving the system as it is.

Mr. FOLGER—If I have correctly followed the remarks just concluded, the only idea presented by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] in opposition to the system of the committee, is the inconvenience to the attorneys. I do not hear him object to the principle of the system; I do not hear him contrast the principle of the old system and the principle of the system proposed by the committee and draw any conclusions in favor of the old system and detrimental to the one presented by the committee. But the sole idea he has presented, from beginning to end, is that the attorney must take a longer travel and be at greater inconvenience in arguing his case than under the present system, and therefore the attorney and the client must, in a proportionate degree, suffer. Now, it appears to me that that may be done away with in a very few words. In the first place this Constitution does not end the formation of the judical system. We cannot put all the details within the covers of our report, or of the Constitution which we shall frame. Something has to be left to the Legislature. We make the skeleton; it is clothed upon with muscles and nerves, by and by, by the Legislature which succeeds us. Now, how is this difficulty or inconvenience which the gentleman sees to be obviated? We provide here for a department which shall include two districts; we provide for a general term in that department, we provide for a general term which shall not sit at any one fixed place, but we leave it to the Legislature to say that it may and that it shall rotate from place to place. Take for instance, the seventh and eighth districts, we say that there shall be general terms in the department composed of the seventh and eighth districts, and that the Legislature shall prescribe their times and places of sitting. Still, I suppose the Legislature will prescribe very nearly in substance what the courts have prescribed. The general term of the seventh judicial district sits uniformly at Rochester, because there is the State library. The general term of the eighth district sits uniformly at Buffalo for the same reason. How easy it will be for the Legislature to say that the general term of the fourth department shall sit alternately at Rochester and Buffalo, and that when it sits at Rochester causes shall have preference which arise in the seventh district, and when it sits at Buffalo causes shall have preference which arise in the eighth district. Then where is the difficulty which the gentleman has evoked? It has gone. Gentlemen residing in the eighth district will then have just the same facilities to reach the place of argument of their causes as they have under the present system; so that the difficulty seems to be obviated when our views are by the Legislature carried forward to the perfection of the system, the rudiments only of which we can trace here. Now, there are advantages in the system which we propose, which I think every lawyer will appreciate, from the disadvantages he has seen in the present system. A lawyer goes before a court of the district in which his opponent resides, and he meets there

...om the bench judges with whom his opponent ... the case is more or less intimate, and there is sometimes an embarrassment. I am speaking now of what is inevitable in human nature, something to which we cannot shut our eyes—there is embarrassment and a sense of favor and partiality known in such a case; and whether partiality exists or not this feeling exists. I think that it is oftener suspected than found, but let us if we can avoid the chance of suspicion. Now, we propose to take from a distance, from one district, two judges to sit at general term with the two judges of another district, men so far removed from these local influences that they will be entirely free from any feeling of partiality, and not only free from any such feeling, but free also from any suspicion of it—for it seems to me that the suspicion of favor is greater than the reality—by this means we avoid the probability of even such a suspicion. There is that gain by the plan which we present, and I conceive it to be a great thing to be gained; and if there is no other better plan than that which the gentleman has urged, it seems to me that this single merit of the plan proposed by the Judiciary Committee, if it has no other, ought to secure its adoption.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—It is my distrust of the view last expressed by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] as much as any other consideration which causes my dislike of the whole system of bringing in strangers to try causes in the counties. My friend from Chatauqua [Mr. Barker], who was recently elected to the bench, might under this system, be sent to Rensselaer to try causes. Now, in that case, from my age and position, I should have the advantage of the personal acquaintance of the judge, whilst the members of the bar generally in that district would be laboring under a disadvantage. It is creating a state of things such that the leading members of the profession, a favored few, are to have all the advantages, and the many are to have the disadvantages. Probably I may be considered as speaking disinterestedly on this subject, for my age is such that I should be as likely to be known to a judge that was sent to Rensselaer from some distant county as any one else would be, but I cannot conceive, according to my opinion of what is right between man and man, why the fact that I have age and experience should give me the advantage of finding a judge with whom I was personally acquainted to try my cause, but who was entirely unknown to the great body of the profession who were called upon to transact business before him. I believe that there is an immense benefit resulting, right in the direction of the benefits that I spoke of before, having our judges known to the profession, and the profession known to the judges, and I feel that it is not for the benefit of the profession at large that strangers should be sent into the counties, but directly for the advantage of older and more leading members of the profession.

Mr. SPENCER—I have waited during the entire discussion upon this amendment to hear from some member of the Judiciary Committee, or from some other person who defends the organization of the supreme court which has been proposed by the committee, and I have waited in vain, until the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] has now seen fit to favor us with what he supposes to be the advantages of that system over the present one. Now, it seems to me that, so far as that exposition is concerned, it has entirely failed to show that the proposed system has any advantages whatever over that which has been in existence for the last twenty years. There is one view which perhaps the committee should consider before coming to a conclusion upon this question, and that regards the ability of the court, under an organization such as is proposed by my amendment, to perform the business which shall be brought before it. In the first place, it is to be increased by the addition of four justices, whose duties have hitherto been performed in the court of appeals; and so far there is an addition to the working force of that court. In addition to this, it must be remembered that the Constitution of 1846, and the consequent legislation, wrought so great and so radical changes in the constitution and the practice of the courts, that from twenty to twenty-five per cent of the subsequent litigation in them was owing to that cause, and that from twenty to twenty-five per cent of the time of the courts was occupied in settling the questions arising out of that radical change and out of the consequent litigation. In the lapse of these twenty years the practice under the present system has been to a great degree settled, and the courts are now relieved of much of the burden of litigation which has been thrown upon them in consequence of these great changes. In addition to this, it is proposed by this report—and I think there will be no dissent on the part of the Convention—that original jurisdiction should be conferred on the county courts, so that in this way again the supreme court will be relieved of the large amount of business which has hitherto been thrown upon it.

Mr. FOLGER — The plan of the Judiciary Committee leaves it open for the Legislature to give just as extended jurisdiction to the county courts as it sees fit.

Mr. SPENCER—That is what I say, that it is proposed to confer original jurisdiction upon the county courts, and in this way the supreme court will be relieved of a large amount of business which has been thrown upon it. Now, with all these means, by which the working force of the supreme court would be increased, it seems to me there can be no difficulty under the present system in so arranging the distribution of its business that the judges may be detailed for the holding of the terms of the supreme court, so as to carry out the principles which the report of the Judiciary Committee have sought to ingraft upon the Constitution. But there is one objection to the plan proposed by the Judiciary Committee which has not been adverted to in the comparison of the present plan and the plan of the committee, an objection which it seems to me cannot be overcome. It is this—the plan of the Judiciary Committee proposes to elect the judges of the supreme court by departments, of which there are to be four in the State; but still it proposes to preserve the distinction of districts as they now exist. The consequence of this will be that the justices of one district may be elected by the electors of another, and that in consequence of this, the seventh judicial district may have imposed upon it four judges of the supreme court who are not the choice of that district, and in like manner the electors of the eighth or of any other district, may have imposed upon them four judges of the supreme court who are not the judges of their choice. It seems to me far more just that the judges of the supreme court should be elected by districts as they are now, so that judges may be elected who will be acceptable to each district.

Mr. COOKE—I also have listened with a good deal of attention to hear from some members of the Judiciary Committee in regard to the pending proposition. The substitute proposed by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], was offered the other evening. It has been discussed now, with a single exception, by gentlemen in favor of it. Until this morning no one has undertaken the defense of the plan submitted by the Judiciary Committee. On several occasions the committee have been about to come to a vote upon the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben, with every indication, so far as I could learn, that it would be adopted. I have been surprised at the passiveness of members of the Judiciary Committee, in view of this fact. The other day when I had occasion to offer some observation in regard to the proper organization of the court of appeals, with a view of increasing its capacity, and thus for the future avoiding the evil of delay in the administration of justice, the two gentlemen from Onondaga [Messrs. Comstock and Andrews], among other things, proposed to remedy this evil, by establishing a reform in the organization of the supreme court. I have been waiting to hear those gentlemen suggest something having that object in view, and have been expecting to hear them take a position against this substitute. I had supposed that when my friend Mr. Andrews, who proposed to relieve the court of appeals by a substantial reform in the organization of the supreme court, came into the Convention, he would take hold of the matter, and show some way in which this reform could be effected; but up to this time that gentleman has made no sign; notwithstanding the fact that the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], which from the first has appeared formidable and likely to be adopted by this Convention, is simply to retain the present organization of the supreme court, so far as I can see, without any attempt at or pretense of a reform. Now, if this reform cannot be effected, then we are all at sea again in regard to the question of the court of appeals And, although I have no plan of my own for the organization of the supreme court about which I am particularly tenacious, yet I feel that something ought to be done to correct the paramount evil under the present system, the overburdening of the court of appeals with business, which is constantly increasing. I wish this committee to understand one fact, that there has been a steady increase of business in the court of appeals ever since the organization of the present judicial system—an increase by which the accumulated business of that court is doubled every ten years. The first year after the adoption of the present Constitution, 1847, there were one hundred and nineteen causes taken into the court. Five years afterward, in 1852, there were two hundred and sixty causes. Five years afterward, in 1857, there were three hundred and sixty-two causes, and in the year 1862, five years after that, there were four hundred and ninety-seven causes. Now this increase of the business of the court of appeals, the accumulation, the delay in the disposition of causes, is the evil that we ought to remedy; and I ask the Judiciary Committee whether in view of this difficulty, it is wise or proper to allow the present system to be continued. If they think it is, then so be it. But our constituents have a right to expect that some remedy will be furnished for the evils of which I have spoken.

Mr. GOODRICH—Not having agreed with all the details of the plan for the organization of the supreme court, which has been presented by a large majority of the Judiciary committee, I have not felt called upon until now to take any part in the discussion, or to present that plan to which I was brought in the deliberations of the committee by my own reflections; but at this juncture in the debate, I rise for the purpose of moving as a substitute for the pending substitute for section 6 of the majority report, sections 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 of the minority report. In doing so, I beg the patience of the committee, while I briefly explain the considerations which induce the presentation of that plan on the part of the minority. That the reasons upon which my plan may be the better appreciated, I must call attention to the sections of the minority report. Section 6 of the minority plan provides that the State shall be divided into three departments, and that there shall be elected, in each of the three departments, by the electors of the department, twelve justices of the supreme court, and that they are to reside equally in each of the judicial districts of the department. The plan retains the present judicial districts, as they are now organized; the first department consisting of districts Nos. 1 and 2; the second of Nos. 3, 4 and 5; and the third department of Nos. 6, 7 and 8; and in providing for this organization in respect to the location and distribution of the residence of the judges, the purpose of the plan is to retain all the local conveniences of the present system, which are certainly great. Under this plan the judges in the several departments will reside, as now, in the judicial districts composing the department in equal numbers. The seventh section provides merely that these departments may be reorganized by the Legislature. The eighth section provides that the justices in each department shall, from time to time, and as often as necessary, designate one of their number as presiding justice. The presiding justices shall not act as trial judges, nor hold special terms nor grant orders reviewable in the supreme court; but they shall severally preside at the general terms in their respective departments. They shall likewise have the power of removal or appointment of the reporter of the supreme court. Section 9, which is the material section of the plan, provides that to each de-

Section 11 provides ...no judge of either the supreme court or the ...of appeals shall sit in review of his own ...ions. Mr. Chairman, it is undoubtedly true, ...in the organization of the supreme court ...reference is to be had to the court of ...als. The great defect which has hitherto ...and still is felt in that court, is its inability ...perform the large number of appeals that ...to it. The fact stares us in the face, that ...court has been and is likely still to be en...inadequate to the performance of the busi... which must come before it. As has already ...observed, the cases in that court have been ...ually increasing. There was a diminution ...ng the latter years of the war, but since the ...s closed, a marked increase is again to be ...ved, and in all probability that increase is to ...steadily year by year during the future ...y of the State. It is to be observed further ...we have now made one improvement in ...court which will, if the subordinate courts ...in as they now are, be likely to draw ...ll larger increase of business from the ...ary subordinate courts. Besides, it is to ...remembered that we have now established ...court of claims that is to dispose of ...the cases arising between the citizens and ...State, and from which an appeal is given ...ly to the court of appeals. Now, sir, with ...new supply and the appeals that must be ...ted to come from the ordinary courts, ...ugh we may provide for disposing of the ...accumulation of business in the court of ...how long will it be before a new accu...tion as large and oppressive as the present ...e again thrown upon that court, and the ...ature, or the State through some new Con...on, be called upon to add a remedy for such ...accumulation of business? How is all this ...remedied? For no doubt it is the great ...of the judicial system of the State. If ...are to rely upon temporary commissions ...the court of appeals, and if that is to be ...medy to be relied on as often as it becomes ...ssary, you strike a blow directly at the con...ce which is to be felt in that court; for no ...when he appeals to the court of appeals, can ...whether his case will be decided by the court ...whether it will be shuffled off into a tempo-rary commission to be decided and disposed of there. And in a court of last resort in the State, in so great a commercial State as this, such a defect, any want of reliance in the court, will be an evil of the greatest magnitude—one that will bring into disparagement the whole judicial system of the State. Against such a defect some full, adequate, clear remedy should, in my judgment, be provided. It seems to me that this Convention owes nothing so much to the people of this State as to provide that remedy against this defect in the re-organization of the courts of the State. That remedy has been demanded from all quarters—from the legal profession, from suitors and from business at large. One proposes that the business of that court shall be divided into equity jurisdiction, and common law jurisdiction, and that two courts of appeals shall be established, one to decide appeals in equity cases, and the other appeals in cases at law. Well, sir, if that be adopted, then it involves the necessity of doing away with the legislation of the last twenty years, including the Code, for which, I think few are prepared. Another suggestion has been made and defended here, of a dual court, a court, or one that shall consist of two working quorums; and after a full discussion it has been rejected by the committee. How, then, are we to find a remedy? How are we to provide for this oversupply of business which is certain to be thrown upon the court of appeals? Does any member of this body feel that this court, with its seven judges, and acting as a unit, will be capable of doing the business that it will have to do? I scarcely think that such can be the opinion of a single member of this body. Now, sir, my own reflections have brought me to the conclusion that the true remedy against this oversupply of business in the court of appeals, is to be sought for and obtained by improving the character of the supreme court, so as to enable it to command more largely than it has hitherto done, the confidence of suitors. I am not here to say that the judges of the supreme court have not been uniformly men of capacity, and men of the highest integrity. That bench does not now lack efficiency, it does not now fail to command the confidence of the people and of the suitors, for any such reason as that. Indeed, sir, I fully believe the capacity and integrity of the judges who have administered justice in the supreme court, cannot justly be questioned. Nor has that court failed to command the confidence of suitors, because it does not possess, largely, local conveniences. The conveniences referred to by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] undoubtedly do exist, and the existing plan of organization of the supreme court has doubtless been the parent of substantial benefits to the people of the State. It has diffused legal intelligence, it has strengthened the bar of the State, it has brought justice to the door of every citizen; and in these respects I agree entirely with the gentleman who has so eloquently commended the present plan of the supreme court. We are not therefore to seek any improvement by a change in these respects of the present system of that court; but there are undoubtedly defects in its organization, and that owing to them the court has failed to command the confidence of the bar, or of the people of the State, as largely as the character of its judges entitled it to do. One of these defects, in my opinion, is to be found in the fact that the court, while it consists of eight different branches, and each having jurisdiction co-extensive with the State, has its judges elected by local constituencies confined to the several districts. The judges of the first district, for instance, are elected by a constituency residing there, and in no other district. Now, I submit to gentlemen whether the application of the elective system to the election of judges of the supreme court under this organization has not tended to bring the court into disparagement. For when a suitor from without a district comes into it to argue his case before the general term, the judges of which are elected by his adversary, and not by himself, he fancies, however correctly or incorrectly, that that circumstance has had more or less to do with the decision of the court, if it proves to be against him. He fancies so — he believes so, although in fact that circumstance may not have had the slightest weight in producing the decision. Hence he impugns the motives of the judges, and in feeling that his case has been unfairly decided, he naturally appeals to the court of appeals for redress. But the great defect in the present organization of the supreme court undoubtedly is that its judges in all the districts are constantly reviewing the decisions which they themselves have pronounced. Now, this feature in the system, especially demands correction. In strictly analogous cases in the proceedings of the court itself, the practice is not allowed. The juryman, for instance, if he has already formed an opinion of the case he is called upon to try, is for that reason excluded as incompetent, by the very judge who is constantly allowed to sit in review of his own decisions. So, too, of one proposed as a referee, however capable and honest, still the judges refuse to appoint him (and properly refuse) if he already has an opinion of the merits of the case. The truth is, the influence of opinions or views already formed is too certain on the minds of even the honest and candid, to make it possible that they should rejudge with strict impartiality. And yet, organized as the supreme court now is, the appellant is always compelled to go to the general term with this influence against him on the part of at least one, and sometimes of more, members of the court. This is so in fact; but the case is even worse as the suitor often looks at it. For, where all the cases reviewed have been already decided by some of the members of the court, he conceives that they sympathize with and assist each other in upholding their previous decisions wherever it can possibly be done; and, in case he is beaten, he is ready to conclude that he has fallen a victim to a system of log-rolling on the bench, which, while it disparages the court, drives him to a further offer for relief. These, I say, are the views of the suitor, and often, it may be, of his counsel and friends. I am by no means asserting their correctness. On the contrary, I believe they are more often incorrect in fact. But that does not change the argument or lessen our obligations to supply, if possible, some different organization under which the court and suitors may meet on better terms — some organization which will relieve the court from any such disparaging reflections on the part of those whose cases it decides on appeal. And now, sir, I maintain that it is from these defects in the organization of the supreme court that so many causes go to the court of appeals. If, therefore, they can be removed, and a court of review in the supreme court be organized upon sounder principles and with a sufficient number of judges to command full confidence, I submit, whether appeals to our court of last resort would not be very much lessened. For myself, I have no doubt they would be lessened full one-half. The design of the plan I submit is to provide, if possible, such a court.

Mr. SPENCER—I will ask the gentleman if he ever knew of a party that was satisfied with a decision against him in which the question of law was in any way doubtful?

Mr. GOODRICH—It is not likely that an unsuccessful party would be satisfied; but this want of satisfaction may be greatly increased by the character of the court by which that result has been reached. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the report of the majority and to section 8, by which the majority of the committee propose that provision shall be made by law for designating from time to time the justices who shall hold general term, and also for designating the chief justices in the four departments. By their plan four of these justices are to hold the general term and three to form a quorum. Now, under these provisions, or under the provisions of the pending substitute, if you adopt the further provision proposed that no judge shall sit in review of his own decisions, it seems to me that the general terms that will be provided for, will be in constant confusion. At every general term possible to be organized under the plan of the majority of the committee, it must continually happen, that when a case is moved, one of the four judges has given an opinion in it below, which will prevent him from sitting for its review, and therefore he steps aside and leaves the case to be heard before the three judges. In the next case perhaps another judge is in the same situation as to that, and he is required to step aside when that is moved. But in all cases the disqualified judge still remains associated with the judges that do decide. Now, does it not strike every one that that will be unsatisfactory to the suitor? Will he not think, and perhaps justly think, that such judge, although he does not really participate in the decision, will, after all, from being with the judges that make it, have a very decided influence upon the determination they come to? The potent cause of prejudice to suitors is not, therefore, removed. It seems to me that the only effectual remedy is to entirely remove from the court and from all association with the judges holding the general terms the judge who has already pronounced his opinion in the case. I have, therefore presented a plan by which this will certainly be done. It proposes that the State shall be divided into three instead of four departments. I do this because one of the disparaging elements in the [illegible]sion of the supreme court arises from the [illegible] number of its branches, each constituting [illegible] independent tribunal, making, in fact, eight in [illegible]. Now, each of these eight courts are con[illegible]ly in conflict in their decisions with the [illegible] and these conflicts, however natural and [illegible]rable, yet, from occurring in the same court, [illegible]ad to the opinion that the court itself, in [illegible] branches, must necessarily be defective. [illegible] conflicts have already been discussed and [illegible]ded at great length on this floor; and all [illegible]es that to get rid of them, or to reduce them [illegible]uch as may be practical, will greatly tend to [illegible]ase the character of the court. The plan of [illegible]ee departments, therefore, must be preferable [illegible]ne and certainly far preferable to eight. In [illegible]ch of these three departments I propose there [illegible]ld be a presiding justice, to be designated by [illegible]e other justices of the departments, and to [illegible]reside at all the general terms within his department. That he may never be subject to the [illegible]harge of reviewing any decision of his own, I [illegible]further provide that the presiding justices shall [illegible]act at all as trial judges or hold circuits [illegible]or special terms, or grant reviewable orders; [illegible]so that they will always be free from the [illegible]disqualification arising from that cause. I [illegible]provide for the presiding justice for another [illegible]reason; it might without that provision be considered that the general terms would be unstable [illegible]and too transitory. Of the other four justices [illegible]who with the presiding justice, are to hold the [illegible]general terms in each department, two are to be [illegible]taken from each of the other departments; and [illegible]the five altogether, will, I think, constitute a [illegible]court that will be entirely free from all objection, [illegible]as a court of review. And, Mr. Chairman, let me [illegible]suggest that such a general term will be, not a [illegible]local court, as is the present supreme court; each [illegible]general term will be practically and to all intents [illegible]and purposes a State court, with judges from each [illegible]department, from all parts of the State, composing [illegible]. Suitors coming from one part of the State [illegible]before it in any section, however remote, would [illegible]see upon the bench two judges from their own [illegible]part of the State; with others, at the same time, [illegible]from other parts; while no one section would be [illegible]represented more than another; and thus each [illegible]general term would, under this organization, rise [illegible]from a local to a State court, in which all would [illegible]feel to confide for a just and impartial administration of the law. It seems to me, sir, that this [illegible]simple consideration would both add to the confidence of suitors, and, at the same time, give [illegible]weight and authority to the decisions of the general [illegible]terms. The city of New York, and the other [illegible]sections of the State would all be benefited by the [illegible]operation. So, too, would all sections. Reference [illegible]has been made on this floor, with what propriety [illegible]I will not undertake to determine, to some special [illegible]considerations affecting, unfavorably, the administration of justice in the supreme court in the large [illegible]cities, and more especially in New York. I submit whether its general terms thus organized and [illegible]held by judges from all parts of the State, would [illegible]not go far to supply a remedy for whatever evils [illegible]of this kind may prevail. Other advantages would [illegible]spring from them. Through the mingling of [illegible]judges from every part of the State, and the discussions and interchange of views which would follow, the tendency would be to lessen the conflicts in judicial decisions which otherwise might be expected to prevail, even under the three department system. In all respects, I believe the effects from such a commingling together of judges would be highly beneficial. And now, sir, why should not this plan be adopted? Twenty years ago the want of the facilities of travel might have been urged as an objection. Can that be urged now? In each of the three departments, there would be held, in all, in every year, twelve general terms, provided four should be held in each of the judicial districts as now. I submit that two in a district would answer the convenience of parties and the profession, as well as four; and that would require but six general terms in a department in a year. These the judges assigned to hold them, would be able with all ease to attend, and not be from home scarcely more than they now are—certainly not more than the judges of the court of appeals are required to be; for the terms would not occupy more than ten or twelve weeks of time in all, leaving the judges ample time at home for the decision of cases and the preparation of opinions. From the best information I have been able to obtain, the number of cases to be annually decided in a department would not be far from five hundred. Many of these would be readily decided, and others would require more time for their decision; but I have no doubt that three courts of five judges would find no difficulty in disposing of all the business, and keeping in all the departments the calendars clear. Will it be urged that to provide in the organic law for the composition and holding of these general terms, is going too much into detail — that all this should be left to the Legislature? I think otherwise. The truth is the Legislature will not be likely to do it. Besides, as the people of the State expect from this body a plan of courts which will remedy existing defects, in responding to the demand, if we fail so to change the organic law as to put it in the power of the Legislature to supply the remedy, we fall short of doing what is expected of this body, composed so largely of the members of that calling or profession that, of all others, should be best able to perfect the proper reorganization of the courts. How, sir, will the people know whether our work will be worthy of their acceptance or not, unless it bears upon its face precisely the scheme of courts which is proposed. The existing system is by no means intolerable. Many are of the opinion that, with all its defects, it is still the best that can be devised. At least, we can hardly expect that the people will be willing to adopt something else in place of it, without knowing what it is to be, without seeing precisely what it is, so as to be able to determine whether the change is desirable. Without further explanation, I submit the plan I have prepared to the consideration of the committee.

Mr. DALY—I am impressed with the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat. They are entitled to great consideration, as is every thing which proceeds from that gentleman. They are the result of mature consideration. I was impressed with them in the committee, and inclined to think favorably of his plan But, sir, the division into four departments was adopted by the committee from the fact that we were satisfied, by inquiries made by members of the committee in different parts of the State, during the long period that we were in session, that that plan was more generally acceptable than any other; that a territorial division into four departments would be more efficient for the dispatch of business, than the plan which the gentleman proposes. I, therefore, in common with a number of the other members of the committee voted for it. It was a plan between the proposition for three departments and the existing system of eight districts. We found the general sentiment throughout the State to be that the division of the supreme court into eight distinct or territorial parts, each independent of the other, was objectionable, as giving rise to too many conflicting decisions, and we thought that that could at least be avoided, in part, by reducing the number of districts or departments. After a very full consideration of the subject, and after a full expression of the views of the gentleman who has just sat down, views similar to those which he has stated here, the committee, by a large majority, decided upon four departments. We felt that a change was necessary, and that, in making it, the better course was to adapt it as far as possible to the wishes and views of those who are to be the most affected by it. The committee had among its members gentlemen belonging in different parts of the State, who had the opportunity of hearing the views of those who are most interested—lawyers in practice in different parts of the State—and the result of those inquiries, as expressed collectively in the committee, was, upon the whole, that a division into four departments was, in regard to their geographical distribution, in respect to their working and general efficiency, would be preferable to a division into three departments. For that reason, sir, in common with other gentlemen who, like myself, were at first impressed by the remarks of the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich], we concluded that a division of the State into four departments would be unobjectionable and more satisfactory than any that could be adopted.

Mr. PRINDLE—I have great respect for the Judiciary Committee and for the report which they have made to this Convention, and also for the gentlemen who made the minority report which is now under consideration. But I am not fully satisfied with either of those reports. Nor am I satisfied with the substitute which has been proposed by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer]. None of these propositions are sufficiently radical to meet my views of the case. I think there should be entire separation between the functions of the judge at circuit and the judge in banc. And in discussing very briefly these reports and propositions, I desire to read a proposition which I propose to submit when the opportunity shall occur.

"There shall be a supreme court having general jurisdiction in law and equity, subject to such appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeals as may be prescribed by law. The State shall be divided into three judicial departments t composed of the judicial districts now exist the first and second districts to compose the department; the third, fourth and fifth the se department, and the sixth, seventh and e the third department. There shall be in department four justices of the supreme who shall have appellate jurisdiction only shall hold the general terms, and eight ju of said court, any one of whom may hold s terms of said court, and circuit courts, and side in the courts of oyer and terminer in county."

It will be observed that the division of the into departments is the same as that propos the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodri his minority report—and I think it is as goo convenient a division as can be made. plan which I would propose, I would lea question of the term of office of the judges, to whether the present judges shall conti hold their offices or not, for further amen I hope this committee will vote upon the q alone, as to whether we are to return to circuit system, which I believe is the true us to adopt. I do not believe, as the gen from New York [Mr. Daly] suggests, tha necessary that we should make any comp in this matter. I do not believe that it is sary that we should have any such comp system as the report of the majority or of nority of this committee proposes. I thin is a plain and natural division of the labors judiciary in this State; and that is to have judges to perform the duties of the cir hold special terms, and to make orders, wh reviewable in the general term and to pr the courts of oyer and terminer. Let judges in banc, who are to attend to that of the business exclusively, and do nothi I have been surprised to hear so many ge in this Convention favor the plan of our judiciary. It seems to me that the plan respect at least, is most fatally defect embraces one defect at least, which called upon by the people of this State t nate from our Constitution, and that is judges who have presided at trials in the below to review their own decisions, or t the same court where those decisions be reviewed. I am surprised that we sh fuse a juror the privilege of sitting i in which he has expressed an opinion, an low a judge to participate in the decision in which he not only has expressed an opi has decided convictions and opinions, v nineteen cases out of twenty, it is utterly sible to remove. I do not think the repo majority of this committee helps this m all. I think this system is just as defecti allow a judge to sit in the same court u same bench where his decision shall be r as though he had a voice in the decisio proposed remedy does not go far enough, not effect a cure of this evil. For Judges A, B and C are to hold a gene Now, when the decision of Judge A to be reviewed, the two other judges will ask him, "What reasons had you for gi you have made in this case?" Of course I would not be backward in giving those reasons. It is human nature that he should be glad that his opinion should be sustained, especially when his convictions are that his decision was right. And the party who succeeded in the court below would never be without a very influential and able advocate in the court of general term, while the other party at the general decision would have no advocate at all. It seems to me that the remedy proposed by the committee would, if possible, make the matter worse; and the judges would be, if possible, more disposed to sustain each others decisions than they are at the present time. I do not wish to make any reflections upon the judiciary of this State, for I have a most profound respect for our judiciary, both as regards their integrity and their ability. And especially I may say this in regard to the judges in my own district with whom I am best acquainted. The evil of which I am complaining is the system, and not in the judges. Now, in this respect I am not quite satisfied with the report of the minority of the committee. There has been an endeavor made to eliminate this idea from the system by that report; but I do not think the effort has been entirely successful. The minority report proposes that there shall be a chief justice in each department, who shall preside in each department at general term, who shall have no circuit business, no special term business, and who shall grant no orders reviewable in the general term. It provides that two judges from each of the other departments shall be associated with him in that department, for the time being, to hold the general term. There is no provision in this report which prevents these two judges, taken from one of the other departments, from holding special terms and circuits in the department in which they are to hold the general term. And it may be quite possible that a judge will in the first place hold circuits in a department, and immediately afterward hold the general term there, and in that case he would sit upon the bench where his own decisions were reviewed. There are thirty-six judges in the State, according to the plan, constantly reviewing their own decisions, and I say that men would be superhuman with interest all the same, if the tendency would not be as it is now to sustain their own decisions at circuits and at special terms. Although there is this large number of thirty-six, their interests are all alike, and I say the natural tendency would be that they would sustain their own decisions. Now, I am in favor of so constituting the supreme court of this State that it shall be utterly impossible that judges can either review their own decisions or exert any sort of influence in the court that is to review them. I am in favor of effecting a radical cure for this disease in the system. The plan which I propose would be to have twelve judges in each department, the same as the minority report of the committee proposes. I would have four of those judges hold general terms and do no other business. I would have the other eight hold circuits and special terms, and preside at courts of oyer and terminer, granting orders, etc. What objection, I ask this committee, is there to any such plan as that which remedies all these defects of which we complain, of which the bar in this State complain, and of which the people in this State who have cases in courts of justice, complain If the division of labor is not correct, that can be amended. If we ought to have five judges to hold general terms, and seven judges to do the rest of the business, that can be done. I have adopted the division of four and eight because I thought that would come nearest to what is right. I ask, what objection is there to this system, and what objection do we hear raised? Why, the substance of the objection is, and I believe it is the only objection that has been made, that judges in banc become too technical unless they participate in the business of the trial of causes at circuits; that they are not fully qualified to sit upon the bench at general term, and decide cases, unless they can at the same time mingle their experience with the business of the circuits. This objection was alluded to, I recollect, by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], and has been alluded to by one or two others on this floor, but none of them, I believe, have seen any particular force in the objection. Now, that is the objection to this system, and it is altogether too fine for me to comprehend. I cannot understand it. I cannot see why a judge who has practiced for years and years at the bar, and tried causes at circuit, should be compelled to go down into the circuit and hold terms in order to qualify him to decide at the general term. I have read something of the debates of the Convention of 1846, and I have listened to gentlemen upon this floor, but I have been unable to see any particular point to the objection that is made to returning substantially to the old circuit system. What is there about the experience of the judge holding courts at general term, that should obliterate from his mind all that he has ever learned at circuit? What is there in the business of holding general terms, I say, that renders the past life of a man a total blank, so that he cannot profit by his experience? I believe we shall have far better judges at general term, if they do not hold circuits and special terms. A judge necessarily consumes a large amount of his time, when he goes to circuit and special term. Much of the business in which he is engaged in holding these terms is drudgery; much of it is a business that has no tendency whatever to improve his mind. It gives him no information; he learns nothing more than what he knew before. If we make a supreme court such that the judge shall do no business except in the general term, and confine judges exclusively to that and to study, I say we shall have a far better court, a far higher court, a far more learned court, than we shall if we compel these judges two-thirds of their time to travel about the country, holding circuits and special terms. Now, I have heard, upon this floor, and I have learned elsewhere, that in former times, under the old circuit system, we had good judges. I believe that no fault could be found, and no objections could be raised to such judges as Judge Kent. His mind was not dwarfed; he was not rendered incapable of presiding and hearing cases at general term because he was not compelled at the same time to participate in the business of the circuits. From the suggestions of gentlemen around me, I may be mistaken in regard to Judge Kent's not holding circuits, but many judges can be pointed to at least, who did not hold circuits or participate in any of that class of business, yet who were eminent, very eminent as judges. If there is any force in the objection I have mentioned, if there is any evil, we have incorporated it bodily into the court of appeals. We have provided the court of appeals, a court, the judges of which are to hold their office for fourteen years, and are not to participate in the business at circuits. Why was not this objection raised to the court of appeals if there was any force in it? Why, I believe for the simply reason that there is no force in the objection. We shall have, and it is believed on the part of this committee and this Convention that we shall have a better court of appeals, because none of the judges in that court are compelled to hold circuits. They can devote their time exclusively to the study of the law, and the investigation of law, and will not have their time consumed by mere routine in holding circuits. Now, sir, with these general terms which I propose, there can be no question that they will be capable of doing the whole business of the three departments. They are continuous courts; they do not sit for a month simply, but during the whole length of the term of office of the judges. That is an argument, I think, in favor of this system. The court cannot be constantly changed. It will be a more intelligent court, a court more familiar with the law, and a court which will abide by the precedents which it itself establishes, unless overturned by the court of appeals. Now, take this rotating court which is proposed by the minority report. Judges from the city of New York come out of that department into the interior and hold circuits; and judges from the country go into the city of New York. There will be a constant change, one set of judges holding circuits in a department one term, and in the next term another set of judges. The result will be a conflict of decision in that department and in the different districts, and we shall never know what the law is. We can get along very well, and have a decision in one district by one general term contrary to the decision of the general term of the district in which we live, because the court in our district will abide by its own precedents. But when you have the court constantly changing and migrating from one district to another, we shall never know what the law is in the district until the court of appeals has passed upon it. This must inevitably be the case. I think it is better that the judges should be permanently located in one department at least. It is not necessary, under this plan, that the judges should hold general terms in one place, as the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] suggests. They may hold general terms precisely as they do now, for the convenience of all the members of the bar in the department, changing from one district to another. Now, sir, I have said all I intend to say. These different plans that have been suggested do not meet with my views, and I am satisfied they do not meet the views of the majority of the ba the county in which I reside. I am satisfied they will not meet the views of the majority of people whom I represent, and I have felt it duty to say this much. I trust I shall ha chance before we go out of committee to pre this plan for its consideration.

Mr. RATHBUN—In addition to what has said by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr.] die], I wish to add my views in favor of the which he suggests, but I think with a qual tion which has not been named by him. not certain that he did not name it, beca was not in the Convention at the time he menced his remarks. I do not propose to into any discussion of the several ques arising under this proposed amendment, b confine myself mainly to the single proposit the three general terms of the supreme co the State. I am in favor of the least po number of general terms in the State com to perform all the business required of courts. Our eight general terms have pro failure in settling the law. Their deci although emanating from judges of repu and standing as men of decided integri ability, do not command the confidence people, as is shown by the record, the calen the court of appeals.

evidence in the courts which they have not in court as now organized. It would be, in my judgment, the height of folly to adopt that portion of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich], to wit: that in two years you shall overturn the general terms and bring from the districts other judges who have been engaged in the trial of causes, put them in the place of the general term, and send the general term judges back to the circuit to try causes there and at special term. What would be the general effect of this change? Those judges who have been trying cases and hearing arguments at special terms at the end of two years are to take a seat upon the supreme court bench hereby occupied by the other judges who have been reviewing and reversing their decisions. The first class of general term judges will have their judgments reversed and overturned from time to time by the court which they have just left. The decisions of that court would be in conflict with the decisions of the judges below, causes already decided will be re-argued and many of the decisions would be reversed, solely for the reason that the succeeding judges desired to establish the fact that they are as learned and able as the judges whom they have displaced. They will hold that they were right in decisions reversed by the first court, and the judges in the court who reversed their decisions were wrong. In this you have nothing settled. It will be a rotation in courts and decisions, the result will be the reversal and overturning of the decisions of the former court, just so often as you make this rotation in the judges.

Mr. SMITH—Will the gentleman allow me to inquire whether the same objection applies to the report of the majority of the committee?

Mr. RATHBUN—The gentleman must excuse me from answering this question. I have not read the report. I do not know whether the objection will apply or not. My belief is that if you will have a single court called the court of appeals competent to dispose of all the business in the State, you must reduce the number of general terms, and you must make those courts permanent. There must be no rotation. You must give them long terms; you must give them the same independence and the same stability you give to the court of appeals. Then you will find upon those benches just as able men, just as good men, just as honest men, as there will be on the bench in the court of appeals. And you will find that a question coming up from these three general terms, decided in the same way; the court of appeals will concur in the decision of those judges, and the law will be virtually settled before it reaches the court of final resort. Now, what we want, I apprehend, is stability and uniformity in the decisions of the supreme courts. We want none of these changes. I want no democracy upon the the bench. Judicial independence and firmness is necessary. I want ability; I want integrity; I want it to be a court with sufficient standing and duration of term of office to make it feel itself a power, and entitled to respect, and it will be so. This proposition on the part of the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich], in my judgment, does not improve the character of the supreme court as now organized. It will not obstruct appeals at all. It cannot do it, because it is a changeable court; it changes all its members every two years. What can you expect of a court, changing every two years, in regard to the uniformity of decision? It is not possible to find it. It would be a miracle if you should find three judges upon the bench for two years, and then displace them for three circuit judges who would continue the decisions of the first court in a direct line of uniformity. It is the very essence of change, not only in the men, but in the decision of cases arising from the four former members of the same court. What is the trouble with the court of appeals at the present time? It is that every year we put into that court four judges from the supreme court, an equal number with the regular judges of that court. In the first place they cannot go on and do business for a term or two as it ought to be done because they do not understand each other. The justices from the court below are unaccustomed to that court; they must learn something of the routine and manner of doing business. Again, from the time of their entrance into that court until their exit therefrom each of them has probably some case to decide, so as to be able to say that he had been right in some of his decisions overruled in that court long before his advent there. The difficulty is that they carry up motives and intentions which never should enter upon the bench of a court, and which never will if you have a permanent bench. This principle of change in the court is the very essence of mischief and instability in the decisions of that court. It is not only that, but it is worse. It is the cause of the delay of business. The general complaint against that court to-day is that it stands with a large calendar, which, in my belief, had you made it a permanent court with seven judges, or five judges, it never would have had. Now, in regard to the conclusions of my friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] for holding on to the present system for the sake of convenience. I can see how that is. He lives in Troy and the general terms are held in Albany. It is convenient for him. I reside in Auburn, upon the eastern boundary of the seventh district; the terms are held in Rochester in the north-western corner of the district, near Lake Ontario and near the western line of the district. I am compelled to travel seventy-eight miles to the general and special terms. That is not very convenient. But the gentlemen forgets that the members of the bar in Sullivan, in Ulster, and the members of the bar in Delaware and Chenango, and all along the line in the sixth district, ranging nearly two hundred miles, are not quite so conveniently situated. And so in regard to the fifth district. In that district the general terms are all held at the city of Syracuse. That is very convenient for the court. It is convenient and pleasant for gentlemen who live at Syracuse, or within a few hours' travel. But when you go out into the northern part of the State, when you come down to Herkimer and go into the country thirty or forty miles, where there are no railroad facilities, it is not quite so convenient. These things depend entirely upon circumstances. They do not depend upon the question of the establishment of three districts, but upon the particular locality of the members of the bar who reside in various parts of the State, away from points where the general terms are held. Now a more inconvenient place for Cayuga county could not be selected in the seventh district than the one where our general terms are held. I am within twenty-six miles of the general term in the fifth district, which is held four times a year. Yet I cannot go there. The judges would frown upon the bar in my locality if they were to go there with their business—and we are shut out because we feel and see, and hear from the judges when we go there, that we do not belong there, but in another district. Under the Constitution of 1846 it was understood that we were to have the supreme court ride up before our doors, stop there and hear our cases, and then go on somewhere else in pursuit of business. The court of appeals were to go around with their hats in their hands and ask for the argument of cases to be disposed of on the spot, so that a man could go on with his plowing and the hoeing of his corn without loss of time. What is the result? Just what it has always been. The court remains in existence a permanent body, and its influence finally procured a permanent settlement at Albany. This is as it should be, but it is not what was promised. Justice was to be carried around and peddled out as men peddle out ice at Albany in the summer time. The supreme court judges can travel much more conveniently and with less expense seventy-eight miles than all the members of the bar of a county. They can hold general terms throughout the State, where they are now held; there can result no inconvenience by the proposed change. Let us see how that may be. Suppose, three, or four judges of the supreme court shall be assigned to hold general terms. Each bench has two of the present districts and may hold terms the entire year. How long are the general terms now held in the several districts? Never, I believe, over two weeks, and generally but one. The Legislature has power to say that they shall be held at the same places as at present. Is there any thing wrong in that? Will any one be incommoded by it? Certainly not, because the judges can attend at those place, and hold the general terms of two weeks each —that is, sixteen weeks out of the fifty-two in which the judges will be engaged upon the bench. The balance of the time they will have to decide cases. I wish that court to be so organized and so established that the bar of this State will look upon it and with truth be able to say, that our general term is really just as good, able, and competent as the court of appeals. And the moment you reach that point, as you will reach it, your appeals to the court of appeals will fall off. The court of appeals will be literally a mere court of appeals to harmonize conflicting decisions between the several courts. They can perform that business, and if the judges of that court are not entirely mistaken in regard to their power to transact business, they can take the present calendar and clear it of all the accumulated business, and dispose of that a all other business that will be continually comi before it. That is the opinion of several of t judges in that court. I cannot see why it m not be true. I am satisfied that as soon as th several general terms are organized, and t judges elected for that purpose, that moment o machinery will begin to work and the people w be satisfied with it. Then the desire to app will abate more than three-fourths, and I belie seven-eighths within the first year.

Mr. SMITH—This is a very important questi as all will readily admit. It perhaps involves t only question upon which men must differ opinion. And as the time has almost arrived our adjournment, I move that the committee now rise and report progress.

The question was put upon the motion of Smith, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRE IDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. C. C. The question was put on granting leave, an was declared granted.

Mr. HALE—I move that the Convention t a recess until seven o'clock.

The question was put on the motion of Hale, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention took a recess.

Not long ago I put the question to one of our most intelligent and upright judges, who now occupies a seat upon the bench of the supreme court, and does credit to his position. I said to him: "Do you think, sir, that it is suitable and proper to permit judges to sit in review of their own decisions?" He replied: "No, sir, I do not; for, however honest a man may be, however upright in his intentions, while human nature remains unchanged, he will be more or less influenced by pride of opinion." And, as I said the other day upon this floor, many members of the bar and many suitors, believe that there is a practice of log-rolling in getting cases through the general term. Now, I do not know that any thing of the kind exists. Indeed, I have no doubt that the extent and magnitude of the evil are greatly exagerated in the minds of suspicious persons, if it exist at all. I have no personal grievances to complain of. So far as my own practice is concerned, my success has generally been quite as good, doubtless, as I have deserved. I have no charges to make against any of our judges, but only speak of the fact of the existence of this suspicion. Whether it be well founded or not, makes no difference in this discussion, because the tendency in either case is to destroy confidence in the system. There can be no greater evil connected with any judicial system that we may have, than a want of confidence in its administration of justice. Another difficulty, to which allusion has before been made, is the great conflict of decisions in our eight supreme courts, or branches of the supreme court, if gentlemen prefer that expression. Now, I submit to every one who has had any experience under our present system, that this is a great evil. To honest lawyers, who desire to advise their clients properly—to advise them for their own good—to tell them what the law is—this conflict presents a very serious embarrassment. Upon many questions the conflict is so great that no conscientious lawyer will undertake to advise his client what the law is, or how it will be held by the general term, or the court of appeals. To a dishonest lawyer, if such a person can be found, our present system affords facilities for multiplying litigation, and pushing his cases through to the court of last resort, because he can always find decisions to justify it, upon whatever side of whatever question he may happen to be engaged. Sir, if I were to practice law in disregard of all obligations of morality and honor, seeking merely to make money out of the profession, without regard to the interests of my clients, or the interests of the State, I would not disturb the present system. There never was, I believe, a system under the sun that engendered so much expensive and unsatisfactory litigation, as our present system. The law should be certain, it should be uniform, it should be plain—so plain and so certain that every intelligent lawyer could advise his clients with credit to himself and safety to them. Under the present confused and uncertain state of things, when a client comes into our office for advice, and we go to our books to ascertain the law of his case, we are met with conflicting decisions upon the same point, and often find it very difficult to advise with any confidence or safety. We look at a decision, and the first question is, who made it? what is his standing and ability as a judge? to what weight is his opinion entitled? Instead of looking, as we did under the old system, to see what the supreme court of the State had decided the law to be, we have to compare these conflicting views—decisions made by different judges in different parts of the State, and out of a maze of conflict and confusion extract the law, or rather what we think the law ought to be. So it comes to pass that the best guesser is the most successful lawyer. And oftentimes what was plain before is made utterly unintelligible by these conflicting and long-winded decisions which "darken counsel." Now, some of the results of these evils to which I have alluded are these: In the first place, the law is rendered uncertain. In the second place, the administration of the law, and the law itself is brought into contempt before the people. In the third place, the court of appeals is clogged, and justice practically denied to the people. I have no doubt that appeals to the court of appeals would be diminished by one-half if we had a supreme court whose decisions were reliable—decisions in which the people, the suitors and the bar had confidence. And, again, it makes justice difficult and expensive, far more so than it would be under a simple, uniform system, in which all had confidence. And this, in itself, is a great evil, because justice should be rendered as cheap as possible, and should be made attainable to the poorest and most humble individual in society. But as it is, under the present state of things, justice is expensive and difficult, for often we cannot obtain it without going through all the courts from the lowest to the very highest; and then, even we are frequently left in doubt whether we have obtained justice. These, in brief, are the evils in the present system which, in my judgment, need correcting. The next question that naturally arises is, what are the desirable features, if any, in our present system? If it has features which are desirable, we should not ignore them, we should not discard them altogether, and introduce something entirely new, for there is always more or less evil in change of any kind. We had better endure some inconvenience than to make a change. There is one feature in the present system which is very desirable and which ought to be retained, and that is the convenience to the bar, and to suitors, in the general and special terms being brought home to the doors of the people. Under the old system there was great inconvenience in this particular as all know who were familiar with it. The general terms were held at Albany, Utica, Rochester, and New York; and most of the members of the bar throughout the State never appeared before these tribunals to argue their causes. They could not afford to do so. The litigants could not afford to pay them to go from their homes to these distant places, and there remain for weeks, dancing attendance upon the supreme court at general term, waiting the call of their cases. The result was, that most of the special and general term business was done by a few individuals located at these places. This was not only a great inconvenience to the bar, but a serious detriment to suitors. It deprived lawyers of the privilege and benefit of arguing their own causes, and also deprived suitors of the benefit of that intimate knowledge which every competent and faithful attorney acquires of his client's cause. Such an attorney is better qualified to do justice to his cause than a counsel overwhelmed with business, who takes up a case upon a brief furnished to his hand, and presents it to the court without any previous knowledge of the case. I have heard, and believe that, on one occasion, when the celebrated counsel, Marcus T. Reynolds and Samuel Stevens, were arguing motions by the basket full before the supreme court at Albany, Mr. Reynolds took up a case and presented an argument on one side. At the close of his argument Mr. Stevens said: "Mr. Reynolds, have you not made a mistake, are you not on the wrong side?" Mr. Reynolds looked over his papers and found that he was mistaken, and had made an argument on the wrong side of the case. The result was, the case was submitted on the argument of Mr. Reynolds and decided against him. It was considered a good joke by the bar, but was not, probably, very much relished by Mr. Reynolds' client. I have no doubt, also, that the feature of our present system under consideration tends to elevate and educate the bar, as was so forcibly said this morning by the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend]. And, therefore, for these reasons this feature is desirable and ought to be retained. The next inquiry which I propose to make is this: Which of the proposed schemes would afford the best remedy for existing evils, and retain the desirable features only of the present system? It seems to me that this is the proper question for us to discuss and consider. Here are various schemes now pending before this body, and the true question is, which of them will most effectually remedy acknowledged existing evils, and, at the same time, retain the features which are desirable in our present system. And I will first speak of the plan proposed by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. Although that is not properly before the body, it has been discussed, and, as it will hereafter be offered, I may as well allude to it in this connection as at any other time. In the first place, that prevents judges sitting in review of their own decisions. It does that most effectually. So far as that is concerned it certainly is a good system. There is no doubt on that point, because, as I understand that plan, it is substantially the old nisi prius system. It provides for one set of judges to sit in banc, doing no circuit business, and another set for circuit or nisi prius business. Therefore, of course, they are entirely disconnected, and no judge can sit in review of his own decisions. In the second place that system secures more certainty and uniformity in decisions. It provides for a bench of judges sitting permanently at general term, day after day and week after week, year in and year out, and there must be, of course, uniformity in their decisions. This would be a great improvement upon the present system. In the third place, it would command the confidence of the bar and of suitors, and diminish the number of appeals, for the reasons already stated. And it might be added in its favor also that it has the feature of plicity. There is great simplicity in it; every man understand it. Nor do I feel the force of objection that is made to that system—that ges who sit in banc need the alternation of experience in order to keep them in tune. understand the objection it is, that judges o sit in banc need the practice which they re at the circuit in order to aid them in the charge of their duties at the general term. I ess I am unable to feel the force of this ob-ion. There may be something in it, but I do perceive it. But I would desire to inquire of gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] or other gentleman who may favor that system. ther it is not open to the objection of incon-nience in the general and special term practice. uld there not be the same inconvenience that ached to the old system? Would it not tend remove from the bar and from suitors the gen-l and special terms, and result in centraliza-—the same evil experienced under the old stem?

Mr. PRINDLE—I believe, under this system, at the Legislature could provide that general ms should be held precisely as they are now. ere is nothing hindering that. It could be pro-ded for there as well as by the Constitution.

Mr. SMITH—That may be so. I put the ques-n for information, because I had not learned at the ideas of the gentleman were on that int. It is possible that the Legislature would ovide against that difficulty, but I do not, for e, like to leave much to the Legislature. I think e bar of the State and the people desire to have presented to them in this Constitution, a distinct, ear, perfect system. They do not care to have ny thing left, or, at least, not much left to the egislature. They want to know before they ote on this Constitution, whether they are to ave any remedies for existing evils or not, and hey desire to see just what those remedies are. And that is one reason why I like the minority eport better than the majority, because it goes further in the same direction, and perfects a sys-em which is merely blocked out in the majority report. I next propose to inquire in regard to the minority report. In the first place, Mr. Chair-man, that provides effectually against judges sit-ting in review of their own decisions. There is no doubt about that. It leaves nothing to the Legislature. It not only prevents judges from sitting in review of their own decisions, but it re-moves them entirely from the court that does sit in review of such decisions. They can neither sit in review of their own decisions nor can they sit in the court that reviews them. I do not know whether this system is fully understood by all or not, as I have not been here during the whole of the discussion, but it strikes me that the general term provided for by it has some features of great merit. I understand the plan to be this: that the State is divided into three depart-ments; that in constituting the general term you have, in the first place, a presiding judge, or chief justice, who resides in his department and sits during his entire term as chief justice, presiding over the general term. You then draw from the other depart-ments four judges—two from each, and these five judges constitute a general term and sit in banc during, I think, the period of four years. They are to go from district to district as may suit the convenience of suitors and the bar, thus avoiding the inconvenience of the old system. It will be seen at a glance that no judge sitting at general term could review his own decisions, because the chief justice does not do circuit or special term business, and the judges drawn from the other departments do no circuit or special term business in the departments in which they sit at general term. They come in, strangers to the parties and the lawyers; they know nothing and consider nothing but the law and the facts of the cases that come before them, and decide questions upon their merits. I recollect that some years ago, upon the occasion of Justice Wilde, of the supreme court of Massachusetts, retiring from the bench (he had occupied the bench longer than any other judge in England or America, except one), there was a meeting of the bar and an address presented to the court. Chief Justice Shaw, then occupying the bench, made a reply, to which I had the pleasure of listening. He remarked in regard to Justice Wilde, that in the decision of his cases he regarded the parties merely as algebraic signs by which to work out the legal problem. Now, Mr. Chairman, in my estimation that is the beau ideal of a judge; an upright, intelligent man, sitting in the seat of justice, and regarding the parties merely as algebraic signs by which to work out the legal problems before him. In the next place, this system of the minority report decreases the conflict in decisions by cutting down the number of general terms from eight to three. Under our present system we have eight general terms constantly multiplying their conflicting decisions; but under this plan of the minority report there are but three departments, and of course three general terms, which would greatly mitigate the evils from which we now suffer. In the fourth place, the minority plan retains the good features of our present system, its convenience and decentralization to which I have made allusion. It provides for holding special and general terms in the districts as they are now held, thus enabling every lawyer to attend upon them and do his own business. It not only remedies the evils that exist, but retains the good features of our present system, which seems to me to be very desirable. But I have heard it objected during the discussion, that this plan is defective, inasmuch as there might be a lack of uniformity in the decisions in the same department, there being a succession of judges, holding only for a limited period. I confess that this feature is the only one that has struck me as doubtful in the scheme. There may be something in the objection, though I do not attach very much weight to it. I think that while it might tend to uncertainty in the decisions at general term in each department, that evil would be compensated by the tendency of the system to secure uniformity of decision between the different departments. The interchange of judges between the different departments would tend to promote harmony of decision throughout the State. While, therefore, there might be some danger of a lack of uni formity in the same department, I think that would be amply compensated by this tedency to produce a uniformity between the different departments. There is another feature, also, that tends to obviate this objection. The chief justice is sitting all the time at general term; he presides from the beginning to the end of his term, and this would tend to create uniformity and stability in the court, and prevent contrariety of decision. I come now to the majority report; and, as I understand it, the minority and majority reports do not differ in principle. There is no antagonism between them. The only difference is, as I have already suggested, that the minority report goes further in what I regard as the right direction, and perfects a system which is only blocked out in the majority report. Therefore, I trust that the committee who made the majority report, and other gentlemen who may favor it, will not regard the remarks that I have made on the minority report as in antagonism to their report, or as at all disparaging to their labors. I suppose the minority report embodies the fruits of the long and patient investigation and discussions of the whole committee. The majority report provides that judges shall not sit in review of their own decisions. In that respect it is what it ought to be. It is in the right direction. It relieves to some extent from the evil to which I have made allusion; but it does not, in my judgment, go quite as far as it ought to. It does not exclude the judges, as I understand it, from sitting on the bench while their decisions are reviewed, and exercising an influence upon the result, although they do not actually participate in the decision. They are not excluded from the court that sits in review. I should prefer, therefore, to go further in that direction, and entirely remove from the court of review a judge whose decisions are reviewed. He should not only be prevented from participating in the decision, but should be excluded from exerting his influence upon other members of the court.

Mr. DALY—Does the gentleman think that a judge whose decision is under review could, under a provision of this kind, or under any analogous provision, sit as a member of the court pending that argument?

Mr. SMITH—I do not understand that under this provision he could sit strictly as a member of the court while his decision was under review, but still he would be a member of the court generally that sits in review, and could exert his influence upon the decision. He participates, or may, so far as I understand it, in the argument and decisions of all other cases except those which he has decided in the court below. He stands aside during the argument of cases which he has decided, but it is supposed by some that judges might and would still use their influence improperly; and therefore it seems to me that we ought to provide against the very appearance of any evil in this regard.

Mr. BARKER—Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement in regard to the section reported by the committee. A department for the purpose of giving a general term unites two districts. From these eight judges a chief justice is to be selected, and it is proposed that he preside at the general terms in each of these districts, and that there will be assigned to hold a general term in the sixth district, if you please, the judge who discharged circuit duty and special term duty in the adjacent district, the seventh, if you please; and when you come to hold a general term in the seventh district the chief justice will be there who does no circuit duty and with the judges of the other districts, and thereby you get a general term in which a judge who acts at nisi prius or special term is not reviewing his own decision, and you thereby bring home to the suitors and to the profession these general terms to be held promptly and where litigation will be speedily disposed of, and you avoid this sending litigation to distant business centers, which was the system prior to 1846, and which was dispensed with by the Constitution of 1846.

Mr. SMITH—I would inquire of the gentleman whether the system as presented in the majority report, presents these features to which he has alluded.

Mr. BARKER—Most certainly it does.

Mr. SMITH—I did not propose to give in detail these different plans, and if I have in any particular misapprehended the plan of the majority I shall be very happy to be corrected. My only design is to run a parallel between the different schemes presented here, to see which is the best. My object is to draw, if possible, out of these various schemes the best that can be devised. I have no prejudice against any one of them. There are many features in the majority report that I like very much, and I like them so well, that I am disposed to carry them still farther than the committee have done. If I am wrong in my view of the majority plan, if it does embody fully the features that I am trying to commend, I shall be entirely satisfied with it. The majority scheme also goes in the right direction in reducing the number of the supreme courts, or the branches of the supreme court, from eight to four. That would be a great relief; but I should prefer to go still further, if we can do so safely, and reduce the departments to three instead of four. But I had not understood, before the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Baker] interrupted me, that this plan did provide specifically for the organization of a general term. I had supposed that was to be left to the Legislature; but if I am mistaken on that point, and it is as the gentleman states, I shall be glad to know it. I suppose, also, Mr. Chairman, that this scheme of the majority is intended to retain the desirable features of our present system, to wit, the convenience of general and special terms, and also the decentralization to which I have alluded. But still, as I have before said, it had not seemed to me, from the examination I had been able to give the report, that it perfected the organization of the general term, but had left too much to the Legislature. We see by the difficulty that we here experience in arriving at conclusions, and securing harmony of views, how difficult it might be to obtain proper provisions from the Legislature; and while we have the subject under consideration it would, it seems to me, be wise to perfect a system which would satisfy the bar and the people of the State. I trust that gentlemen re not members of the legal profession, remember that, in providing a good judiciary m, we are not laboring for the bar of the e of New York alone. True, the members e legal profession throughout the State are ly interested in the matter, yet the judiciary m is emphatically for the people. It is the m by which government administers justice, ces the law, and protects the rights of all— west as well as the highest; and laymen e as much interest, nay, more interest in this r than the profession, and I hope we may be to arrive at a conclusion that will be satisry to all. I have only indicated these general s, and do not propose to go into an elaborate sion of the subject, or into details. So far have been able to examine the matter, I d be willing to adopt the system proposed e gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. were entirely satisfied that it would secure convenience of the bar and suitors, and prent centralization which was a serious evil under d system. Next to that it seems to me, the nority report provides the best plan that has n presented. But I think the minority report a great improvement upon our present system, d we can do no better, I shall certainly sus- it, in most of its features, and rejoice that have done so well.

Mr. HALE—Reference was made by the gen- an from New York [Mr. Daly] in some re- ks that be made this morning or yesterday ting to the action of the Judiciary Committee the organization of the supreme court, and ng had the honor to be upon that committee. ot having introduced a plan here which varies m the one reported by the majority of that mittee, I wish to say a word in explanation of course and position of the Judiciary Commit- upon that subject. I think the distinguished tleman from New York [Mr. Daly] was mis- en in saying that with reference to the organi- on of the supreme court there was unanimity that committee. Besides the dissent of the tleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich] there re at least two upon that committee, the gen- an from Oneida [Mr. Kernan] and myself, re were always in favor of a system which uld separate entirely the functions of the ges who sit at general term from those who t at nisi prius. A proposition was introduced— bstantially like that read for the information the committee to-day, by the gentleman from enango [Mr. Prindle]—providing for an appel- e bench, the judges of which were not to per- a circuit duty, and for judges to sit in the ferent districts and perform circuit duty. No nority report was presented for the reason that on matters of detail there were other differ- es, and it was thought better that, as we con- red in the main features of the report, we uld present it as adopted from time to time by e majority of the committee, and express our ews whenever we dissented from any portion en the matter came before the Convention. I ght perhaps without impropriety state further at the very close of the deliberations of the mmittee this feature with regard to the organi- ation of a supreme court had been changed so much that the majority of those who were pres- ent then were inclined and did actually vote to adopt a system substantially like that read here by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr Prindle]. I make these remarks that it may not be under- stood, as I think it naturally might from the re- marks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], that the committee regarded themselves bound to support the report which was made to the Convention in all its particulars. It was un- derstood that upon that subject there would be dissent when we came before the Convention, by various members of the committee. I desire to say a word or two in reference to the objection which was intimated by the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker], to the plan proposed by the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich], upon the ground alleged by him that the general term divided into three departments would not be able to perform the business of the State. It was stated by the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker], I think, that the number of appeals in the third department under Mr. Goodrich's plan, would be some six hundred; and it was argued from that that one court could not dispose of them all. Now, the ability of the court to dis- pose of these causes does not depend upon the number of causes that are appealed. It is known that very many of these causes which are upon the general term calendar require but comparatively little argument and little consideration. Indeed, many of them are appealed simply for the purpose of delay; and it cannot be determined by the number of causes what time would necessarily be occupied in hearing and determining them. But there is a way in which I think we can get at it, and which I think demonstrates that a general term, capable of division into three departments. can perform all the general term duty of the State. There are held in this State every year, thirty- four general terms of the supreme court, four in each of the judicial districts other than the first, and six in the first district. In my district it is very seldom that a general term occupies more than a week. I understand that is the case in most of the districts except the first. In the eighth district, I am informed that the general term very seldom occupies more than a week. In New York they are longer. In the second district they are some times two weeks, never more Now, let us suppose that the average duration of the general term is two weeks, I am sure it is not any greater than that, I think that is a very liberal allowance. We have then in the eight districts sixty-eight weeks of general term to be held during the year. We have three courts to accomplish that business, Each of these divis- ions, each of these general terms then will have between twenty-two and twenty-three weeks to sit at general term. The remainder of the year, over half the year, they will have for the examination and decision of the causes which are not decided upon the argument Now, I would ask if there is any difficulty in judges who have no other duty to perform except to sit at general term, if they are obliged to sit at general term only half the year, deciding the causes which they are not able to decide on the argument in the other half year? It seem-to me there can be no difficulty if this plan is adopted. Three general terms in the State can easily perform all the duties that devolve upon the appellate branch of the supreme court. In regard to these different plans, as I stated in the remarks which I made last week, I prefer the plan presented by the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich] to that of the majority of the committee, for one reason, which I mentioned then, that the number of general terms is less—three instead of four; and secondly, I think the feature in his system, by which four-fifths of the numbers of the general term are constantly drawn from other departments than those in which the terms are held, is valuable; that it will correct one evil which has been commented upon by a great many upon this floor, and which I will not enlarge upon—that of having judges review decisions which, if not their own, are made by associates of theirs who are constantly sitting with them.

Mr. FOLGER—Where does the gentleman find that feature in the report of the minority?

Mr. HALE—It is in document 117, section 9.

Mr. FOLGER—Does that section contain that provision to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. HALE—I understand that it does.

Mr. FOLGER—I do not find it. It leaves it to the Legislature.

Mr. HALE—The gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich] can say; I understand that his report provides for five judges; that one shall be the presiding judge of the department, and the four others shall be taken, two from each of the other departments, so that but one judge who sits at general term will perform circuit duty in the department where he sits at general term. Am I right? I would like to know from the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich] if I have stated it correctly.

Mr. GOODRICH—It is in section 9.

Mr. HALE—It is so; section 9, of document 117. The gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] will find that the composition of the general term is as I stated. But, although I shall vote for the substitute of the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich] as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], still there are other plans proposed here which I prefer. I prefer the plan suggested by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], which, like that of Mr. Goodrich, divides the appellate branch of the court into three divisions, but confines the judges who are elected for that purpose, to general term duty. In detail, perhaps, I should not acquiesce in all the features of the proposition of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. I think, for instance, that the appellate bench might better be elected by the people of the whole State, as is proposed by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke], and as was proposed in the amendment which I offered last week, and which was voted down by the committee. I think that plan has advantages over that presented either by the majority or the minority of the committee. As I said before, it is a plan which met with considerable favor in the Judiciary Committee. The objection which was made to that plan by the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith], that it would tend to centralization, and would do away with the conceded benefits of the present system in having general terms in all parts of the State, is not, I think, well founded. There would be no difficulty in a provision by the Legislature, if the general term was so constituted, for an appellate bench so constituted to hold general terms in all the districts of the State precisely as they do now. Four general terms are held in each district, and under the plan proposed by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] there would be no difficulty whatever in holding four general terms every year, if it is desirable, in each district, still. The gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] argued against all the plans that have been proposed as substitutes for the present system, both the majority plan and that of Mr. Goodrich, and it would apply equally to Mr. Prindle's plan, upon the ground, as he said, that suitors and lawyers would be compelled to go great distances to attend general terms. Why, Mr. Chairman, that is entirely within the control of the Legislature. It is easy, under any system that has been proposed here, to provide by a judiciary act that causes shall be noticed for argument only in the districts in which they are triable. My friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] would not be in danger of being taken up to Plattsburgh or to Buffalo to argue his causes which originated in the third district. It might be so provided under any of these plans, precisely as it is now. It is a feature of the present system which all concede to be valuable, that general terms should be held in each district, and that causes should be noticed for argument only in the districts in which they were triable; and I would say to my friend from Rensselaer that under the present system, it is the Legislature and not the Constitution that gives these conveniences. The Constitution of 1846 does not provide that general terms shall be held in each district, and that causes shall only be noticed in the district in which they are triable; it is in the judiciary act that we get that provision, not in the Constitution. Therefore it is unjust toward the majority report and toward all these plans that have been offered in place of it, to say that any of them are inferior to the present system in that respect, because there is not one of them that does not go just as far as the present system in requiring that causes shall be argued in the district in which they arise—that is, none of them make that provision positively, but they all leave the matter in the hands of the Legislature, which will no doubt exercise that power in the future as it is already done under the present system. I have said that, as between the propositions pending before the committee, I am in favor of that proposed by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] or by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] separating entirely appellate and banc duties. In the plan which I offered the other day, and which seemed not to be clearly understood by all, my idea was to try to obviate the objection which was sometimes made to separating judges completely either from banc or from nisi prius duty. By the plan which I offered, twelve judges would be elected for the State. Those judges were t power to sit at general terms and also to circuits. The justices or circuit judges, or however you may call them, were to be elected by electors of each district, and were to hold terms and were also to be allowed to sit at general term. In order that the greater part of the State duty might be performed by those State officers elected by the people at large, I proposed a provision that the general term should be held by not less than three judges, or two judges and a justice; and a further provision that no justice should be allowed to sit at general term in the case for which he was elected. It will be seen that under that plan both the judges and the district or circuit judges would be allowed to participate in both kinds of duty. As between that system, however, which provides for the election of all of these judges by the same constituencies (if I can term them such) and other propositions which have been made here which propose an entire separation of banc and circuit duties, I am in favor of the latter; and I think that the simplicity and unity which we should get by the adoption of a plan substantially like that of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] would more than compensate for any fancied advantage —or I think the advantage is to some extent avoided—of combining both duties in the same judge.

Mr. BARKER—It seems to me that, as this discussion has now proceeded so far, it is proper to offer a few suggestions in vindication of the report of the majority of this committee. It is well to bear in mind that, in organizing a supreme court, we bring into existence the only tribunal of general and original jurisdiction in the State, and its organization contemplates two things, offering facilities for the trial of causes at nisi prius, special term business, and also affording to suitors an opportunity for a review of their cases, upon an appeal, in the same court; and the only point of difference presented in the different propositions is as to the mode and manner in which the court called a general term, in which the first appeal from the hearing at nisi prius is to be heard, shall be organized. I shall occupy the attention of the committee but a few moments, and I will proceed briefly to discuss the objection which is made to the present system. In the first place, allow me to state it, for it seems not to have been yet stated, though all of us are, I suppose, familiar with it. We have, under the present system, a general term, in which are heard on appeal the questions decided by referees, and the trial of causes at special term and at circuit, and where the first review is had of all questions raised in criminal proceedings. That court is composed of four judges, and by practice, though not by constitutional provision, it is composed of the judges who reside in the respective districts. Now, I ask lawyers and laymen what are the objections to this court as it is now organized? We have listened to much debate upon this subject, but I believe only two serious objections are made. The first is that the judge in that court sits in review of his own decisions, and the next is that there being four of these courts there is conflict of decisions in the supreme court, and not that degree of uniformity prevails which is desirable and which gives to suitors the idea that they have not had an intelligent and impartial hearing. Now, in regard to the first objection, in my opinion, it is more imaginary than real, and if a judge who is sitting in review of his own decisions will become partial and prejudiced because he stands committed to a decision in the haste of a circuit trial, I assure suitors and lawyers that if a judge wishes to urge partial views and opinions, in disposing of the business before him, he will have the least opportunity at general term. But I yield, and the committee has yielded to this objection on the part of the profession, and they propose to avoid it, and how? By uniting in a territorial department, two districts for the purpose of electing judges and creating this general term. When thus created, it will consist of eight judges, four of whom are to reside in the respective districts, and then when the general term is created, a chief justice being provided, he will preside at these general terms; there being four judges in each district as is now the practice and to be increased as the administration of justice demands. This chief justice will have quite as much business as he can attend to, although he may sit in circuit. I will illustrate this by citing the seventh and eighth districts. A general term is provided for the seventh district, the chief justice presides, and by allotment the judges of the eighth district, go there with him and form a court of review. They are then sitting in the district where they have not participated in the trials at nisi prius; yet the term is held at a place convenient to their own home and they got there and back again without much loss of time or at great cost. Then in the eighth district the chief justice comes again to sit in this court, and brings some of the judges from the seventh district and so you have practically a court organized, none of the judges of which have participated in the decisions to be reviewed.

Mr. SMITH—Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BARKER—Most certainly.

Mr. SMITH—Will the gentleman state where, in the report of the majority of the committee, is there a provision that judges constituting the court at general term, shall be drawn from other districts?

Mr. BARKER—There is no general provision, but it is left for the Legislature to make that provision, and it is presumed that that body will have quite as much wisdom and will regard the necessities of the case quite as wisely as this Convention.

Mr. SMITH—Then if there is no such provision in that report, why did the gentleman interrupt me, when I was making that statement and tell me that I was mistaken in regard to it, and say, sotto voce, that I did not comprehend the system.

Mr. BARKER—I did not design to treat the gentleman discourteously, for I respect him as highly as I do any gentleman in this Convention. I know that he has much acumen and ability in debate; but I have perceived that his talent is brighter when he is finding fault, than when he is pointing out a path for this Convention to follow. I say that the Legislature is the proper body to make provision for organizing the general term. And now let me make some criticism upon the minority report, which is presented by an earnest, an intelligent and devoted lawyer, the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich]. I say, that if this court of review be organized after his plan, it will be overwhelmed at the end of twelve months, and there will be a calendar at each general term as large as that which now incumbers the court of appeals, and decisions will be indefinitely postponed. The gentleman proposes a plan which it is utterly impossible to carry out successfully in practice. Judges have not the physical power to perform the labor that would be imposed upon them. Let me illustrate. He brings three of the present judicial districts into one department, and provides that all the causes shall be first heard in the general term created for the department. Now, it is a well known fact, which has existed for twenty years, and no one will deny it, that each of the general terms in this State disposes in a year of not less than two hundred causes; most of them causes that involve much examination, deliberation and hard labor. The gentleman proposes to bring three of these districts into one department, and to impose all this work upon one court, which will have six hundred causes to hear and dispose of each year. Now, I do not care whether this court is composed of six judges or nine judges, it cannot do this work. No one man can participate in the disposition of that number of cases with justice to himself or to the suitors.

Mr. GOODRICH—I desire to state that the number of cases for review in the sixth district is scarcely more than one hundred and twenty-five in a year, and in the sixth, seventh, and eighth the whole number in a year will fall considerably short of six hundred cases, the larger part of which require but little time to decide.

Mr. BARKER—Well, I will take the gentleman's own numbers which he presented yesterday, an average of five hundred and ninety or five hundred and seventy. The court of appeals disposes each year of about three hundred cases, and from each of these departments come about one hundred of these cases, so that you have imposed upon each of these general terms one-third of the business which is annually disposed of in the court of appeals. You can say if you please that the most difficult and doubtful cases go into the court of appeals for review, yet they require as much or more labor at the hands of the judges in the general term as in the court of appeals, and I submit to the observation of every intelligent lawyer in this State whether one-third of the business which comes before a general term is taken into the court of appeals for another decision. Then again the gentleman's plan provides that this chief justice shall preside at all these general terms and participate in all these decisions; and it is certainly more than any one judicial character in this State has ever yet done to hear six hundred cases in a year. Then again his plan is exposed to another objection. It brings to these general terms judges from the most remote and distant parts of the State. When they are there they are a long distance from their homes, and just as soon as the arguments are closed and the court adjourns the judges are separated and scattered again throughout the State, and have no further intercourse or acquaintance and no familiarity with each other's minds, so that when they come together to make their decisions they are made upon a mere vote without that due deliberation and consultation which should be had. I submit further, that this plan is subject to another objection, to my mind a very serious one, although I base it wholly upon my own limited and humble observation. It is that the judges who compose these general terms are not familiar with the bar before whom they appear as they migrate from place to place throughout the State to hold this court; and for the purpose of facilitating arguments and of coming to an accurate and full understanding of the causes heard, I think it is very desirable that the judges and the profession should be mutually acquainted. It will shorten argument, the judges will know the peculiarities of the counsel's mind, when he is acquainted with him, and they can communicate with each other more freely, suggest ideas to each other without offense, and thereby shorten the argument which is always protracted when the court and the counsel are strangers. Now, there is no difference in theory, no practical difference, between the report of the minority of the committee and the majority, because they both proceed upon exactly the same idea, which is, diminishing the number of general terms and accumulating business in the court. The proposition submitted by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], proposing the plan of organizing the court which was rejected in 1846; and one of the advantages supposed to be gained by dispensing with that system and adopting the present was that the judges who sat in review should at times go down to hold circuits, and that the judges who held circuits should sit at times in this court of review; the gain supposed to be derived from it being that the judge at general term becomes somewhat familiar with the temperament of the people and the character of their litigation, and that in general term again, he has the advantage of hearing deliberate argument of causes thoroughly prepared by counsel which he then takes to his chambers and carefully examines, submits his mind to the discipline of writing out opinions that are to be exposed to the criticism of the profession and reported in the reports, and thereby his mind becomes more accurate and acute in the examination of legal questions; so that when he presides at circuits he escapes the errors into which judges are likely to fall who have not had opportunities of hearing deliberate arguments. As for myself, if I were to submit a proposition that in my judgment would be preferable above all others, I would vote to retain the present organization of the supreme court. I would have it in distinct departments, as small as the districts now are. I would vote also for the proposition that the judges of each district should hold general terms in the adjoining district; but that is substantially provided for in the report of the majority, and I shall give it my support heartily.

Mr. SMITH—I desire to make a brief explanation so as to be right upon the record. In the few remarks submitted by me, I stated that the majority report, as I understood it, did not provide specifically for general terms composed of judges drawn from other districts, and that I preferred the minority report because it did adopt and carry out that plan. The gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] stated, as I understood him, that I had misrepresented the majority report, and that it did provide for the very thing that I condemned it for omitting. I asked him if the majority report did contain that feature, and I understood him to say that it did, and he remarked somewhat contemptuously upon my want of apprehension of the system. I did not know but I had unintentionally misrepresented the scheme, and stated that if I had done so I would be glad to be corrected, and to know that the majority scheme provided for a general term like the one presented in the minority report. I understand the gentleman [Mr. Barker] now to admit, what I see by looking at the report is the fact, that it does not provide for bringing judges from other districts or departments to compose the general term, but leaves the organization of the general term entirely to the Legislature. Now, all I desire is to have this matter distinctly understood by the committee. I have myself no disposition to misrepresent any thing or any body, and no one will gain any thing by misrepresentation. I am sorry that gentlemen of the majority of the committee should feel sensitive in regard to this matter. I made my remarks entirely in kindness, and with no disposition to disparage the labors of that committee, for I know that they have worked very carefully and conscientiously, and have probably done quite as well as any other body of men could have done. I hope the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] will not understand me as desiring to misrepresent the committee, and on the other hand I do not desire to be misrepresented myself, and I do not mean to be.

Mr. EVARTS—The organization for so large a State as this, of a great and principle court of original jurisdiction that shall constitute a magistracy, and a judicial establishment, that shall have the traits of being really a State and not a local magistracy and tribunal, is a task of very great difficulty. It must not be lost sight of, that beside the great extent of our territory and the number of our population, and the activity and variety of the interests that prevail in so strenuous a community as ours, we are by no means confined to this territory, or to this population, or to these domestic interests, as the measure and the source of the judicial business that is to be performed by the establishment we are to create. This territory of ours, this population of ours is not of a community made up of its size according to the ordinary principles by which independent communities are collected. It is a community of four millions occupying the area of the State of New York, but it is a community collected within these limits out of, in some sort, the whole country, with its thirty millions of population. It will not do, therefore, in estimating a plan for the organization of the judiciary of this State, to be governed or guided simply by the experience of other communities of the same population and territory. Besides the fact that this community of ours is collected here to do the business in the various departments of life that belong to a great nation in reference to commerce, in reference to internal traffic, in reference to what makes up our peculiar and superior position toward the rest of this country over any other local population of the same magnitude, we must remember that the tendency of railroads and of telegraphs is to concentrate here within our territory the business interests of great populations that never come here themselves. The city of New York, Mr. Chairman, presents, as I believe, as much as one-half of all the judicial business that needs to be the subject either of appeal or of deliberate original determination in any court of this State. It does not present that business as the share of the million of people that live on that island, but Wisconsin, Georgia, Maine, Louisiana, California, are all the while furnishing food to our tribunals of justice in litigations growing out of transactions which really never have any locality here. Now, I apprehend that the committee deserve some respect for their labors when it is found that they have attempted at once to give a framework which is capable of working, in this difficult state of affairs, as a court of original jurisdiction, and yet have left it as free as possible to the molding hand of the Legislature, through proper judiciary acts, to provide the suitable working apparatus, within the scheme of the Consititution, and to qualify and improve it, if it shall be necessary, from time to time. The principal difference, as I think, between the scheme of the majority of the committee, as proposed for the acceptance of the Convention, and the scheme of the minority, as insisted upon by our friend from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich], is that he has undertaken in his scheme to infix permanently in the system of the Constitution more of the features of a working apparatus that properly belong to the judiciary act than is consistent with wise statesmanship. If you will read the section of the committee's report which relates to the constitution of the supreme court (the sixth section of the report of the majority of the committee), you will see that it is very brief and very general. What we claim for it is that it recognizes the difficulties of the situation, provides a sufficient force of judges, makes a new partition of territory into four departments, and provides therefor but four several heads (as many as are needed) of judicial revision in the supreme court. The report of the minority undertakes to provide for the constitution of departments, for the election of justices to sit in banc for fixed periods of time, and to subtract from the thirty-six judges, who make up the whole working force of this court of original jurisdiction in this State, under the circumstances that we have alluded to—to subtract from that whole number of thirty-six, fifteen judges who are to sit constantly in banc and do nothing else. You have then in the three departments of the State constituted three supreme courts in banc of five judges each, and those five judges are to do nothing but sit in each department in review of litigations that are to be sent up to them from the original jurisdiction of only twenty-one judges who are engaged in the business of hear ing causes at circuit and at special term. Now, there, you have a court in banc of fifteen judges sitting all the while, and as the learned gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] has said, you have a mass of business for review in the courts thus constituted, that in magnitude approaches very nearly the business that is submitted to the court of appeals. What is the principal function of this supreme court? It is the original trial of causes, it is the original investigation of matters in litigation; and the great feature that you wish to preserve for this tribunal in its original jurisdiction and investigations, as well as the inexorable conditions of population and territory will permit, is that of being a court of the State and not of the locality. You wish to get rid, as far as you can, of what is the condemnation of the system of the Convention of 1846, that it obliterates and strikes out of existence any tribunal of original jurisdiction that can properly be called a court of the State. You have, under the present Constitution, nothing but so many local courts according to the number of the districts; and though you call it, as you do in the city of New York, a supreme court, side by side with the court of common pleas and the superior court, every body knows that, to all intents and purposes, the supreme court in the city of New York, is as little a State court and as much a local court, as either the common pleas or the superior court. Now, it is desirable, if possible, and I agree that the inexorable conditions to which I have referred render it possible to but a very moderate extent—it is desirable that there should be courts of original trial in which the suitors, the plaintiff being from one part of the State and the defendant from another, should feel that they are not in a local court; that if a suit be pending in Buffalo, brought by a New York plaintiff against a Buffalo defendant, or in New York by Buffalo plaintiff against a New York defendant, you may have some security that it is not a judge of the locality that is to sit thus in the original jurisdiction between the parties. If this State were no larger than Massachusetts with its population and its wealth and activity, great as they are, we should have been able to provide a court which would have come up to the true idea of being a State court, with its judges itinerant throughout the State, holding circuit and special terms, and then sitting in banc, in review of the first procedure of investigation. But, we were met constantly by the difficulties of the geographical dimensions and immense population, and the great and growing business of the State. We have attempted to make as reasonable an adjustment as possible between these ideas of strict locality in a court, and of having a representation of the State in this original investigation, by division into departments. We want to get rid at least, of the narrow characteristics of the court as established under the present Constitution. I have said that the great and principal function for which, as a basis, we wish to provide, for which we wish to furnish an adequate force, is the original procedure in litigation. In respect to review, in this court, we feel it necessary to provide only what will accomplish more deliberate revision of what has been done at the first investigation, by passing, in our general term, upon the questions whether errors have intervened at the trial or in the judgment of single judges at special term, which, on more careful consideration, seem to be errors of oversight, or haste, or misconception, by which the state of the proofs has been left imperfect, or indicating that new trials, for discretionary reasons, to get at the justice of the matter, might properly be required. When we have furnished that corps of revision, of judges sitting at general term, not being the same who have presided in the original investigations, we have done all that we think it is possible to do, in a court that has this immense public service of original jurisdiction to perform. We have felt that if new problems of law come up for solution, if new and difficult questions of general application need to be solved, they are very likely, they are sure, to go to the court of appeals; and we suppose that we have provided in the constitution of that court an adequate number of judges and a sufficient independence to secure the possession of their time and attention, for the function that is devolved upon them. We, therefore, for our report upon the court now under consideration, claim that we have done, with the number of judges placed at the disposal of the committee, the best that could be done in the arrangement and distribution of the force of the court between the great and principal function of original investigation, and the function of review, within the court, for the correction of errors and to settle the facts of litigation, for the ultimate decision of great questions of law by the court of appeals. Now, I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that if we are to depart from this scheme of the committee, and are to choose between the methods that are to promote the bench of review in the supreme court, as being the principal feature and function of the court (as the plan of the minority of the committee does), or, despairing of attaining practically the advantage of a State court, in distinction from a local court, give up that proposition and adopt the constitution of the supreme court as it now is, modifying it, if you please, by not permitting the judges to sit in review of their own decisions, with other circumstantial changes, I, for one, should prefer to take the supreme court as it is, and give up the hope of making it better than it is, except in some circumstantial changes, Mr. Chairman, you may depend upon it that the convenient, the ready, the satisfactory discharge of the first great and principal function of original trials is what is expected from the supreme court of this State. The bar expect it, the suitors expect it, and the community must have it; and it never will do to turn it into three great courts permanently sitting in banc. But I should greatly prefer the compromise and adjustment which has caused the Judiciary Committee a great deal of discussion and a great deal of labor, and which we have presented in our report, and I hope that this Convention will not hastily depart from the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. BECKWITH—I have listened with considerable interest to the argument of the gentlemen who have preceded me, and have come to the conclusion myself that the proposition of the majority of the committee is best calculated to accomplish the object which we all desire to secure. That proposition is general in its terms and leaves the Legislature by a wise judiciary act to avoid all the objections which have been made to the present system except one, and that one is conflict of decisions, which we must always expect while we have different courts existing in the State. Now, if this system which is proposed by the majority of the committee be adopted it will be in the power of the Legislature, by a proper judiciary act, to direct or provide that the judges who sit in general term shall not sit in the district in which they are elected, except the chief justice. That will leave the judges of the supreme court to hold the circuit and the special term in his district; and then when we come to the general term, the judges of an adjoining district of the same department, except the chief justice, will hold general term. Now I do not myself think it wise that we should attempt to introduce into the Constitution we are endeavoring to frame, to go into details and do that which strictly belongs to the Legislature. In my judgment all that is necessary for us to do is to organize a court and leave it in such form that the Legislature can provide for its proper working; and I think that the report of the majority of the committee leaves it in that condition; for you will see that they provide that there shall be in each department except in the city of New York eight judges to be elected, that one of them shall be elected as chief justice and four of them shall be designated to hold a general term, three of these to form a quorum for the transaction of business at general term. Now, that leaves it in the power of the Legislature to provide that those judges designated to hold general term shall be drawn from one district in a department to hold the general term in another district in the same department, and thereby we shall get rid of the objection that a judge is permitted to sit in review of his own decisions. I think myself that it is very desirable that the court should be constituted so that a judge shall not sit in review of his own decisions. It may be that a judge who has heard a case at circuit and is familiar with the facts of the case is in a better condition to decide it than one who hears it for the first time on the argument at general term; but there is the other objection that the judge by deciding the case at special term has come to the conclusion that his decision is right, and he has argued himself into so firm a belief in his own correctness that it is impossible to convince him that he is in error. The objection in no way impugns the motives of the judge, since we all know that we can argue ourselves into the belief that we are right. This objection we desire to get rid of. There is another provision that I desire to put into the Constitution, and I am not certain but it is in some provision. It is that no judge shall sit as referee in the trial of a cause. The Legislature at one time took away from the judges this right but they afterward restored it, and I think it operates badly. Judges should be paid a salary sufficient to compensate them for their services, and should not be allowed to sit as referees in order to increase the amount of their pay. For these reasons, sir, I am decidedly in favor of this system. I prefer it because it is general and flexible, and does not go into detail, but leaves it where the Legislature can, by a wise judiciary act, provide for the workings of the court in such manner as to get rid of all these objections except that of conflict of decisions.

Mr. ANDREWS—Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee for a long time in what I may say on this pending question. It is unquestionably a most difficult work which this Convention has to do—to determine the outlines of the judiciary system of the State; and it is very proper, in my judgment, for the purpose of exciting attention to this question, that the variant and conflicting views of gentlemen upon this subject should be presented to the committee. It, perhaps—and it probably—is true that the report of the majority of the judiciary committee upon this subject does not contain the very best system of judiciary for this State, which can be devised; but this Convention has met, in the discussions upon this subject, with the precise difficulty which was encountered by the committee in their deliberations, to wit: a great variety of views as to what should be the system to be adopted; and this report, signed by all but one of the members of that committee, contains their best judgment after full discussion, as to the system which should be adopted. Now, there are two entirely diverse theories upon this subject, one which has been maintained by several gentlemen upon the floor, and which is involved in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], that there shall be an entire divorce between the branches of judicial duty, that relating to the trial of cases and that relating to their argument and decision upon appeal; and the other theory is that which proceeds upon the assumption that the performance of circuit and banc duty by the same judges is essential to the best development of judicial character, and the most efficient discharge of judicial functions. Now, it is true, Mr. Chairman, that in the committee the project of divorcing these two branches of judicial duty was discussed and advocated by some members of the committee. It was the system first introduced in this State by the Constitution of 1822, and many recur with pleasure to the history of that court and the character of the many eminent judges who adorned it, and to the dignity and influence which always accompanied its judgments and decisions. But it is nevertheless true, Mr. Chairman, that the theory upon which common law courts are organized, is to combine the duties of a nisi prius with the duties of an appellate judge, and to so provide that judges sitting in common law courts shall discharge, a portion of the time, the duties of either position. That is the English system, from which our own is in a great measure copied. It is the system of the United States court, and it is I believe the system of the common law courts in all the States of this Union, and my recollection is that this separation of function occurred for the first time in this State in 1822, and that this was the only exception within the United States where these courts were not organized upon the theory of combining these duties. And it is doubtless true, Mr. Chairman, that there are advantages in this commingling of duties and in giving to a judge experience both in hearing arguments and in the trial of cases. Experience in the trial of cases gives him a more comprehensive view of the meaning and force of the rules of law, and tends to restrain to some extent that too technical application of such rules which is apt to be made by a judge whose only function is to listen to arguments and determine from adjudged cases the questions which may come before him for decision; and it is my recollection, from reading the life of Mr. Justice Story some time since, that, in a letter to Mr. Webster upon this subject, after the federal courts were reorganized, and circuit duties were imposed upon the judges of the supreme court of the United States, he said that he was conscious that he was a better judge in term, by reason of the experience which he acquired upon the trial of causes. If we are to establish a court in which circuit duty shall be divorced from general term duty, we can only adopt a suggestion like that which has been made by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. If the committee decline to adopt that system then there is left only the system now existing in this State, with such incidental modifications as may improve its working hereafter. The difference between the majority and minority reports is not a difference in the principle on which courts should be organized. It is a simple difference in detail, and I shall attempt to show during the course of the remarks which I shall make, that the real difficulties in the present system, if the general purpose and scope of that system shall remain, are more likely to be obviated by the adoption of the report of the majority of the committee than by adopting the report which has been presented and so ably advocated by the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich]. I take it, Mr. Chairman, as the result of the vote taken upon the proposition of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] the other day, that the sense of the committee is that there is to be no separation of circuit from general term duty, introduced into the judicial system of this State.

Mr. HALE—Will the gentleman allow me to remind him that the amendment did not contemplate separation. The amendment I proposed provided that judges elected by the State at large should have power to hold circuits, and justices and circuit judges should have power to sit in the general term out of their own districts.

Mr. ANDREWS—I may be mistaken as to the purport of the amendment of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], but assuming that we are not to depart from the theory upon which common law courts are organized, it simply remains for us to consider what improvements may be made in the existing organization and what improvements, if any, are suggested in the report of the majority of the committee. The gentlemen of this committee are familiar with that section in the Constitution of the United States, under which the federal courts are organized, which provides "that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." Under that simple statement of power the United States courts have been organized by the action of Congress. It is flexible in its character; it allows changes from time to time to be made in their organization, as such changes are shown by experience to be necessary. And while I do not doubt that there must be more complexity in the frame-work of a judicial system for our State, still I think gentlemen upon the committee will agree with me, that the simpler and the less complexity there is about this frame-work; the more flexibility and elasticity there is given to the system, so as that the Legislature may, from time to time, adjust its details to meet existing wants and to remedy existing evils; the better it is for the State, and that it is the safer course for those who are attempting to frame the organic law of the State, which cannot be changed in the ordinary course of legislation. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, this is one of the advantages of the system reported by the majority of the committee over that reported by the minority. Because if the specific organization of the courts, recommended by the minority report, should be adopted, and if experience proves that it does not work so well and so easily as it is supposed it will work by gentlemen who favor it, you cannot, through the action of the Legislature, change it in any respect: it is cast in an iron and an inflexible mold, and can only be altered by a change in the organic law. The minority report provides not only for the division of the State into three departments, but it fixes the boundaries of these departments, and provides that the number of departments shall never be increased. It provides for the organization of general terms, to be composed in a certain way, and a certain method of selection of the judges to hold them, and that the judges who serve in general term shall serve for a certain number of years, and shall not, during that time, discharge any other judicial duty. Now, it may be an admirable system, but I say, if it is adopted, it leaves us without the benefit of experience in respect to it, while, at the same time, it determines, so long as the Constitution shall stand, the precise character of these courts, including the number of judges who are to hold them, and the nature of the duties which, from time to time, they are to perform. The system reported by the majority of the committee authorizes precisely the same arrangement to be made of the general term that is proposed by the minority, but it does not undertake to determine that that particular method of organization shall be adopted. It leaves to the Legislature, after dividing the State into departments and determining the number of judges, the work of molding and organizing the general terms and determining what judges shall hold them. It leaves the Legislature to provide that the judge doing general term duty may also do other judiciary duty, or to separate the two branches of judicial service, and to prohibit a judge, while assigned to duty in the appellate court, from participating in the trial of causes. And it is for this reason as one, that the system of the majority is a flexible one, capable of being adapted to existing exigencies, and that the system of the minority is an inflexible one, that I prefer the system reported by the majority. But, Mr. Chairman, there is another difference in the two propositions. The report of the minority of the committee provides that there shall be three departments, and that twelve judges shall be appointed in each. That gives thirty-six judges in the State. The report of the majority provides for the appointment of thirty-four judges, making two less in number. The report of the minority of the committee authorizes the Legislature to increase to any extent the number of judges, while the report of the majority of the committee provides that the Legislature may add a single judge in each district, if, in the judgment of the Legislature, that shall be required. Now, while many things should be left flexible, I believe it has been the custom in the Constitutions of the several States to fix the number of judges, and not leave it to the discretion of the Legislature, except under strict limitations. It seems to me that we should provide a sufficient force to do the judicial business of the State, and not leave it to the Legislature, without limitation, to determine when and how many judges shall be added. There is another objection, which seems to me to be a valid one against the report of the minority of the committee. For the purpose of obviating the difficulty arising from a judge sitting in review of his own decisions, it is provided that in each department there shall be a chief judge and four associate judges, two selected from each of the other departments, to constitute a general term. It is further provided that this court so organized is to continue for two years, confining itself simply to general term duty, and the judges who shall sit in those general terms to perform no other judicial functions whatever. This is an unequal distribution of the judicial power of the State. The result is if this system is adopted, you devote fifteen of the thirty-six judges of the supreme court to the sole duty of acting as judges upon the bench of the general term, leaving all other judicial services to be performed by the remainder of the thirty-six judges. I say this is an unequal distribution of the judicial power, thus to provide for three general terms, with five judges sitting continuously in each, doing no other duty. It is said that the average length of the general terms through the State is about a week. There are four held each year in each district, and two of these districts are to form a department. So you are to have eight weeks in each department of general term duty to be performed. And for the purpose of accomplishing that amount of labor, in hearing of arguments, you set apart in each department five judges of that court. They act eight weeks as a court, and the other ten months of the year is left for the consideration and decision of their cases. Now, if we are to have a court of this description, and the judges composing it are to be excluded from other judicial duty, I think three is an ample number in each department, and that it is a waste of material, an entirely unnecessary expense to the State to devote in each of those departments, five of the judges to do the work And in my judgment three judges would act more efficiently, as a general term in each of the departments than the five men according to the report of the minority of the committee.

Mr. SMITH—Will the gentleman allow me? As he and the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] acted together in the consideration of this scheme before the committee, I would like to know how they reconcile this discrepancy? I understand the gentleman from Chautauqua thinks this will be utterly inadequate and that there will be a vast accumulation of business, worse even than in the court of appeals. I understand the gentleman from Onondaga to hold that this would be a waste of power—too many judges.

Mr. ANDREWS—I understand that it is lawful argument to assume the premises of your opponent and therefrom to show the invalidity and untenability of his position. But there is another thing in respect to this. I say that in this bench of five judges you would have a worse arrangement of the appellate court than you have under the present system. And why? Because it is liable to the objections that have been urged against the court of appeals, as now constituted, to wit: the fluctuating character of that court caused by the short period of service. You appoint a chief justice in each department, and then you take from each of the other departments two judges, and put them together—for how long? Why, for two years continuously, and then they are remitted to the ranks again, and another bench from those who had been serving at circuit is made up to be dissolved again in turn, within two years from the time of its creation. In my judgment such a court would not and could not act efficiently in the discharge of the business coming to it, and it would be liable to objections which so forcibly were urged against it by the gentleman from Cayuga. You are making a chief justice this year of the man who next year is to occupy the place of circuit judge, and whose place is supplied by the circuit judge, who in turn takes his place upon the bench as chief justice and overrules the decisions of his own predecessor in the same office. You would create that conflict of feeling and that prejudice arising from the interference of one judge with the decisions of another, and you would give the amplest opportunity for the growth of just that discord between the different members of the judiciary of the State which is one of the main objections to the court as now organized. Upon all these views if we are to change the present system, I think the plan reported by the majority of the committee, is by far the best. It is a compromise between our present system and other systems which have been suggested, like that of the gentlemen from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. If we adopt the principle that judges ought to perform all kinds of judicial duty, then any plan we may adopt is simply an attempt to correct so far as we can the difficulties of the existing system, without changing its general character. The existing system allows a judge to sit in review of his own cases. That is expressly prohibited by the provision contained in the report of the majority of the committee. The existing system allows of eight districts and of eight general terms each announcing as a co-ordinate branch of the same court its separate views and decisions upon questions of law coming before it. Does any man doubt that if a single general term in this State was competent to do all the judicial business belonging to our general terms it would be far better to have a single one than eight separate branches of the same court; and if eight are objectionable by reason of permitting discord in the decisions, reducing the number one-half is certainly an improvement. It reduces these separate jurisdictions by one-half, and there will be less danger of conflict of decisions where there are only four branches of general term in the State, than where there are eight. Now, it might be that three general terms would be better than four. But I think it is not safe, knowing the amount of business already existing in the State, and that litigation is increasing and is likely to increase during the next twenty years—it is not safe for us to reduce the general terms to less than four in number. Doing that, we do a great deal; doing more, it may be that we will render the system inadequate to the wants of the State. But I do insist that it is far better to have the general terms organized as they now are, but with the provision excluding the judge taking part in the decision of cases appealed from the circuit where he presided, than to organize them in the manner reported by the minority of the committee. The judges in each district work together and act together. They become acquainted with each other. They regard and know the decisions of their own districts and their own courts. The plan proposed by the committee will obviate the objections that apply to the other plan; and while it will be competent for the Legislature to organize the general terms as proposed in the minority report, it is not wise to fix in the Constitution not only the outline but the entire detail of the organization of the court. For these reasons, and for others perhaps that might be suggested, I trust that we shall adhere to the plan reported by the majority of the committee.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Goodrich, and it was declared lost.

Mr. PRINDLE—I now offer the proposition, substantially as I read it, as a substitute for the proposition before the committee.

The SECRETARY read the substitute as follows:

"There shall be a supreme court, having general jurisdiction in law and equity, subject to such appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeals as may be prescribed by law. The State shall be divided into three judicial departments, to be composed of the judicial districts now existing; the first and second districts to compose the first department; the third, fourth and fifth the second department; and the sixth, seventh and eighth the third department. There shall be in each department four justices of the supreme court, who shall have appellate jurisdiction only and shall hold the general terms, and eight justices of said court, any one of whom may hold special terms of the supreme court and circuit courts, and preside in the courts of oyer and terminer in ax county."

Mr. FULLER—I move that the committee c now rise and report progress.

The question was put on the motion of M Fuller, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COOKE—I have not attempted to occup the attention of this committee on this questio But there are some thoughts which I deem it m duty to submit for the consideration of member

Mr. E. BROOKS—As the gentleman desires t express himself with some care upon this questior I move, with his consent, that the committee ris and report progress.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. E Brooks, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRES IDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee hac had under consideration the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, had made some progress therein, but, not having gone through therewith, had directed their Chairman to report that fact to the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on granting leave, and it was declared carried.

Mr. A. F. ALLEN—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. A. F. Allen, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 11, 1867.

The Convention met at ten o'clock.

No clergyman was present.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

The PRESIDENT announced the appointment of the following committee, under the resolution of Mr. Merritt, adopted yesterday, to confer with the committee of the common council of the city of Albany in relation to a suitable hall and accommodations for the sessions of this Convention:

Mr. BELL, Mr. MERRITT and Mr. MORRIS.

Mr. MORE presented the petition of John Sanderson and others, of Greene county, in favor of abolishing the Board of Regents of the University.

Which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MERRITT presented the remonstrance of the trustees and principal of the Gouverneur Wesleyan Seminary against abolishing the Board of Regents of the University.

Which took a like reference.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from S. B. Woolworth, secretary of the Board of Regents of the University.

Which took a like reference.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from Col. Emmons Clark, tendering the armory of the Seventh Regiment of the city of New York for the use of the Convention in case they should adjourn to the city of New York.

Which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALVORD—I am instructed by the Committee on Revision to report that they have had under consideration the resolution offered some time since by Mr. Colahan, and ask leave to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. VEEDER—I move to lay that subject on the table. Mr. Colahan is not present.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Veeder, and it was declared lost.

The question then recurred on agreeing with the report of the committee, and it was declared carried.

Mr. ALVORD—The same committee have further instructed me to report that they have had under consideration the petition of Herkimer Steinburgh for a "Temperance System of Medical Theory and Practice," and ask leave to be discharged from its further consideration.

The question was put upon agreeing with the report of the committee, and it was declared carried.

Mr. MORRIS—I move the reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution of the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt] was passed yesterday.

Mr. BICKFORD—I rise to a point of order, that the motion is not in order for the reason that the resolution has been acted upon.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair is not aware that the resolution has been acted upon.

Mr. ALVORD—I propose to discuss that, and under those circumstances I suppose it lies upon the table under the rule.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understands that it does not lie on the table; that the rule applies simply to reconsideration upon the day upon which the motion is made which it is moved to reconsider. The rule will be read.

The SECRETARY then read the rule as follows:

RULE 28. A motion for reconsideration shall be in order at any time, and may be moved by any member of the Convention, but the question shall not be taken on the motion to reconsider on the same day on which the decision proposed to be reconsidered shall take place, unless by unanimous consent; and a motion to reconsider being once put and lost, shall not be renewed, nor shall any subject be a second time reconsidered without the consent of the Convention. If the motion to reconsider shall not be made on the same day or the day after that on which the decision proposed to be reconsidered was made, three days' notice of the intention to make the motion shall be given.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair holds that the motion of the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris] is in order. The question is upon the motion of Mr. Morris to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of Mr. Merritt was adopted on yesterday.

Mr. ALVORD asked for the reading of the resolution.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the President to confer with the committee of the common council of the city of Albany in relation to a suitable hall and accommodation for the sessions of this Convention, as voluntarily tendered by the city authorities, and report as early as practicable.

Mr. ALVORD—Mr. President, a majority of the members of this Convention who are in the habit of attending promptly to the duties of the Convention, and who have been here most of the time, from the commencement of the Convention up to the present moment, decided yesterday in favor of the appointment of this committee. It seems, however, that individuals, members of this Convention, who have steadily absented themselves from the Convention, not only since the recess, but to a large degree previous to the recess, through the summer, have now come up here, some of them making their appearance for the first time in some three or four months, for the purpose of voting upon this resolution to carry this Convention away from this city to the city of New York. I trust that when the vote shall be taken upon this subject, these gentlemen will be permitted, for the first time in six or eight weeks, many of them, to record their names in the affirmative, still further hindering and delaying the operations of this Convention.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. E. BROOKS—My point of order is that, under the common parliamentary law, no member of the Convention has a right to make reflections injurious to the character of any of its members.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. ALVORD—I have not mentioned any names. I do not desire to. I leave the remarks which I have made, and if the coat suits any one he can put it on. We are asked to reconsider this resolution for the purpose of taking the great body of the men from the interior of the State who have faithfully and diligently discharged their duties here during all the sessions of this Convention, to transfer them to the city of New York for the convenience of the members from that city who cannot possibly get up to Albany to attend to their duties. If the people in the country have come to the conclusion that it is necessary for the whole business of the State to be done in the city of New York because of the fact that the members of any constitutional or legislative body from that city cannot by any possibility get away from their ordinary business far enough to come at least as far as we do for the purpose of attending at the Capitol of the State, we might as well know it now as at any time. I say to gentlemen that there is no question in my mind but what the attempt to go to the city of New York for the purpose of obtaining a quorum will fail as signally as it has failed in this chamber. I have no doubt myself that so far as it regards the local representatives there, they will be as apt to be away from their duties in the Convention as they have been in the past; and I know most certainly that very many members of the Convention from the interior of the State cannot and will not find it to be their duty to go there for the purpose of sitting with the Convention any further. Another thing. There are six of the members of this Convention who are members also of the Legislature to be convened in this place. Every one knows that for the first four or six weeks of the session of the Legislature it has a short morning session in both houses, occupying hardly ever for the first six weeks over an hour of the day, so that if the Convention remains here those six gentlemen can well attend to the duties, light as they are put upon them in the Legislature, and at the same time be with the body of this Convention during a large portion of its morning session, and during the entire of its evening session; but if you put this Convention in the city of New York, the result will be that, so far as those six men are concerned, they cannot pay any attention to their duties as members of the Convention. Again, sir, we have two, at least, of the members of this Convention who have been elected to State offices. They are necessarily constantly in attendance at Albany, during the session of the Legislature. We will be deprived, therefore, of the attendance and of the counsel and aid of those gentlemen in the Convention. There are eight, sir, directly out of the body of this Convention whom we shall lose, as a matter of course, by undertaking to get away from this city. There are other gentlemen who have been elected to other positions, in the election of last fall, who could make it convenient to be present here at Albany during most of the time of the sitting of the Convention, but must necessarily be absent if it goes to the city of New York. I hold that we have proved clearly by the manner in which we have progressed for the last three weeks, that three weeks more, at the outside, of good, careful, constant consideration and attendance upon the business of the Convention, will carry us through down to the question simply of revision, and I pledge myself, so far as I am concerned—and I believe that I can pledge also the other members of the Committee on Revision—that they will at least work up to the work of the Convention, so that, in all probability, at the end of three weeks, when we shall have got through with our labors and completed our work, the Committee on Revision will be ready to report to the Convention, for their acceptance, the result of their labors. We have now twenty-one working days between this time and the seventh day of next January. We can occupy those twenty-one days, if we will forego the holidays, or even if we take the two holidays, it will leave us nineteen days, in which we can perfect our entire work.

A DELEGATE — Twenty-one days, without the holidays.

Mr. ALVORD—Leaving out the holidays there are twenty-one working days between now and the seventh day of January—the day of the meeting of the Legislature. There is no difficulty in our having this hall up to the first day of January. The people in the city of Albany are ready, anxious, and willing to give us the very best accommodations that can be had in this city, if it becomes necessary for us to hold our sessions in another hall—as good accommodations as we can get in the city of New York. The only question that troubles the minds of any members of the Convention, as I understand it, is the danger that they will not get any place to sleep, or any thing to eat in the city of Albany. In the commencement of the legislative term each year there are after one or two days comparatively few individuals in the city outside of the Legislature. When the Legislature begins to seethe and boil, toward the middle and end of its term, then like the locusts of Egypt they come up here from all portions of the State, and four, five, six, eight times the number of this Convention are here in Albany, and they seem to stay here and have abundance to eat and plenty of places to protect themselves. The great army of the lobby is here in the latter part of the session. They are not here in the beginning of the session, so that there will be an abundance of room for the members of the Convention, at least for the first six weeks, if it is necessary to stay so long; abundance of room within the limits of the city of Albany for the members of this Convention, at least for the number of the members of this Convention who ordinarily attend here, to find places to sleep, and places to eat and drink. And I wish to say—and I say it not as a threat, not for the purpose of undertaking to intimidate any one; but I do say, sir, and I say it with regret and with sorrow, that so far as it regards the opinion of the people of this State with reference to this Convention, to say the least of it, our labors do not, at the present time, as we are advised, stand very high in their favor, and my honest conviction is, that if we shall go to the city of New York with this Convention, under all the circumstances that surround us, it will be the end of any good coming out of any work that we shall have done here. We shall have put the finishing blow upon the work which we shall have undertaken to perform here, and it will fall dead at the hands of the people. I may be mistaken in regard to this, but this is my firm and honest conviction. I hold, under all these circumstances, that it is not only bad policy, but it is doing ourselves and our constituents a wrong, to move, at this late stage of our proceedings, from this city to the city of New York. Already there comes up upon the wings of the wind, aye, sir, from more than one, even this morning, from men standing high in my own county, who are present in the city of Albany, comes up this talk, "Go to the city of New York and the word will be put forth in the country that you have gone there for the purpose of helping expend still more of the people's money, and to have a good, jolly time, you, members of the Convention, because you see you can thus do. You have gone thus far to a very considerable extent by your laxity and non-attendance to the duties of the Convention, and you think you can go still further in that direction, and the people will stand it; but we tell you if you undertake to put this last load upon the people they will repudiate you and your acts."

Mr. DALY—The gentleman who has just sat down, with the bad taste which has distinguished many of his remarks in this Convention, and with something of the air of a task-master, with a lash in his hands, impugns the motives of the gentlemen who are in favor of this motion. I beg leave to say, on behalf of the gentlemen from New York, particularly of those who have not hitherto been present since the adjournment of the Convention, that the reason of their absence is the impossibility of being here at this particular season of the year. All persons acquainted with the business of the city of New York know that there this is the busiest period of the year, and that at no time is the sacrifice greater than it is now to attend upon the duties of this Convention. That city, with Brooklyn, embraces one-fourth of the population of the State. It sends twenty-two members, and there have rarely been since the adjournment more than two or three members from that city attending, and I undertake to say, in vindication of the gentlemen who have not attended, that it has not been from the motive imputed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], a desire to hinder and render fruitless the labors of this Convention. Their absence is attributable to the difficulty of attending here from the pressure of private affairs or of official business, and not from the motives imputed by the gentleman from Onondaga. In the course of the proceedings of this Convention we have had a great many promises, predictions and pledges from the gentleman who has just spoken, and, in my judgment, his predictions, as shown by the result, are entitled to less weight than those of any other gentleman in this Convention. I mean his statements as to how and within what time certain matters could and would be accomplished, and other things of that kind.

Mr. ALVORD—Have I not always said in that connection that if this Convention would stay here and do its duty and perform its work, it could do it? I ask the gentleman whether it has done so.

Mr. DALY—And he has said a great many other things—among them fixing a positive period within which the labors of this Convention were to be completed, thus anticipating and preparing the public mind for the time when our labors would close, and showing a want of comprehension of the nature and magnitude of the work we had to do. If the Convention does not stand very high at the present time, to use the language of the gentleman, it has been from such predictions as these. It has been from the want of practical experience, a want of knowledge of what we had to do, and the attempt to compress it within a period of time within which it was impossible to do it. If, as the gentleman says, this Convention does not stand very high in public opinion, in my judgment it would give additional confidence if it should adjourn and hold its future session in New York when in consequence of the meeting of the Legislature it is not desirable that it should continue in session here. Why should it not? What objection is there to going down to the principal city of the State? From the nature of the approaches to it, it is nearly as accessible as any other portion of the State. A number of the members who attend from the southern portion of the State find it just as difficult to get to Albany as the gentlemen living in the northern part of the State find it difficult to go to New York. And I take it, if this motion prevails, there will be found, in spite of the gentleman's predictions, a large attendance of the members of the Convention, embracing a very full attendance of the members from the city of New York, who will then be able to attend from day to-day and in sufficient numbers to secure and maintain a quorum until the labors of this Convention are completed. The gentleman says that in three weeks the labors of this Convention will be completed. I undertake to say that they will not be completed in six weeks. The judiciary article alone, in the Convention of 1846, which embraced less changes than are now required or contemplated, took nearly five weeks in discussion, with three sessions a day; and yet the gentleman tells us now in the very beginning of this inquiry that we can dispose of this and the other objects before the Convention in three weeks. What are these subjects? The public education, the public charities, the whole subject of prisons, and the question of the government of the metropolitan cities with other subjects which have not yet been touched; and we are told in the confident tone in which this gentleman has addressed the Convention from the beginning, that all this can and will be done in three weeks. Now, I make a prediction. The gentleman is chairman of the Committee on Revision and with all his activity, zeal and industry, I make the prediction that it will take nearly three weeks to discuss the report of his Committee of Revision, if we go into all the subjects before us, when they make their report. And I say, therefore, in conclusion that so far as satisfying the people of this State, so far as inspiring confidence on the part of those who now constitute the political majority of this State, the wisest thing in my judgment that this Convention could do would be to go the city of New York; and instead of producing the effect which the gentleman anticipates of impairing the labors of this Convention, it would in my judgment do more now than any thing else to secure a satisfactory completion and the ultimate adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. MILLER—If I believed, Mr. President, that this question concerned merely the personal convenience of the members of this Convention I should not arise to prolong this discussion. I presume that perhaps as large a number of gentlemen would be accommodated by the transfer of our session to New York city, as may be accommodated if we stay here. But I am of the opinion that this question reaches very much further than the personal convenience of any man, or any number of men. I think it reaches to the character and reputation of this Convention with the people of the State, and the reputation and standing of this Convention with the representatives of the people of this State that are very soon to meet in the Legislature. Now, in my opinion, there is no use in denying the fact that we have been in session very much longer than we expected, or than the people expected when we assembled. One reason is we have found that our work was very much greater than we anticipated. But, I submit, that now we understand something about it and can comprehend somewhat of its extent, we may begin to see the end, and that, with some degree of certainty, we can set a limit to our labors. And notwithstanding the leading members on this floor may disagree, I think it pretty safe to say that with reasonable diligence we could finish our labors in at least two or three weeks after the assembling of the Legislature. Is it wise then to transfer this Convention to New York or to any other city for that short time. Or would it be wise, even if we had to stay two or three months instead of two or three weeks? Now, in my opinion, the people, whether right or not, have this idea pretty firmly fixed in their minds, that the capital of the State is the appropriate and proper place for a State Convention to assemble to frame the Constitution of the State. They think so, and I think they are right in that opinion. And I can see nothing that we can gain by going, and nothing that we can lose by staying. It was suggested here the other day that we might be crowded out of our boarding places, driven away from the hotels by the members of the Legislature and the lobby, that come up with them. I do not think that the Convention, or the gentlemen of the Convention, have fallen so low as that. We have possession, which is nine points of the law; and I think it will be the new-comers who must seek other quarters, if any body. Of course we are to leave this hall, but we must leave it if we go anywhere else. The city of Albany can furnish another hall that will accommodate us as well, perhaps, as we can be accommodated in any other city. Nor is there any objection, as I can see, to meeting the members of the Legislature. We expect some legislation at their hands; and I think that there is a great advantage even in meeting them, as they come up from the people. They come fresh from the people, and they know their wants in relation to the very work in which we are engaged. We are framing this Constitution for the people. They are now, since the election, beginning to discuss the questions that are before us. These representatives that come up from the people will meet with us, and will tell us the people's wants; will tell us the wishes of their constituents and ours, and what, in their opinion, are the deficiencies in the present Constitution, and how we should mend it, in the particulars that may be under discussion at that time. I am anxious, too, that these representatives shall see us here, and see that we are honestly and diligently at work; and while we have made haste slowly, while our session has been protracted longer than the people anticipated, I want these men to see that we have spent the time, not in idleness, but that we have spent it in hard work and in careful deliberation. Now I propose that we stay here at our post, that we discharge our duties and perform this work well, and as quickly as we can, and do it well.

Mr. GOULD—I am sure, sir, if I know my own heart at all, I have had but one single object from the day of the assembling of this Convention until the present time. That object was to do the work which this Convention was set to do, in the most thorough and perfect manner that was possible, in the shortest possible time, and with the least expense to the people of the State. And if I supposed the work could be accomplished better, or cheaper, or more satisfactory to the people of this State by remaining in Albany than by going to New York, my voice and my vote should certainly be given for remaining in the city of Albany. But I have no kind of idea that we could conveniently remain in this city. I understand that a number of gentlemen who are members of this Convention have already received notice from the places where they are boarding, that their rooms must be speedily vacated. The gentleman says that the beginning of the sessions of the Legislature of this State is not generally attended by a very large number of strangers. I can only say that his experience is different from mine. I know that shoals almost as large as the locusts of Egypt come to Albany. I know how difficult it is to obtain board or a bed in the city of Albany when these people come here. The gentleman says we shall get in contempt with the people of this State if we go to the city of New York—that our desire for going to the city of New York will be interpreted by our constituents as a desire for the indulgence of those illicit pleasures which the city of New York affords. Sir, I am not in the slightest degree afraid that my constituency will charge any such motive upon me.

Mr. ALVORD—Do I understand the gentleman from Columbia to intimate that I made use of such language as he speaks now?

Mr. GOULD—Substantially, I did.

Mr. ALVORD—I did not at all. I had not the remotest intention to allude to any thing of that kind. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I said they would have a jolly time.

Mr. GOULD—Then, sir, I misunderstood the gentleman. I certainly understood him to make that charge. There are some reasons why I think it is desirable for this Convention to go to the city of New York—why I suppose the business of this Convention which remains to be done could be more properly and usefully done in the city of New York. In the first place we have the report of the committee on State prisons, which, as every one knows, proposes the establishment of a State police. This is a grave question, one which ought to be intelligently decided by the members of this Convention. An opportunity of observing the workings of the police in New York, the operations of crime as they can be observed in the city of New York will be a very great assistance to every gentleman here in determining how he shall vote in relation to the propositions of this committee. Then there is the subject of education, which is one of very great and, I may say, of transcendent importance. Gentlemen will have an opportunity of seeing the workings of the educational system of New York, from the primary schools up to the free college. I have not the slightest doubt that an inspection of the educational establishments of that city will be exceedingly useful to every man here. During the recess I visited the schools of New York, and I must say that a more instructive spectacle I never witnessed. Among them was the one directly opposite to the Tombs—a school situated in the very worst part of the city—a school where the most degraded part of the population live—and I there found, among those little Irish and German boys, the children of the very poorest part of the community—children that were capable of telling the whole story of Wil-from the Conqueror, the whole current of English history; and they could give me all the leading traits of American history. They read with a degree of intelligence that I do not think could be equaled by the members of this Convention. I mean what I say. There was an emphasis, there was a relation of the voice and gesture to the subject in what was read that I do not think could be improved by members of this Convention; and the influence of education upon the most degraded classes of the community brought directly under the inspection of the members of this Convention, I am sure, would be exceedingly useful to them in intelligently voting upon the propositions which are brought before it by the Committee on Education. Then the subject of charities, which is one of great importance, will be elucidated in a practical manner by the observation of the great charities of New York in a way which they could not be understood by the members of this Convention in any other school within my knowledge in the State of New York. For these reasons I believe that it would be exceedingly satisfactory to the people of this State if the members of the Convention would place themselves in a position where, upon a large scale, they might observe the workings of those measures upon which they are called upon to vote here.

Mr. MERRITT—It seems the question has now assumed this shape: shall we adjourn to the city of New York, or remain in the city of Albany? There is no doubt that ample accommodations can be furnished in the city of New York for the use of this Convention. Equally good can be furnished in this city. The hall referred to in the city of New York, is large enough for the Convention. It was thought this chamber would be required a short time before the meeting of the Legislature, so that it could be put in order for the convenience of the Assembly, in which case it would be necessary to provide other accommodations for this body. Such accommodations can be furnished in this city. The Convention met in this city, pursuant to law, to perform its labor. No person can know or does know how long it will take to fully complete the work which devolved upon us. It may take two weeks after, the first of January, or it may take four or six weeks. It seems to me that the reputation of this Convention would be compromised by going away from the city of Albany, the capital of the State, where its sessions have so long been held, unless some good and substantial reasons can be given for it. Those reasons have not, in my judgment, been given. We should not be governed by mere questions of personal convenience. We are here to perform a public duty; and if that public duty can be well and successfully performed where we have met, and where the law required we should meet, and where we have thus far been well accommodated, then we should remain here, and should not go from the city of Albany. So far as my personal convenience is concerned, I could as well go to New York as remain here. I do not care a straw in that respect. But I believe the good name and reputation of the Convention would be compromised if we should leave this city and go to the city of New York. And my opposition to the motion proposed yesterday, was not out of any disrespect to the mayor or authorities of any city, but because I could think of no reason why we should accept the proposition to go to the city of New York, and being opposed to a change of location; when this vote shall be taken, I shall call for the ayes and noes, as I do now, and I hope that the issue will be met fairly and squarely on the question of removal from Albany to the city of New York.

Mr. E. BROOKS—If I could believe, sir, either with the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] or the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. Miller] or the gentleman from St. Lawrence, who has just taken his seat [Mr. Merritt], that our good name depended on the place where we are to close our deliberations, I might, perhaps, agree with them that one place might, perchance, have some advantage over another. But we are of age, we are at least "children of a larger growth," and we have arrived at those mature years when every man's character must depend upon his conduct in life, and it certainly can be as well displayed in one place as another. And, in my judgment, we can as well maintain a good character in the city of New York as in the city of Albany or any other place. I cannot believe, in the first place, that the people of the State of New York care one rush whether we meet here or meet in New York. They may care, and very probably do care, and we ought to care even more than the constituents whom we represent, that our deliberations should be conducted in a decent and orderly manner, and that we shall make that progress in them which becomes the members of a deliberative body. My friend from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt] says we are required to meet here by the law under which we were convened. The same law which convened us here gives us power to meet elsewhere if we so determine, and we have just as much right to meet in the city of New York as we have to meet in the city of Albany. But there are, in my judgment, reasons why we should come to the conclusion that this is the proper time to make the change. The keeper of the Capitol has said that it is necessary to have fifteen or twenty days to prepare the Capitol for the Legislature. Such has been the custom during times past, and, I suppose, whatever may be our right to sit in this Capitol after the 1st of January, there is no disposition to maintain that right. It is, therefore, perhaps, to be considered as a matter of justice to the Legislature, as well as a matter of convenience to ourselves, that we change our place of meeting. The law gives us the power to change and we have precedent for it. The first Convention which assembled in this State, met in the city of New York and changed its place four times before it closed its deliberations. It first assembled in the city of New York, then at White Plains, then at Poughkeepsie and finally in Kingston, where it closed its deliberations. And although there were circumstances which controlled the action of that Convention which need not control us, still, in the discharge of their duties to the public, they thought proper to make the changes I have named. Let me say, in addition, that if we adopt the resolution suggested by my friend from

Putnam [Mr. Morris], it is to cost the State no more money than it will cost if we remain here; and it certainly will not cost the members of this Convention no more money to make this change. The hall which has been tendered is a suitable place for meeting, and it has been tendered free of expense, and every gentleman must realize that the accommodations in the city of New York are quite as ample as they are in the city of Albany. But my experience as a member of the Legislature—certainly not for recent years—but I think the observation of every gentleman who has attended the opening of the sessions of the Legislature, warrant the conclusion that it would be in some respects, an unseemly spectacle to see the members of the Convention and the members of the Legislature jostling together, the one claiming this hall and Capitol, as they have, perhaps, a right to it, and the other meeting, we do not know at present where and under what circumstances or what inconveniences. The place where it is proposed to call this Convention, if it should be the judgment of the majority of this body, is in the heart of the city of New York. It is in the immediate circle of four great libraries, if gentlemen take any interest in such subjects: the Historical Society, the Mercantile Association Library, the Astor Library and the library of the Cooper Institute. There is, therefore, every convenience and accommodation. One word more before I resume my seat, in regard to the imputations which are, from time to time, cast by gentlemen from the country who may, perhaps, be drawn to the city of New York. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] has given a painful picture of what will be the comments of the people if we go from Albany to the city of New York. In the name of heaven, what do these gentlemen think the city of New York really is? It is a city of a million of people. It has its bad aspects, and, as has been said by the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould], it certainly has its good aspects; and personally what I desire more than any thing else, as a member of this Convention, is that some of the delegates here will go to New York, at least to unlearn some of the prejudices which they entertain in regard to that great commercial city.

Mr. MERRITT—Before the gentleman sits down I will call his attention to the law with reference to the meeting in the city of Albany. It was pretty well discussed when we talked of going to Saratoga. It reads: "After the said Convention has met and organized, it shall have power to adjourn to and hold its meetings at any place other than the Assembly chamber, at the Capitol." I hold that means that we may adjourn to any place in the city of Albany. The law does not contemplate moving to any other place.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I hold that it is perfectly in our power to meet where we will.

Mr. MERRITT—That may be as to general principles, but not according to the law.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I hold that we are independent of the Legislature; that we are convened by the Constitution of 1846, and not by the Legislative act of 1866-7; and also that the "other place," according to a fair construction, may mean any other place—that is, town—out of the Assembly chamber in the city of Albany. This, in my judgment, is our right and our duty under the circumstances. We are to be driven away from this Capitol by the assembling of the Legislature. But, sir, when interrupted I was speaking of the prejudices entertained against the city of New York. I want these gentlemen to see that that is a great metropolis of churches, of schools, of libraries, of industrial associations, of intelligent mechanics and professional men, and that if it has its dark picture, it also has its bright side.

Mr. MERRILL moved the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Merrill, and it was declared carried.

Mr. ALVORD demanded the ayes and noes on the adoption of the substitute.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Morris to reconsider, and it was declared carried, by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Ballard, Barto, Beadle, Bergen, E. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Church, Clarke, Cochran, Comstock, Cooke, Curtis, Daly, Develin, Duganne, Eddy, Endress, Evarts, Flagler, Fowler, Fuller, Garvin, Gould, Gross, Hardenburgh, Jarvis, Ketcham, Larremore, A. Lawrence, A. R. Lawrence, Ludington, Magee, Mattice, Monell, More, Morris, Opdyke, C. E. Parker, Pierrepont, President, Prosser, Robertson, Rogers, Root, A. D. Russell, L. W. Russell, Schell, Schumaker, Silvester, Sheldon, Stratton, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen, Veeder—56.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Axtell, Baker, Barker, Beckwith, Bell, Bickford, Bowen, Case, Cassidy, Cheritree, Corbett, Corning, C. C. Dwight, Ferry, Folger, Francis, Goodrich, Graves, Hadley, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Harris, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Houston, Kinney, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, McDonald, Merrill, Merritt, Merwin, Miller, A. J. Parker, Potter, Prindle, Rathbun, Reynolds, Roy, Seaver, Smith, Spencer, M. I. Townsend, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—52.

Mr. MORRIS—Mr. Chairman——

The PRESIDENT—The question now recurs on the adoption of the original resolution which the Secretary will read.

Mr. BARKER—I move to lay the resolution on the table

Mr. E. BROOKS—I understand that the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris] was recognized by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris] was recognized by the Chair. The gentleman will make his motion if he desires.

Mr. MORRIS—I have an amendment which I desre to offer. It is to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert as follows:

WHEREAS, It is now probable that the labors of this Convention will not be completed before this chamber will be required by the Legislature; therefore

Resolved, That this Convention hereby tenders its thanks to Colonel Clark for his offer of the Seventh Regiment armory to this Convention, and that when this Convention shall adjourn on the last day of its session during the present month, it do adjourn to meet at the said armory, or at such other place in the city of New York as may be secured free of expense to the State by a committee of three to be appointed by the President.

Digitized by Google

I will not discuss this amendment as the subject has been so well debated already as to leave little more to be said. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. CHURCH—I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment, as I wish to make an amendment.

Mr. MORRIS—I withdraw it.

Mr. CHURCH—I offer the following as a substitute for the original proposition. It is in the nature, I suppose, of a second amendment.

The PRESIDENT—It will be received as such provided it is germane to the first. The Secretary will read the amendment of the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church].

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

Resolved, That this Convention will proceed to the completion of the article on the judiciary to the exclusion of all other business, and recommend its submission to the people for their adoption by the Legislature, and that the Convention will then adjourn subject to be re-assembled by the Legislature, if that body shall deem it wise and proper to re-assemble the Convention for the purpose of completing its business.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair must inform the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church] that under the recent rule this amendment cannot be received, it not being germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris].

Mr. ALVORD—I move that the resolution of the gentleman from Putnam be referred to the Committee on Revision. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT—The Chair must inform the gentleman from Onondaga that the gentleman from Putnam yielded the floor temporarily to the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church] to offer his amendment, the previous question having been already demanded.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. ALVORD—It is that the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris] cannot yield the floor for the purpose of having an amendment offered, and then resume the floor after another member has obtained it.

Mr. CHURCH—It was understood, I suppose, that I was to renew my motion for the previous question.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman did not renew the motion, and the Chair must rule that notwithstanding a contrary practice according to strict parliamentary law, the point of order raised by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] is well taken.

Mr. ALVORD—I now move that the whole subject-matter be laid upon the table, and upon that I demand the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered, and the motion to lay on the table was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Axtell, Baker, Barker, Beckwith, Bell, Bickford, Bowen, E. A. Brown, Case, Cassidy, Cheritree, Corbett, Corning, C. C. Dwight, Ferry, Folger, Francis, Goodrich, Graves, Hadley, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Harris, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Houston, Kinney, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, McDonald, Merrill, Merritt, Merwin, Miller, A. J. Parker, Potter, Prindle, Rathbun, Reynolds, Roy, Seaver, Smith, M. I. Townsend, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—52.

Noes—Messrs. Ballard, Barto, Beadle, Bergen, E. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Church, Clarke, Cochran, Comstock, Cooke, Curtis, Daly, Develin, Duganne, Eddy, Endress, Evarts, Flagler, Fowler, Fuller, Garvin, Gould, Gross, Hardenburgh, Jarvis, Ketcham, Larremore, A. Lawrence, A. R. Lawrence, Ludington, Magee, Mattice, Monell, More, Morris, Opdyke, C. E. Parker, Pierrepont, President, Prosser, Robertson, Rogers, Root, A. D. Russell, L. W. Russell, Schell, Schumaker, Silvester, Sheldon, Spencer, Stratton, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen, Veeder—56.

Mr. MORRIS—I now move the previous question upon the amendment offered by myself.

Mr. ALVORD—Upon that I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered, and the previous question was ordered by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Ballard, Barto, Beadle, Bergen, E. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Church, Clarke, Cochran, Comstock, Cooke, Curtis, Daly, Develin, Eddy, Endress, Evarts, Flagler, Fowler, Francis, Fuller, Garvin, Gould, Gross, Hardenburgh, Jarvis, Ketcham, Larremore, A. Mr. ALVORD—I move that this Convention do now adjourn, and upon that I call for the ayes and noes.

Mr. VEEDER—I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. VEEDER—It is that while we are under the operation of the previous question, no other motion or business can intervene.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair decides that under the rule adopted by the Convention, a motion for adjournment takes precedence.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered, and the motion to adjourn was lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M.

Mr. ALVORD—I move to postpone this whole matter indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair informs the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] that under the rules a motion for the previous question takes precedence.

Mr. ALVORD—I beg most respectfully to appeal from the decision of the Chair, and upon that I call for the ayes and noes.

The PRESIDENT—The decision of the Chair is based upon the provision contained in chapter 9 of the rules, which the Secretary will please read.

The SECRETARY read from chapter 9, rule 29, as follows:

"When a question shall be under consideration no motion shall be received except as herein specified; and motions shall have precedence in the order stated, viz.: First, for an adjournment; second, for a recess; third, a call of the Convention; fourth, for the previous question; fifth, to lay on the table; sixth, to postpone indefinitely; seventh, to postpone to a day certain; eighth, to commit to a Committee of the Whole; ninth, to commit to a standing committee."

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I suggest to the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] that he had better, after the explanation of the Chair, withdraw that motion. [Laughter.]

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BARKER—Is it in order to make an inquiry of the presiding officer?

The PRESIDENT—It is not during a division.

Mr. BARKER—I simply wish to inquire how my name is recorded as voting upon this question?

The SECRETARY—It is recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. BARKER—That is in accordance with my vote. [Laughter.]

The SECRETARY announced the vote as follows:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Axtell, Baker, Ballard, Barker, Barto, Beadle, Bell, Bergen, Bickford, Bowen, E. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Cassidy, Champlain, Cheritree, Church, Clarke, Cochran, Comstock, Cooke, Corbett, Corning, Curtis, Daly, Develin, Duganne, C. C. Lawrence, A. R. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Ludington, Magee, Mattice, McDonald, Merrill, Merritt, Merwin, Miller, Monell, More, Morris, Opdyke, A. J. Parker, C. E. Russell, Schell, Schumaker, Seaver, Seymour, Silvester, Smith, Spencer, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen, Veeder, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—108.

So the decision of the Chair was unanimously sustained.

Mr. FOLGER—I move that the Convention do now adjourn, and upon that I demand the ayes and noes.

Mr. ROGERS—I move the previous question. [Laughter.]

A sufficient number seconding the call the ayes and noes were ordered.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll.

The name of Mr. Seaver was called.

Mr. SEAVER—I wish to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his reasons.

Mr. SEAVER—I ordinarily feel disposed to proceed with our business with all proper dispatch, but not desiring to detain gentlemen here whose duties require their attendance at home every night, I feel called upon to vote for an adjournment, if compelled to vote at all, but I hope the Convention will excuse me from voting.

[Several delegates inquired of the President how they were recorded as voting upon the question, and many of them expressed a desire to change their votes.]

The PRESIDENT—Gentlemen seem to have been so inattentive to the announcement of their votes the Secretary will again call the roll.

Mr. SEAVER—I rise to a question of privilege. I asked to be excused from voting, and no count has been taken upon that question.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman did vote, as understood by the Chair and by the Secretary.

Mr. SEAVER—I did not vote. I asked to be excused from voting.

The PRESIDENT—The question then is on excusing the gentleman from Franklin [Mr. Seaver] from voting.

Mr. FOLGER—Upon that I call for the ayes and noes.

Mr. CHURCH—I rise to a point of order, that it is not in order to call for the ayes and noes while the ayes and noes are being taken.

The PRESIDENT—It is not in order; the point of order is well taken.

Mr. ALVORD—From that decision of the Chair I beg leave respectfully to appeal.

The PRESIDENT—The question is, shall the decision of the Chair be sustained?

Digitized by Google

Mr. FOLGER—I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, which was declared carried.

Mr. DUGANNE—I move that this Convention do now adjourn.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I rise to a question of order—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair anticipates the point of order raised by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks]. A motion to adjourn cannot be entertained while a division by ayes and noes is being taken.

Mr. SEAVER—I rise to a point of order, that the question of appeal from the decision of the Chair having been laid on the table, it carries the whole subject with it.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that the point of order is not well taken. The Secretary will now read the list of delegates, in order that gentlemen may understand how they have voted.

[The SECRETARY read the list of delegates, and several votes were changed from the negative to the affirmative, and others from the affirmative to the negative. Before the vote was announced the hour of twelve o'clock arrived.]

The PRESIDENT—The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the Convention will proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. VEEDER—I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. VEEDER—It is that we are now voting upon a motion to adjourn, which is always in order, and that that motion should be decided before we do any thing else.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. VEEDER—I move that the roll of delegates be called again on this motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT—That motion is not in order.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his question of order.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—My point of order is that we have carried this matter about far enough. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would state that that is a question of propriety for the consideration of delegates. [Laughter].

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—But we might go on all day in this way. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would state to the gentleman that it is in the power of the Convention to go on for several days in this way if it pleases. [Laughter.]

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Well, sir, I shall enter my protest against it. [Laughter].

The SECRETARY announced the vote on the motion to adjourn as follows:

Ayes—Messrs. Baker, Ballard, Barto, Bergen, E. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Cassidy, Cheritree, Church, Clarke, Comstock, Curtis, Daly, Develin, Duganne, Endress, Fowler, Garvin, Goodrich, Gross, Hardenburgh, Jarvis, Ketcham, Larremore, A. R. Lawrence, Lee, Monell, More, Morris, Opdyke, Rathbun, Robertson, Rogers, Roy, A. D. Russell, L. W. Russell, Schell, Schumaker, Silvester, M. I. Townsend, Tucker, Van Campen Veeder—43.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Axtell, Barker, Beadle, Beckwith, Bell, Bickford, Bowen, E. A. Brown, Case, Cochran, Cooke, Corbett, Corning, C. C. Dwight, Eddy, Evarts, Ferry, Flagler, Folger, Francis, Fuller, Gould, Graves, Hadley, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Harris, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Houston, Kinney, Krum, A. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Ludington, Magee, Mattice, McDonald, Merrill, Merritt, Merwin, Miller, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, Pierrepont, Potter, President, Prindle, Prosser, Reynolds, Root, Seaver Sheldon, Smith, Spencer, Stratton, S. Townsend, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—66.

So the motion was lost.

Mr. SILVESTER—I move to lay the special order on the table, and upon that motion I call for the ayes and noes.

The PRESIDENT—That can be done only by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. VEEDER—I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. VEEDER—The special order for to-day was at twelve o'clock. That hour having passed, it ceases to be a special order, and proceedings revert to the general order of business.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. E. BROOKS—With great respect I differ with the Chair, and appeal from his decision, when he says that it requires a two-thirds vote to lay the special order on the table. My ground for the appeal will be found in chapter 9 of the rules, in the twenty-third rule, which says:

"When a question shall be under consideration, no motion shall be received except as herein specified, and motions shall have precedence in the order specified, for an adjournment, for a recess, for a call of the Convention, to lay on the table, to postpone indefinitely, and to postpone to a day certain."

My point is, that the motion to postpone to a day certain, that is, to this day at twelve o'clock, is taken precedence of by a motion to lay on the table. I think, therefore, that the majority may control its own business, and vote to lay on the table.

The PRESDIENT—The Chair assigns as the reason for his decision, rule 18, which the Secretary will read.

Mr. ALVORD—I was about to read it myself in my place.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman may read it in his place if he chooses.

Mr. ALVORD—(Reading):

"Any particular report or other matter on the general orders, may be a special order for any particular day, or from day to day with the assent of two-thirds of the members voting, and no special order shall be postponed or rescinded except by a similar vote."

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that a motion to lay on the table, if it prevails, is a virtual postponement.

Mr. ALVORD—I have the floor. Under the approval of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr E. Brooks] I desire to say, in support of the decision taken by the Chair, that it has been the universal parliamentary rule, in the entire history of this State, that no special order can be in any way got rid of except by a two-thirds vote. Both houses have held that there was no distinction between postponing and laying on the table, because laying on the table was postponing. For that reason, I trust there will be no sort of question in this controversy, of sustaining the Chair in an eminently correct parliamentary decision.

The PRESIDENT—The question is, shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of this Convention?

Mr. CHURCH—Is this question debatable?

The PRESIDENT—It is.

Mr. CHURCH—So far as I am concerned, I am disinclined to vote against the decision of the Chair, even though it was contrary to my own judgment. But I must differ with my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] in relation to the rule. The rule which we have adopted, in the first place, requires that a special order shall not be postponed or rescinded without a vote of two-thirds. Now the simple question is whether a motion to lay a special order upon the table is a postponement. And by looking to the rule which the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] read, it will be seen that a postponement, or a motion to postpone, is either a motion to postpone indefinitely or a motion to postpone to a day certain. These are the only two modes to postpone a subject—indefinitely or to a day certain. There is no other motion to postpone. And by the rule which was read by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] a motion to lay on the table is distingnished from and has precedence over a motion to postpone at all. Therefore, it seems to me to be a clear proposition that a motion to lay on the table is not, within the meaning of the rules we have adopted, a motion to postpone. It is a matter in which I feel no interest, except upon the merits of the question. I am clearly of the opinion that this is not a question requiring a two-thirds vote.

Mr. FOLGER—With due deference to the superior parliamentary knowledge of the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church] and the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], I must differ from them and agree entirely with the Chair. It is quite certain that in this matter you cannot do indirectly what you may not do directly. Now each of these gentlemen admits that you cannot by a direct motion postpone a special order. But can the rules be so evaded as to indirectly arrive at a result which the mover admits he cannot reach directly? He admits he cannot, without a two-thirds vote, secure a motion to postpone either indefinitely or to a day certain.

Mr. CHURCH—Will the gentleman allow me? The gentleman says a legislative body cannot do indirectly what it cannot do directly. I ask him whether this morning this body did not by indirection postpone taking the question upon a resolution for about two hours, which resulted in throwing it over the day?

Mr. FOLGER—This body has not by indirection postponed it. It has come to a vote upon a direct question which was in order under the rules every time. There is no indirection at all. They went directly to the question, on which they voted and arrived at a direct result. In the proceedings this morning there was no standing rule in the way requiring a two-thirds vote. But here is a different thing. Here is a standing rule which demands a two-thirds vote to postpone a special order. If this special order is laid upon the table by this motion, I appeal to the common sense of any gentleman who hears me, whether it is not a postponement? No matter for how long, whether for an hour, for a day, or for a week. It is a postponement. Can, then, gentlemen who say that they cannot directly postpone without a two-thirds vote, claim with any show of reason that they can move to lay upon the table and by a bare majority thus postpone? My experience has been, that a motion to lay upon the table a special order has been held to require a two-thirds vote, where there has been in existence a rule like ours. I never knew it to prevail otherwise but once, and that was the day before Thanksgiving, in this body, when it prevailed by the unanimous consent of this house, and if the point of order now raised had been raised then, it would have been sustained by the person then in the chair.

Mr. SILVESTER—I do not pretend to have any knowledge of parliamentary law, and I have no intention of appealing from the decision of the Chair, but it seems to me the rules plainly recognize a distinction, notwithstanding all that the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] may say, between a motion to lay upon the table and a motion to postpone indefinitely, and a motion to postpone to a day certain, because they class them in three different orders. In chapter 9, No. 5, in the order of precedence, is to lay on the table; No. 6, to postpone indefinitely, and No. 7 to postpone to a day certain. This certainly, in my opinion, recognizes a distinction between the three kinds of postponement, because they are placed in separate divisions in the same rule.

Mr. MERRILL—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Merrill, and it was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT put the question on sustaining the decision of the Chair, and, on a division, it was declared sustained, by a vote of 70 to 10.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. Silvester to lay the special order upon the table.

Mr. SILVESTER—On the motion to lay upon the table, I call for the ayes and noes.

Mr. SCHELL—I move that the Convention do now adjourn. On that I ask the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Schell, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Ballard, Barto, Bergen, E. Brooks, Cassidy, Church, Clarke, Cochran, Comstock, Daly, Develin, Endress, Garvin, Gross, Jarvis, Ketcham, Larremore, A. R. Lawrence, Ingee, Mattice, Monell, Morris, Pierrepont, Robertson, Rogers, A. D. Russell, Schell, Schumaker, Silvester, Tucker, Veeder—31.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Axtell, Baker, Barker, Beadle, Beckwith, Bell, Bickford, Bowen, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Cheritree, Cooke, Corbett, Corning, Curtis, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Eddy, Ferry, Flagler, Folger, Fowler, Francis, Fuller, Goodrich, Gould, Graves, Hadley, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Harris, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Houston, Kinney, Krum, A. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Ludington, McDonald, Merrill, Merritt, Merwin, Miller, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, Potter, President, Prindle, Prosser, Rathbun, Reynolds, Root, Roy, L. W. Russell, Seaver, Sheldon, Smith, Spencer, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Van Campen, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—74.

Mr. VEEDER—I rise to a point of order, that the previous question having been ordered before the resolution of the gentleman in reference to the adjournment of this Convention, and that, being under the operation of the previous question, no business can intervene unless it be a motion to adjourn. We cannot take up the special order until we dispose of that motion.

The PRESIDENT—In relation to what motion is the gentleman speaking?

Mr. VEEDER—In relation to the motion of Mr. Morris, of Putnam, in reference to the adjournment of this Convention to the city of New York. Upon that resolution the previous question has been ordered. The motion was subsequently made to adjourn. I raised the question that, we being under the operation of the previous question, no business could intervene. The Chair decided that the motion to adjourn was in order and not beyond that. Now I raise the point of order that we cannot go into the special order, nor can we entertain a motion to lay the special order of business on the table.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that the objection to the decision of the Chair should have been taken at the time; that other business intervening, the objection comes too late. Therefore, it does not assign the reason for its decision.

Mr. VEEDER—I desire to explain. The Chair does not understand my point. I do not raise my objection to the decision of the Chair at that time, which was simply upon the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], which was a motion to adjourn. But I understand the Chair now to have announced a certain special order upon which a motion has been made to lay that special order upon the table. My point of order is upon that question, that the Chair cannot announce a special order, nor can a motion to lay a special order be made when the previous question has been ordered upon a resolution pending before the house. We must first dispose of that resolution, upon which the previous question has been ordered.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that the special order would override any preceding order of business, and it must take effect at twelve o'clock. The effect would be that when the special order is disposed of, the question is resumed as when the Convention left it.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I move to postpone the special order, which is the report of the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature, until the report of the Judiciary Committee shall have been disposed of.

Mr. ALVORD—On that I call the ayes and noes.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] that the pending question is that on the motion of the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Silvester], to lay the special order on the table, which takes precedence, under the rule of the Convention.

Mr. SILVESTER—On that I call the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The SECRETARY proceeded with the call, when the motion was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Ballard, Barto, Bergen, E. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Church, Clarke, Cochran, Comstock, Cooke, Daly, Develin, Evarts, Flagler, Fuller, Garvin, Gould, Gross, Jarvis, Ketcham, Larremore, A. Lawrence, A. R. Lawrence, Mattice, Monell, Morris, Opdyke, C. E. Parker, Pierrepont, Prosser, Robertson, A. D. Russell, Schell, Schumaker, Silvester, Sheldon, S. Townsend, Tucker, Veeder, Wakeman—41.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Axtell, Baker, Barker, Beadle, Beckwith, Bell, Bickford, Bowen, Case, Cheritree, Corbett, Corning, Curtis, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Eddy, Ferry, Folger, Goodrich, Graves, Hadley, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Harris, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Houston, Kinney, Krum, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Ludington, Magee, McDonald, Merrill, Merritt, Merwin, Miller, A. J. Parker, Potter, President, Prindle, Reynolds, Roy, L. W. Russell, Seaver, Smith, Spencer, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, Van Campen, Wales, Williams—59.

Mr. E. BROOKS—A great many gentlemen in this Convention have said that one reason why our business is so much retarded is that we jump from one thing to another and leave the previous order unfinished. Therefore, I move you, to test the sincerity of gentlemen, that the special order be postponed until the report of the Judiciary Committee be disposed of. On that motion I ask the ayes and noes.

Mr. FOLGER—I think it is very evident to the Convention that very little business can be done this day with any profit, owing to the state of mind in which we have placed ourselves. I therefore move that this Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and, on a division, the motion was declared carried by a vote of 61 to 36.

So the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 12, 1867

The Convention met at ten o'clock, A. M.

No clergyman was present.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. VEEDER—I notice that the Secretary has omitted the question that was raised when the Chair announced the special order. When the motion was made to lay that special order on the table I called the attention of the Chair to the fact that we were then under consideration of a motion to adjourn. The Chair will remember that the members were changing their votes from one way to the other. The Chair then decided that that business would not be taken up until the motion to adjourn was disposed of. It subsequently was disposed of, and then the special order was taken up.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair believes the gentleman to state the fact correctly. The Journal will be amended in that particular.

Mr. BROOKS—I desire to have the Journal amended so as to record the facts in the proceedings of yesterday. I do not wish to appear upon the Journal as appealing from the decision of the Chair without giving a reason for that appeal. I desire, therefore, that the reason stated by me may be entered upon the Journal: that the appeal was made upon the ground that the motion to lay upon the table was an independent motion, and took precedence of the motion then pending.

Mr. ALVORD—I would ask the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], and the Chair, and the Convention, whether ever in the history of legislation in this State, a request, such as the gentleman has made, has been complied with? Never, in my experience, has the reason stated by any one who appealed from the decision of the Chair, been spread upon and made a part of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair is not aware of any precedent.

Mr. E. BROOKS—In the first place, we are required to keep a journal, and I suppose the object of a journal is to report the precise facts of the case. I made a motion and I gave a reason for it very briefly. In the order of the proceedings yesterday very many of them appeared merely factious, and showing a disposition on the part of the minority to override the majority; and it seems to me that the fact of giving a reason for appeal is a proper subject for entering upon the Journal. If it is a question of precedent I can show the gentleman plenty of them in favor of the motion I have made. We are required to keep a journal, which journal is supposed to record the precise facts in the case. That is all I ask in making the amendment to the Journal.

Mr. ALVORD—It would seem to me as proper, in case of a permission of this kind, that the remarks that were made by the Chair, and by others who undertook to sustain the Chair in giving the reasons why the Chair made the decision, should be spread upon the Journal, as that the reasons of the individual who made the first motion for an appeal should be entered. In other words, the Journal, which is none other than it was intended to be, simply a transcript or synopsis, would be be an exact and full recital of the entire of the business of the Convention. There can be no limit to any thing of this kind, because if the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] has a right to have stated upon the Journal what he has said to strengthen the position he has taken in appealing from the decision of the Chair, it is no more than right that the Chair and those who sustained the Chair should h the right to spread their reasons also upon Journal, so that they shall go together—the to neutralize, if possible, the other. I trust the fore, that we shall not, without precedent ir history of legislation in this State, undertake make our Journal a transcript of debates in t Convention.

Mr. E. BROOKS—If the gentleman will allow the thing to be corrected according to facts, I think he and I know enough of parl mentary law to know that a motion may be ma which will put the facts upon the Journal of day instead of yesterday. I therefore move amend the Journal so that it shall read:

"Mr. E. Brooks took an appeal upon the grou that the motion to lay upon the table was an dependent motion and took precedence of t special order, which was to postpone to a d certain."

The PRESIDENT—The Chair believes that be a fact, and rules that any matter by way reason for a motion is in order to be entered up the Journal, but that debate or discussion up the motion is not proper to be put upon t Journal. The Chair rules that the motion amend the Journal is in order.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I would not thro any obstruction in the way of the gentl man from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] settin himself right; but I do deem that, as the Co vention has provided a perpetual record of ever thing that is said in the Convention, of ever word and reason that is given, it is hardly nece sary to make a record of the remarks of gentle men upon two different books. We have pr vided for the printing of the debates, and in those debates every word which the gentlema uttered will go in the exact form in which h uttered it, so that the gentleman will stand righ before the State upon the record which we pr vide and pay for at the expense of the State. does seem to me that it can hardly be necessar that remarks should be printed upon two record If we had no other record than this formal on kept by the clerk there might be some objec in the motion made by the gentleman; but I d not see any object in thus adding to the Journa kept by the Clerk. For that reason, I am, for one opposed to the motion.

Mr. ALVORD—I would ask of the Chai whether it is in order now to move to lay th motion of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E Brooks], to amend the Journal, upon the table?

The PRESIDENT—Such motion is in order.

Mr. ALVORD—I move to lay that motion o the table.

Mr. ROGERS—I demand the ayes and noes o that motion.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Armstrong, Axtell, Baker, Beckwith, Case, Corbett, Corning, Curtis, C. C. Dwight, Folger, Francis, Gould, Graves, Hadley, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Harris, Hiscock, Hitchcock,

The question was put on the motion of Mr. E. Brooks, and it was declared carried.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I desire to suggest an amendment to the Journal in reference to the statement of the decision of the Chair, so called, when the motion to lay over the special order of business was made yesterday. I desire to have the phrase changed so as to intimate that it was an expression simply of opinion from the Chair, because at that time there was nothing before the Convention, which required deciding, and necessarily there could not be a decision until after the vote was taken on the motion to lay over. I was prepared myself to make a suggestion at the time, but considered it premature to make any suggestion in regard to that question of order until the crisis arose for the purpose of determining that question, to wit: when the Chair should pronounce whether or not the motion to lay on the table was carried by a proper number of votes. I, therefore, propose to amend the minutes by inserting "expressed an opinion" in regard to the question of order as to the motion to lay the special order of business on the table, from which expression an appeal was taken I do not wish to be precluded, in case that question should come up, from the opportunity of being heard on the question whether the decision of the Chair or the decision of the house was proper in reference to the number of votes necessary to carry that question. If the Clerk will read that part of the Journal which refers to the decision upon the propriety of the motion for laying the question on the table, I will then suggest the amendment.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read that portion of the Journal referred to.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I move to insert "expressed an opinion" instead of "decided."

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—It would be gratifying to members of the Convention to have the Chair state whether the Chair did, upon that occasion, decide the question or merely express an opinion.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair intended it to be a positive decision. It did decide that the motion to lay on the table would require a vote of two-thirds, but did not intend to preclude any one from questioning any decision on the final vote being taken.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I would respectfully ask the Chair whether or not, according to parliamentary usage, a technical decision can be made where there is no matter before the house for its decision, and whether we are precluded, upon the question being taken upon the motion to lay on the table, from raising the question whether a two-thirds majority is necessary to carry the vote?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair did not seek to preclude any gentleman from raising a question; on the contrary, the decision was based upon inquiry made. The Chair simply stated the rule of the Convention applicable to the motion.

Mr. DEVELIN—I would like the Secretary to read that portion of the Journal again.

The SECRETARY again read that portion of the Journal referred to.

Mr. DEVELIN—It seems to me that the suggestion made by my colleague from New York [Mr. Robertson] is correct. The President, according to the Journal, made a decision when there was no question before the Convention. Nobody raised any question, so far as the Journal shows. Nobody raised the question as to how many votes were required to lay that question on the table; and it seems to have been a mere expression of opinion on the President, and that the decision of that question should not have been made until after the vote had been taken and counted. Then was the time to make the decision.

The PRESIDENT—A motion had been made to lay the special order upon the table. The Chair simply stated the rule of the Convention applicable to that motion.

Mr. DEVELIN—The question never arose as to how many votes were required to lay the special order on the table at that part of the proceeding, according to the minutes of the Journal; but the President voluntarily expressed an opinion that it required a two-thirds vote to lay the special order on the table.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair has no distinct recollection; but it is informed by the Secretary that the question was asked.

Mr. DEVELIN—We are now talking, not about the recollection of the President, or the recollection of the Secretary, but about the record, which is to be printed and remain as a precedent, and I am prepared to discuss that question by and by whenever it comes up again as to the correctness of the decision of the President on the question of laying the special order on the table; and therefore I do not wish to be precluded by the record that the President decided that it required a two-thirds vote when there was no question before the Convention for a decision.

Mr. MERRITT—The question was raised by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks].

Mr. DEVELIN—It does not appear on the record that the question was raised by any body. I am talking about the record, not about the recollection of any gentleman. I am speaking about the record of the Convention. That question as to how many votes were required to lay the special order on the table, did not come up according to the record, and it could not have come up in any way until the vote had been taken, and when the vote had been taken and announced.

Digitized by Google

Then was the time for the President to decide whether or not the special order was laid upon the table, and then to say that it required a two-thirds vote, and that the motion was lost. But according to the record we have here, the President must have expressed an opinion It could be nothing more than an opinion because there was no question before the Convention. Any other remark of the President might as well be appealed from. If he said it was going to snow to-morrow, or the day after to-morrow, or that it snowed yesterday, it would be just as appropriate a decision as this one as it now appears on the record.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I differ entirely with the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] as to whether the question arose. The question did arise necessarily, and the question having arisen, the President necessarily decided it. In the ordinary course of proceedings, the President puts the question to the house: "Those in favor of the motion will say, aye," and, "Those who are opposed to the motion will say, no," and the President upon the apparent balance of voices decides whether the motion is carried or not. But, in the opinion of the President, a question was to be decided, that requires that the officers of the house should count the vote.

Mr. MERRITT—The very question was raised, in that connection, by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], and was decided upon the statement of the President declaring what the decision had been previously. The question had just been decided by the President upon that very point.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I do not remember how that was.

Mr. RATHBUN—The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] put the question to the President directly, what will be the effect of it, and how many votes does it require to lay that on the table, and in answer to that, the President said that it would take the same number as for postponement.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—The occurrence of yesterday may be adequately remembered.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I move that the Journal stand approved.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I decline to yield the floor for any such purpose. I deem it a matter of some importance, and therefore I desire to proceed further. The gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt] may be right in his recollection. The gentleman from Cayuga [Mr. Rathbun] may be right in his recollection. I do not remember, one way or the other, how that was; but I am putting the view that I take of this matter entirely upon the ground that the question necessarily arises, when such a vote is about to be taken, and it is entirely proper for the President to decide in advance how that vote should be taken; and if the President deems that it is a case where he should direct the vote to be so taken, that it can be distinctly and minutely counted in the exigency of the case, the decision upon such a question is as truly a decision as any other that can be made, and it must always arise in such a case. If the President thinks that it is a question where the vote must be counted, and the President decides that the vote needs to l counted, it is a decision upon a question th has already arisen, and that decision disposes c the question for the time being, at all event The President must necessarily have decided th he would have the vote taken differently from tl ordinary mode of taking the vote of this house.

Mr. KRUM moved the previous question upc the motion.

The question was put on the motion of M Krum, and it was declared carried.

Mr. DEVELIN demanded the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, tl ayes and noes were not ordered.

The question was put upon the motion of M Robertson, and, on a division, it was declared los by a vote of 34 to 60.

No further amendment being offered, the Jou nal was declared approved.

Mr. GOULD—I ask leave of absence for M Rumsey for the remainder of the week.

No objection being made, leave was granted.

Mr. GOULD—I also ask leave of absence f Mr. Eddy for to-day and to-morrow.

No objection being made, leave was granted.

Mr. VEEDER—I desire to call the attentic of the President to the fact that when we a journed yesterday we were under the operatio of the previous question, upon the resolutions t adjourn this Convention to the city of New Yorl and that we cannot now, on re-assembling thi morning, commence under the ordinary routir of business, but that the Convention must pr ceed at once at the point at which it left o being under the operation of the main questio

The PRESIDENT—If the gentleman makes a point of order the Chair rules that the point o order is not well taken. That will be the firs business in order under the head of resolution

The PRESIDENT presented the memorial c the East River Medical Association of New Yorl in relation to the sale of dangerous medicines b apothecaries.

Mr. ROGERS moved that the communicatio be laid upon the table for the present.

The question was put on the motion of M Rogers, and it was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT presented a communicatio from the common council of Troy, tendering th use of a suitable hall in that city for the meetin of the Convention, after the meeting of the Le ialature.

Mr. CORBETT moved that the communicatio be referred to the select committee appointe yesterday.

The question was put on the motion of Mr Corbett, and it was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT—Resolutions are now in o der, and under this head the question is upon th substitute offered by Mr. Morris to the origin resolution of Mr. Merritt. The substitute will b read by the Secretary.

The substitute was read as follows:

Resolved, That this Convention hereby tende its thanks to Colonel Emmons Clark for his offe of the Seventh Regiment armory to this Conver tion, and that when this Convention shall ac journ on the last day of its sessions, during th present month, it do adjourn to meet at suc armory, or at such other place in the city of New York as may be secured, free of expense to the State, by a committee of three, to be appointed by the President.

The PRESIDENT—The previous question and the ayes and noes have been ordered.

Mr. FOLGER—I ask for a division of the question. That part which votes thanks to Colonel Clark I suppose there will be no objection to.

The PRESIDENT—The question will be so divided.

Mr. DEVELIN—Will the ayes and noes be taken upon the second part of the resolution?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understands the order for the ayes and noes to apply to the whole proposition.

Mr. DEVELIN—May not the ayes and noes be waived by unanimous consent on the part of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—It is competent for the Convention to do any thing it pleases by unanimous consent. If there be no objection the ayes and noes will be dispensed with in the first part of the proposition.

The question was put on the first branch of the substitute, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred on the remaining portion of the substitute.

Mr. BICKFORD—I rise to a question of order, that that resolution does not provide any definite place where the Convention shall meet when it adjourns.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman can make that a reason for voting against it if he chooses. The point of order is not well taken.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll on the remaining part of the substitute.

The name of Mr. Cooke was called.

Mr. COOKE—I ask to be excused from voting on this question and to be permitted to state briefly my reasons.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will be allowed five minutes, within the rule.

Mr. COOKE—I have voted steadily since this question has been up before the Convention in favor of referring it to a committee to ascertain whether suitable accommodations can be had in the city of New York, and whether it is expedient, in view of all the circumstances, that we should adjourn to that place. I, however, have not designed to vote for this resolution for the reason that I consider it objectionable on the ground stated by the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford]. I see no objection myself to adjourning this Convention to the city of New York. I see many reasons in favor of it; and if, in view of all the facts, a committee to be appointed shall recommend and show good reasons to exist in favor of such adjournment, I shall support the recommendation. But here we propose to adjourn to no fixed place. We are to adjourn to some place hereafter to be designated by the committee. I object to thus placing the Convention in the power of any committee. I am willing to support any proposition to refer it to the committee to ascertain a place, and then, on hearing their report, I shall be prepared to vote on whatever proposition they shall submit.

The question was put on excusing Mr. Cooke from voting, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COOKE thereupon voted no.

The name of Mr. Stratton was called.

Mr. STRATTON—I ask to be excused from voting, and ask to give a reason. I do not like to vote for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris] in its present shape. If there had been an opportunity for amending it, it probably could have been made by a slight amendment, so that I would have been satisfied to have voted for it. I am not opposed to the Convention going to New York, but I am opposed to leaving it to three members of this Convention to determine the future of the Convention. If that committee should not provide any place for the meeting of the Convention, clothed with the power they are, the Convention would have no place of meeting after the 1st of January. It is left entirely to this committee. I propose that this resolution should be amended to read thus:

Resolved, That a committee of —— be appointed to ascertain and report to this body what accommodation can be provided in the city of New York for the session of the Convention after the first day of January next.

That will leave it to this Convention to determine their place of meeting and not give the power to this committee. I ask to be excused.

The question was put on excusing Mr. Stratton from voting, and it was declared lost.

Mr. STRATTON thereupon voted no.

The SECRETARY completed the call of the roll, and the amendment offered by Mr. Morris was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Ballard, Barnard, Barto, Beadle, Bergen, E. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Burrill, Church, Clarke, Cochran, Comstock, Daly, Develin, Endress, Evarts, Flagler, Garvin, Gross, Hardenburgh, Jarvis, Ketcham, Larremore, A. Lawrence, A. R. Townsend, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—66.

The PRESIDENT—The question now recurs upon the original resolution of the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt], upon which the previous question has been ordered, and consequently neither debate nor amendment is in order.

Mr. SILVESTER demanded the ayes and noes.

Mr. E. BROOKS—As a point of order, will the Chair entertain a motion to lay upon the table?

Digitized by Google

The PRESIDENT—The Chair cannot entertain the motion,

Mr. COOKE—I would like to know, if this resolution were to be adopted, whether it would cut off a motion to reconsider the vote on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] the other day

The PRESIDENT—It does not.

Mr. VEEDER—I desire, if it is in order, to move the reconsideration of the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

The PRESIDENT—That motion will be received, and will lie upon the table under the rule. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. VEEDER—I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the rule provides for the case where the reconsideration is moved on the same day. The previous question was ordered yesterday, and I now desire to move the reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair cannot entertain that motion. The ayes and noes have been ordered upon this proposition.

The SECRETARY proceeded with the call of the roll on the resolution of Mr. Merritt.

The name of Mr. Curtis was called.

Mr. CURTIS—I would like to ask whether this resolution binds the Convention to sit in Albany?

The PRESIDENT—The resolution will be read by the Secretary and the gentleman will put his own construction upon it.

The resolution was accordingly read.

Mr. CURTIS voted aye.

The name of Mr. Francis was called.

Mr. FRANCIS—I ask to be excused from voting upon this question. In my opinion the resolution ought to include inquiries respecting other places, as Troy, etc.

The question was put upon excusing Mr. Francis from voting, and it was declared lost.

Mr. FRANCIS voted no.

The SECRETARY proceeded with the call of the roll, and the resolution of Mr. Merritt was declared carried, by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Armstrong, Axtell, Baker, Barker, Beckwith, Bell, Bickford, Carpenter, Case, Cassidy, Cheritree, Corbett, Corning, Curtis, Duganne, C. C. Mr. STRATTON—I offer the following re lution:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appoin to ascertain and report to this body what acco modations can be provided in the city of N York for the sessions of the Convention after t first of January next.

The PRESIDENT—This resolution will be ceived if there is no objection.

Mr. ALVORD—I object.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, t resolution will lie upon the table.

Mr. DUGANNE—I offer the following res lution:

Resolved, That two additional members be a pointed upon the committee just raised, and th said committee be instructed to extend its i quiries to the city of New York, and commun cate with the board of supervisors of that ci thereon, and report on the 18th inst.

The PRESIDENT—If there is no objection th resolution will be received.

Mr. ALVORD—I object.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, th resolution will be laid on the table.

Mr. VEEDER—Is an amendment to that reso lution in order?

The PRESIDENT—It is now too late to offe an amendment The resolution lies on th table.

Mr. CHURCH—I offer the following:

Resolved, That this Convention will proceed t perfect the article upon the judiciary, and provid for submitting the same to the people, and tha the Convention will then adjourn, subject to be re-assembled by the Legislature, for the purpos of completing its business. Such adjournmen will take place on the twentieth day of Decembe instant at twelve o'clock, unless the article on the judiciary shall sooner be perfected.

Mr. ALVORD—I object to the repetition of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made the resolution will be laid upon the table.

Mr. COOKE—I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote rejecting the amendment of the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] to the resolution just passed.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] may be read.

Mr. GOULD—Mr. President, the resolution, I think, was not rejected, but laid upon the table.

Mr. MERRITT—My recollection is that no motion to reconsider the vote on the proposition of the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] was made.

The PRESIDENT—A motion for that purpose is now made.

Mr. COOKE—I supposed that a motion to reconsider was made and laid on the table, but it may have been that the amendment itself was laid on the table.

Mr. MERRITT—If I understood the motion of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] it was to reconsider—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will give until the fact in regard to the motion that made can be ascertained by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY read from the Journal as follows:

Mr. Fuller moved to reconsider the vote. Mr. moved to amend by inserting after the 'Albany' the words 'or the mayors of other which was decided in the negative—ayes noes 43."

The PRESIDENT—The Chair must rule that having been originally an amendment to the tion of the gentleman from St. Lawrence Merritt], which has been adopted under the tion of the previous question, it is not now der as an amendment, and can only be reached reconsidering the vote by which the resolution the gentleman from St. Lawrence was adopted morning.

Mr. DEVELIN—I move a reconsideration of vote by which the motion was adopted.

The PRESIDENT—That motion will be received, and under the rule will be laid on the table.

Mr. DEVELIN—I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. Stratton] when he proposes to up his resolution in regard to seeking accommodations for the Convention in the city of New York.

Mr. STRATTON—To-morrow morning.

Mr. VEEDER—I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the motion of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Morris] was lost.

The PRESIDENT—That motion will also be received, and under the rule laid on the table.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Mr. President—

Mr. SILVESTER—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—The exigency for which I arose has now passed, sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. SILVESTER—I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the President to ascertain where a suitable hall and accommodations can be procured for the session of this Convention when it shall become necessary to vacate the Assembly Chamber, and that said committee report to the Convention on the 17th of December, instant.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. ALVORD—It is, that we have by a vote this morning determined that a committee for the purpose contemplated in this resolution shall be appointed, and that, until that resolution shall be rescinded, no other resolution for the appointment of another committee for the same purpose is in order.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that the point of order is not well taken. The proposition may be made to the Convention, and it will lie on the table for its future consideration.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to debate the resolution.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman rising to debate the proposition, it lies on the table under the rule.

Mr. VEEDER—I rise a point of order, that this, being a resolution relating to expenditures, should go to a certain committee.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair does not understand the resolution to be of that character.

Mr. VEEDER—The resolution does not say "without expense to the Convention"; consequently it is liable to give rise to expenditure, and therefore should go to a certain committee.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that the point of order is not well taken.

The Convention again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, on the report of the standing Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, of Cayuga, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the amendment proposed by Mr. Prindle to section 6 of the article reported by the committee.

Mr. PRINDLE—I offer the following as a modification of the proposition made by me:

The SECRETARY read the substitute, as follows:

There shall be a supreme court, having general jurisdiction in law and equity, subject to such appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeals as may be prescribed by law. There shall be in each judicial district, except the first, three justices of the said court, and in the first district there shall be five, any one of whom may hold special terms of said court and circuit court, and preside in the courts of oyer and terminer in any county. Said justices shall possess all the jurisdiction of the said supreme court not possessed by the said judges.

The CHAIRMAN—This substitute will be received in the place of the proposition previously offered by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle].

Mr. COOKE—I do not design, Mr. Chairman, to repeat or to attempt to elaborate the arguments that have been submitted upon the pending question, but I desire to refer to a few facts and a few considerations that I have not heard presented to the Convention. The question now pending does not necessarily involve the merits or demerits of the plan submitted by the majority report. The present question is between the substitute just read and the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], which is substantially the plan of the existing supreme court. When the proposition of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] shall have been either adopted or rejected, then it will become necessary for us to determine between the report of the majority of the committee and the plan preferred by this committee on the vote now to be taken. I have but a few simple rules to govern my action in determining upon the plan of a supreme court which will please me. I listened with a good deal of interest and instruction to the very able remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] and the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews], in regard to the great object in the organization of this court; and while I do not entirely concur in the result at which the gentleman from Onondaga arrived, I can indorse almost his entire argument. It is necessary for us to have a supreme court for the State of New York as little sectionalized as possible. This committee has already indicated its views in regard to a divided court. Commencing with the court of appeals, we have adopted a system whose main feature is unity, and although my idea was that we had sacrificed other important objects for the sake of unity, yet it is undoubtedly the voice of this Convention that these courts, so far as possible, shall be a unit and shall afford the smallest possible opportunity for conflicting decisions. My preference is for the system that gives the least subdivision of this court, the only court of general jurisdiction to be provided for the State. That system, in my judgment, is the best which is universal, which takes in the whole State, or as large sections of the State as possible, and deals as little as may be in subdivisions in accomplishing the great object aimed at. On this principle I preferred the minority report, with its three departments, to that submitted by the majority with four departments; on the same principle I prefer the substitute offered by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] to the present system repeated in the substitute of the gentleman from Steuben. It seems to me that the difference is very marked. The system now under consideration, and on which the question is now pending, confers upon the court general authority over the whole State, it provides for but a single court, and although consisting of twelve judges, each one of those judges is responsible for the conduct of the court throughout the State. My objection to the existing system is, that it substantially divides the State and the court into eight distinct parts, each part considering itself responsible only in respect to the business of that particular district. It is a well known fact, and one which need not be told to lawyers, that, as the court is now constituted, the judges in the sixth district, if you please, feel no interest in the court of the eighth district; they care nothing and feel no responsibility for the decisions there, and they confine their labors as well as their responsibility to that district alone for which and in which they were chosen; so that, in fact, we have eight separate courts, and the decisions in one district are of no sort of authority in another. Now, if it is necessary to have a court so subdivided, why, we must submit to it; but, so long as it is not necessary, it is a great mistake, in my judgment, so to subdivide the supreme court. I, therefore, consider the plan submitted by the majority of the committee far preferable to the existing system, because it, to the extent of one-half, corrects the evil of an unnecessarily subdivided court. The plan submitted by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] gives us a single court. He provides twelve judges to sit in banc and do the general term business, and act as an appellate court. He then provides a number of judges or justices to perform circuit and special term duties. I am not entirely satisfied with this system because it fails to reach one evil in our present judicial system, which, I think, is a very considerable one, and which I will presently state. I believe in having a single court of appellate jurisdiction. I believe in making every judge in this State as much responsible in one section of the State as in another, so that the judges will come to consider the whole supreme court of the State as the tribunal of which they form a part and for which they are responsible. I believe that then their decision will tend more to uniformity, and will be received as authority everywhere. Then, when we come down to the circuit system, my judgment is that every judge ought to have his own circuit and circuit calendar and that a great evil will be remedied if we have single districts in which each of the nisi prius judges shall exercise his function. At the same time, I desire to offer a further modification of the plan proposed, to read as follows: There shall be a supreme court, to consist of not less than nine justices, three of whom may hold a general term. Inasmuch as this Convention has deliberately decided that it is unwise to allow a judge to sit in review of his own decisions, I propose to secure that principle by erecting an impassable barrier between the circuit and special term and the general term duties, for when we have arrived at this point and so far turned back upon and reversed the policy of the Convention of 1846, as to have decided that it is not admissible for a judge to sit in review of his own decisions, I think we have taken a long step toward returning to the old circuit system; and in returning to that system, I propose to do it in terms. I never knew that there was so much prejudice against our old circuit courts that we need fear to commend this system calling it by its right name in remodeling and reorganizing the supreme court. I was surprised to hear from the Convention of 1846 that the system of circuit courts, with their judges perambulating the State and holding circuits, was liable to any serious objection. I was surprised to hear that that system has resulted in failure. I confess I never have been able to appreciate the reasons upon which the Convention of 1846 repudiated that system, and struck out on this new and untried path which has proved a labyrinth of confusion and disorder. It was urged in that Convention, it has been urged by the Legislature since that time, and it is still urged by many, that it was a great objection that judges should be permitted to sit in review of their own decisions; but I believe it is not yet entirely settled in the minds of practitioners whether it is wise or not to exclude judges absolutely from seats in the court that is to review their own decisions, rendered in the court below. This Convention, however, has expressed itself so emphatically in favor of such exclusion that I shall assume that to be the policy that is to govern the Convention throughout, and so assuming I think there is a better way to provide for it than that contained in the section reported by the committee and adopted by this Convention in terms—that "no judge, either of the court of appeals or of the supreme court, shall sit in general term, in review of his own decisions." I think it would be better to accomplish this object in the way I propose, by so constituting the courts as that they cannot commingle than to make it the subject of a distinct provision. An objection to this scheme is that the judges want the education that they get at the circuit in order to hold general terms—that the ns the practice is at the circuits. Sir, I do s very highly appreciate the reasons that are n or Judge Jewett was particularly at a loss to ow what an exception at the circuit meant, hen is was brought up to the general term. I ver supposed it was necessary for a judge to me up from the circuit and take his place on e general term bench in order to appreciate the guments that were addressed to him, growing t of some decision made at the circuit on the ection or admission of evidence. Why, sir, e are in no particular danger of getting men on e supreme court bench who are ignorant of the ractice. A member of the bar who has been in ractice at the circuits for ten, fifteen, twenty, r twenty-five years, and is then placed upon the ench of the general term, can hardly be quired to go to another school and serve circuit judge in order to learn the circuit pracce, to qualify him for the appellate bench.

hat can he learn on the bench more than he as already learned at the bar? It seems to me at he will get at the bar all the practical in-rmation that is necessary for a judge to have in rder to give a law opinion upon an exception at is brought up in that court. But it seems to e supposed that it is necessary for a circuit judge visit the general term about once in three onths to find out what the law is in order that e may administer it at the circuit, and since we ave had this question up, directly and indirectly, ome gentlemen have seemed to believe that a ircuit judge had no other means of learning what e general term pronounced to be law than by eing a member of that bench. Sir, is there any ing in that argument? Is that sort of educaon really necessary for a judge? A circuit dge is supposed to be learned in the law, and e is supposed to be familiar with the later as ell as the earlier decisions. Perhaps the genel term in his district may have got some crotchet some notion of doubtful propriety in the way of ractice, or otherwise, that he would be ignorant f if he was not a member of that court; but it eems to me so much better to have these courts eparate and independent, to have the circuit dge try the cause upon his views of the law, nd then, when it goes to the general term, let a ew and fresh court take up the question and eview it, and determine whether the decision of he court below is obnoxious to any settled priniple of law, as they understand it. Under the ormer system, sir, did we meet any of these difculties? Then we had Judges Denio, Gridley, arker, Ruggles and others of equal eminence. Did e ever dream that they were defective in that ducation which is to be acquired alone at the genel term, or did we ever feel that our system was efective because under it ignorant circuit judges ere imposed upon us? It seems to me, sir, from he short experience that I had under that sys-em, that it was the most complete and perfect judicial system, as far as the supreme court was concerned, that could be devised. I object to the notion that it is necessary for a circuit judge to go to school to a general term every three months. I insist that it has no advantages whatever in the way of instructing him, or enabling him to discharge his duties as a circuit judge. But it is objected by the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker], that the plan of dividing the court into only three parts is inadequate, that the business cannot be performed, that the plan does not give judges enough nor general terms enough, and he says that the calendar will increase in spite of all the efforts of the judges, and we will finally have the supreme court as much overburdened with business as the court of appeals now is. He supposes, therefore, that it is necessary to have eight, or at least four departments and four standing general terms. Now, sir, in the proposition which I have submitted to this Convention, I propose to have judges enough elected in the first instance to hold three general terms, nine judges; and I think that will be force enough to do all the business that is now to be done in the supreme court, or that is likely to come there. In the city of New York the number may be inadequate but then they have their local courts upon which the Legislature may confer just such jurisdiction as they think expedient, and so the business then can be kept under control. I undertake to say that outside of the city of New York two departments, or two branches of the court, can do all the business in banc that is now in the court, and they can do as much labor as the whole eight courts do now in general term. At an early period of this Convention I introduced a resolution which was adopted calling upon the county clerks to inform this Convention how many days of actual session had been held by the general terms of the supreme court in their respective counties. I never saw a response to that resolution. But we know that there are now outside of the city of New York seven districts. Each one of these districts holds general terms. I am informed by a judge of the second district that in that district their general term does not average over a week in duration, and never extends beyond nine days. In the third district the general term never holds over a week, and generally less, and adjourns for want of business; and as to the general term in the fourth district, I understand that it is only occupied four or five days, and so it is in the fifth, sixth, and seventh districts, and in the eighth they sit for less than two weeks. The average duration of these general terms, outside of the first district, is not more than one week each, and they are held in every district four times a year, so that we have in the seven districts twenty-eight weeks' service at general term annually, which suffices for all the business taken to that tribunal. Now give us two sets of judges and they can be ordered to rotate and exchange so that no one bench shall ever deem itself chargeable or responsible for any one section of the State more than another. Give us two general terms, having at their disposal in the aggregate one hundred and four weeks in a year; relieve them from all other labor and responsibility, and you have these judges devoted entirely to the business of the supreme court, and all the time they have to hold court is twenty-eight weeks, or fourteen weeks for each bench. This will give them ample vacations to enable them to decide their cases and write up their opinions, and it will also give them a considerable amount of leisure. So I propose that we shall organize a court with not less than nine judges, and leave with the Legislature power to increase the number and to create an additional general term in case experience shows it to be necessary. Each bench can hold a term once every two months if necessary, and the Legislature can provide for the convenience of the court and the bar. It can require that they shall hold general terms in various places throughout the State, or else it can confer upon the presiding justice, to be provided for by the Legislature, the right to designate not only the justices who are to hold the several general terms, and also to designate the places where these general terms shall be held, and all the business that will devolve on each bench, according to the present condition of litigation, will simply be fourteen weeks general term service annually. Now, I claim for this scheme, sir, that it removes the objections that exist against a court composed of sections. The idea of organizing eight courts which confine themselves to their respective districts, and of calling them the supreme court, is a most confusing one—a contradiction of terms. Instead of one supreme court in the State, we now have eight courts which we are at liberty to call supreme courts if we deem it worth while to give them any name at all. I do claim that it is wiser for us to adopt this plan, which gives the court all the capacity that seems to be required, and brings this important tribunal back to the condition it was in when it had the respect of the world, and when its decisions were authority everywhere. It will do more toward reducing the number of conflicting decisions, toward harmonizing the system, and giving power and efficiency to the court, than any plan, it seems to me, that has yet been presented. This feature of the plan we find in the substitute submitted by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. I would suggest, however, that we had better leave it to the Legislature to fix the number of judges, placing the minimum at nine, because economy in the organization of this court is an important item under the present condition of things, and I believe that a far less number of judges than we now employ will be able to do all the business that devolves upon the court, provided the business and the powers of the court be properly distributed. We all know how much time is lost, and how often the business of the several courts is interrupted as when the judge is compelled to leave his circuit to hold a general term; whereas, if we had judges devoted specially to that business, they could apply themselves exclusively to it, and understand their business and do it to much better advantage and with much greater satisfaction than they can now when shifting from one class of duties to another. Then I propose to divide the State into a convenient number of circuits, "not less than fourteen, in each of which there shall be a circuit judge, who shall possess the powers of a justice of the supreme court, in the trial of issues of fact and of law, the hearing and decision of motions and in criminal cases, and at chambers; provided that no county shall be divided in the formation of circuits." Provision may be made by law for one or more additional circuit judges in the city and county of New York; and the power to increase may be extended to any other county which, by its rapid growth or increase, seems to promise more business than can be performed by one circuit judge. Provide a circuit judge for every double Senate district and you have all the force that is required in order to transact all the chamber, special term and circuit business. The city of New York, of course, and other cities that may contain more than two Senate districts, to have additional circuit court judges granted them by the Legislature. These judges are to have all the powers of supreme court justices at chambers and at special terms, and at circuits. They can do every thing except sit in general term; and although I would not take away the power of justices elected for the State at large, to hold circuits or special terms if they choose, I would leave that as we had it under the system of 1822—we would not apprehend any serious inconvenience from that arrangement, we should not expect one of them to come down to hold a circuit or special term, unless there was some great occasion for it, and there would be nothing to interfere with the principle of excluding a judge from sitting in review of his own decisions. I claim, sir, that this is preferable to the alternating system of judges traveling through the districts and holding circuits, one after another. Probably every lawyer who has been in practice during the last twenty years has seen inconveniences arising from this plan. One of the inconveniences is this. A judge comes down and holds a circuit. A party swears off his case, criminal or civil. He presents the usual affidavit and the case goes over. At the next circuit another judge comes upon the bench, another affidavit is presented, which makes out a case for postponement, and so the case is postponed. The judge may say this time that the case has been postponed once before, and that this must be the last application; that at the next circuit the cause must be tried. But at the next circuit another judge comes and the counsel again tell their story and present their affidavits, which again make out a case for postponement; and after a little wrangle between the counsel, the judge says it seems upon the papers that the case ought to go over, but the party must positively prepare to try at the next term. And so it goes on from time to time. This is the practical experience of many a lawyer in this Convention. Now in such an instance the party may make out a good case for postponement once, but it does not follow that the case will be postponed a second, a third or a fourth time on a like affidavit. Another thing is within the experience of every lawyer, and it is a thing which scandalizes the court, and causes unpleasant feeling to every one that is connected with it. A party comes to consult his counsel about preparing his case for trial at the next circuit. He says to his lawyer, "Well, I can be ready; but, let us see, is it best to be ready? What judge is going to be here? Judge Brown? Well, I think I had better swear the case off. He is not a man of my politics; he is too friendly with my adversary. The last time he was here he dined with the counsel on the other side; he is a particular friend of his. I think, therefore, we had better get up a case for postponement." Then the question comes up, "Who is to be here next?" "Well, Judge Jones." "He is the man," says the client. "He is a friend of mine. We will put the case over now, and bring it before Judge Jones." So that is concluded upon, and perhaps when Judge Jones comes to hold his circuit there, the other party postpones the case for similar reasons. This, although it imputes nothing improper to the judge, and is without a shadow of reason, has the effect to bring the court into contempt, and discredit, and yet it is a thing which occurs at almost every circuit. Now, it was not so under the old system. When the circuit came around, we knew what judge we were to have. He was our circuit judge. His business was to hold that circuit, and we knew that he would be there, and that if we did not try our cause before him at one circuit, he would preside at the next, and so there was none of this postponing of cases for the sake of getting them tried before a friendly judge and I never heard, under the old system, of the judge being too familiar or intimate with the counsel on either side, nor did I ever hear the objection of politics raised by lawyers or clients with reference to any judge or with reference to the policy of trying their causes before him. Again, a judge chosen in this way is responsible for the calendar of that particular court. He knows what cases are to be tried, and that if he does not try them at one term he will have to try them at another; and so we avoid this shuffling off business merely to get rid of it for the time, and leaving what is undone for the judge who is to come after him. For these reasons I prefer to have single circuit districts; make the judge responsible for the trial of all causes in that district; allow him to exchange with other judges, of course, at his pleasure, but leave the counsel and every body to understand that the court is to be held by the circuit judge of that circuit, to calculate upon that and make their arrangements accordingly. Now, there is a single thing in the report of the majority of the committee to which I wish to call attention. This proposition will erect a barrier between the two courts, the trial court and the court of review, which is very desirable if this Convention is right in its prejudice against allowing the judge to sit in review of his own decisions. The report of the majority of the committee hardly does that. Not only that, but it does not allow the Legislature to do it. Section 8 provides for a law designating, from time to time, the justices who shall hold general terms, and also for the designation of a chief justice of each general term, and that four of such judges shall be designated for the general term, three of whom shall form a quorum. The Legislature can designate those justices. Suppose this is all arranged just as the committee contemplate, and then here is a provision that any one of such judges may hold a special term or circuit court, and any one of them may preside in courts of oyer and terminer in any county. The Legislature have it not in their power to prevent judges sitting in the same court at a general term, which is to review the decision they have made at circuit. I think the principle that the Convention have adopted is entirely violated by this provision. Four justices hold a general term, and three shall constitute a quorum. These four justices have been holding circuits within their district. Any one of them may hold a circuit. The court may get together and assign circuits to the several justices, and the Legislature cannot prevent it because they are tied up by this provision. Any one or more of such justices may hold a special term or circuit in any county in the State. It is out of the power of the Legislature to say they shall not hold a special term in their districts. Now, these four judges who are holding the general term may distribute the circuit business among their number. Suppose they get all four of them in a general term, and the first case is called. One of the judges who was on the bench says: "That case I tried in the court below; I will go down and sit in the bar." He goes down and remains off the bench until that case is argued. Then the next case is called and another judge says; that case I tried at circuit. And he will call his brother back to the bench, and in turn he retires. And so it will go around, they will sit and hear arguments for a week or two, and then all retire and go into the consultation room. Does any gentleman here suppose that it is possible to have a consultation and a deliberation upon that list of cases between all four of the justices without each one exerting more or less influence in the deliberation upon the case which came originally before him in the court below? I do not pretend to know any of the secrets of these deliberations; but I do not understand how it can be otherwise, how judges can avoid saying to their brethren, with whom they are on most intimate terms, "how did you come to make such a decision." The judge of whom the question is asked goes on to explain it, he makes an argument without intending it. He does not mean any harm; he thinks it is law, and will undertake to impress his views upon the other judges. If this is to be so, if these gentlemen are allowed to be present while their decisions are under review, I would rather, ten times over, each one of them would be on the bench when the argument was had, so that the argument might be addressed to him. When he is on the bench he is under a responsibility to hear what is said and to consider the argument. But when he is off the bench and presumed not to listen to the argument, and subsequently goes into the consultation room, it is with precisely the views he had when he came off the bench where the cause was originally decided by him. He has had the benefit of no argument, whereas, if he had been on the bench he might be affected by any new light that could be thrown upon the question. I think, while we are about it, if we are to exclude a man from the bench and from sitting to hear an argument because he has decided the case below, we ought also to exclude him from the court that is to decide upon the case. This is all I designed to say, all I care to say upon this question. For these reasons I am in favor of returning to the circuit system and leave it in the power of the Legislature to increase either branch of the court, either the general term or circuit, to any number that will meet the demands of business, rather than tie up the Legislature. Not to cast the judiciary in an iron mold, but leave it flexible, leave it in the power of the Legislature to carry the court home into every county, in turn, if you please. Leave it in the power of the Legislature to declare general terms shall be held in Albany, Poughkeepsie, Utica, Binghamton, Rochester, or any other places in the State; carry them around, pay the judges for their time, trouble and expense, so they can afford to discharge their whole duty to the State; then we shall have a court that will render uniform decisions, a court that can commend the respect of other States. But if you persist in cutting up the court into sections, although we may call it a supreme court of the State it is really three or four or eight supreme courts so-called. Now, I propose to vote for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], in preference to the present system. I think it is better because it has universality. It is comprehensive. It takes in the whole State. Every judge is as much responsible in one section of the State as in another for the transaction of business. I prefer it on that account, and I prefer it also because it divides the two branches of the court, the appellate from the trial court, and leaves each one to the proper discharge of its own functions. When this matter shall be disposed of, and we get farther along with the subject, I desire to test the sense of the Convention with respect to the court as I propose it. I claim for my plan that it is entirely simple, and I like that court best which is the most simple. I like a court that is not loaded down with machinery. I propose simply to furnish the judges for a general term, and the judges to hold the circuits and leave the Legislature to work out the problem with improvements from time to time, as will best promote the interests of the State.

Mr. PIERREPONT — As a member of the Judiciary Committee, I wish an opportunity to say a few words in defense of their report. In the earlier sittings of the committee I had not the honor to be present; unfortunately I was compelled to be absent. In the later sittings of the committee I was present at every one. It is well known to this Convention that the committee is composed of fifteen lawyers, selected from every part of the State. Each man is a man of experience, and certainly many of the committee are men of eminence. They are of different political parties. I am sure I do not err when I say that no member of that committee ever could have discovered, from any thing which occurred in the committee room, to which political party any member of that committee belonged. All have been earnestly engaged for a period of full three months attempting to frame such a plan for the admin tration of justice in this State as would, on t whole, be best. I know very well that membe of this committee consulted lawyers outside; tn consulted judges, they consulted laymen, th consulted the members of this Convention, th consulted the history of the jurisprudence of o own country in other States, and of other cou tries abroad; and when it appears that fifte lawyers, after a deliberation of more than thr months, all concluded (with one exception) sign the report, it is reasonable for this Conve tion to conclude that it was a work of labor, th it was a work of intelligence, and that it was work of honest zeal to promote the administr tion of justice in the State. It should recei reasonable consideration on the part of this Co vention. The very question which the gentlem from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] has just discussed b fore this committee we all considered; it w with great care deliberated upon, and final we were obliged to come to the conclusion which we have arrived, and we made the repo which is now before us. That report is the resu of our best deliberation. Now, we have had this Convention an historical speech on the su ject of the judiciary, learned, able and eloquen History in relation to this great question is c immense value. But I undertake to say to th members of this Convention that every man wi find written in his own heart just such histor as is written in the books which have been cite The principles of human nature are permanen and enduring forces, and the same principle which formerly actuated men and made the histor which has here been cited, now act upon ever human being. The principles of human natu were the same in the days of Solomon and in th days of Shakespeare, and they are the same i our own day. And we can learn by consul ing our own experience, and by observing ou own fellow men, what kind of things a judge wi do and what he will fail to do under given ci cumstances. When we remember that he is man, we should remember that the appointmen by the Governor or the appointment by th King, or an election by the people does no change his nature one iota. He is no wiser th next day after an election, he is no purer the nex day after an election than he was the day befor He is the same human being, subject to like pa sions as ourselves, and he will as surely be in fluenced by them after elections as before. An a wise legislator will consider that fact, and wise statesman will frame his system of laws t meet the affairs of men as they actually exist, an not as he may hope or wish they were. Th experience of the world has proved that etern vigilance is the price of liberty; and it ha equally proved that no government can lon maintain its freedom without the independenc of the judiciary. That must be secured in som way, or liberty will soon depart. History and e perience prove that it is much easier to lose lil erty than it is to regain freedom. The executiv branch of every government, being more activ and more energetic, always has a tendency to en croach upon the slower functions of the judiciary and in troubled times the power of the judiciary is, in a great measure suspended, and in actual war the laws are entirely suspended and inter arma silent leges has passed into a maxim. In our own time we have seen the authority of the judges in a measure suspended. We have seen within five years over almost this entire country, that but feeble power remained in the judiciary. And we have seen under our present system that useful authority of the judges is much less than it was when they were more independent, and that many of them are all their judicial life, through fear, held in bondage. Fear of what? Fear that they will not be re-elected; fear that they will give some offense. And somehow or other we desire to have such a system as will relieve the judiciary of that fear, and that bondage, and place them in reasonable independence. All admit the evils of the present system; all admit that somehow or other it does not work well. We are not satisfied with it. To reform the judiciary, it was supposed, was one of the chief objects of this Convention. Dissatisfaction with the present judicial system is very general. And the learned gentleman who has just taken his seat has spoken with approval of the manner in which judges conducted their circuits, and their business under the old system. He says, under that system he never heard it said that Mr. A, the counsel on one side of a case had been dining with the judge; that he never heard it said that it was necessary to make an affidavit, more or less false, in order to get a case put over, through fear of the influence of Mr. B on the judicial mind. Of course he did not. And why has he heard it now? If these evils have crept into our system, is it from any other cause than that influence which grows out of the re-election of judges? Can he assign any other possible reason than that?

Mr. COOKE—I impute nothing to the judge. The reason I assign is that the parties themselves are hoping constantly for a judge more agreeable to them.

Mr. PIERREPONT—But somehow or other an influence is produced upon the judge. How happens it that they hope to produce that influence? How can they hope to produce that influence if their experience and their knowledge of human nature has not told them that it can be produced? My learned friend may be sure he will not discover wise and intelligent lawyers, from day to day and from term to term, attempting to bring about results which he knows cannot be produced.

Mr. COOKE—If the gentleman paid attention to what I was saying, and if I spoke what were in my thoughts, I was speaking of the objections that clients make to their counsel; I said nothing about lawyers entertaining these hopes.

Mr. PIERREPONT—Well, it is not the lawyer, then: but some way it is the clients. How does it chance that clients get it into their heads that such influences are to be produced, and that they apply to their lawyers and tell them to exercise this influence? How does that come about? Now it is the client. He has got it into his mind that inasmuch as he can vote and revote and use his influence, and depose from place and power a judge, that by that power he will bring about the result he desires. It is the client, not the lawyer. But it strikes me that the client must produce some influence on the mind of the lawyer, or else the lawyer would not read the affidavit. The lawyer would say to his client: "My friend, you are wholly wrong in this idea about the influence on the judge; there is nothing in it, and I will not place myself in a situation where such an imputation can be thrown upon me, that I could imagine the judge could be influenced by these motives which you suggest." The gentleman has alluded to the determination of this Convention to exclude judges from sitting in review of their own decisions. And he wishes to make it even more severe than the report of the committee has made it, more perfect in its exclusion. He says he understands it to be the sense of this Convention, that they will, by every means, prevent the judge from sitting in review of his own decision. Now, I believe that he is entirely correct. I believe that is the sense of this Convention. I believe it to be the sentiment of every lawyer, that it is best and right the judge should be excluded from sitting in review of his own decision. There are, in this Convention, many gentlemen who are now judges, several who have been judges, and I think there is not one of them who is not opposed to allowing a judge to sit in review of his own decision. In this they accord with the sentiments of the community. Now, let us ask, why is it that we all, with such unanimity, agree that the judge should not sit in review of his own decision? Is it not simply because from our knowledge of human nature we believe that he will have a bias in favor of his former opinion, and, as a general rule, an inclination to sustain that judgment which he has deliberately formed in the court below, and therefore from his natural desire to sustain himself, and from that natural pride of opinion which belongs to all men, and which belongs to great men as well as to small ones, we think it wise that he should not be placed in that situation. I know very well, from some little experience at general term, that when a judge finds his own opinion under review, he is often one of the most sensitive of men, and that he seems to feel more sensitiveness in having his deliberate opinion overruled by two associate judges than would be supposed by those who have never had the opportunity to observe it. My experience is in favor of the exact judgment which this Convention has come to upon this subject. We want, as we all admit, an independent judiciary. Well, I think I hear some demagogue say, "would you have a judiciary independent of the people?" I say to you, Mr. Chairman, if I were in England I would have the judge independent of any caprice of the sovereign king, and in America I would have a judge independent of any temporary passion of the sovereign people. I would have him independent of every thing but a sense of justice, of an enlightened conscience, of a wise judgment and a deep sense of duty toward God and his fellow man. I would not have him independent of public opinion. No just man, no honest man, will ever claim to be independent of public opinion. It is a widely different thing to speak of public opinion, and the temporary whim of a passionate public, or the temporary caprice of a fitful sovereign. Widely different public opinion operates in England as well as in this country. Public opinion operates in every free government with immense power, and it will act upon every judge, however independent the tenure of the office in which you place him. Only a bad man will defy a well formed public sentiment. The opinion which the public settles down upon as its sober judgment is generally right. The Greek philosophers held that whatever the great people had on the whole settled upon as right was right. Hesoid adopted the maxim, and afterward the idea was clothed in the Latin words, "Vox populi vox Dei," meaning that whatever had become fixed and settled in the public mind as wrong (like murder, theft or robbery) was wrong, and that whatever the great public had, with one voice, settled upon as right (like justice, truth, fair dealing, etc.) was right, and that such universal sentiment had its origin in the Divinity and was the voice of God. Now, it seems to me that the only way to get at an object is to find out what object we want, and next find out how to get it? Now, what do we want? We want a man for judge who is in every way a proper man to fill that office. Now, whom, I ask, Mr. Chairman and every member of this Convention, do you want for judge of the supreme court? You want an honest man; you want a lawyer, well grounded in legal principles, experienced in the affairs of life, a man with a clear intellect and wise judgment, a man who is a courteous gentleman, of a sound mind in a sound body, in the early prime of middle life. Such a man, we all agree, we would like to select to be a judge of the supreme court. We are all agreed about that. Next, how shall we get him into that place? Is there any mystery about it? What is the difficulty? What is the puzzle? Cannot the great State of New York secure the services of such a lawyer as I have described? Do you think the New York Central Railroad would have any difficulty in securing as counsel the services of such a man? Do you think any rich merchant would have difficulty in securing the services of such a man? Cannot the great State of New York secure the services as supreme judge of the same man whose services as counsel the Central railroad or the thrifty merchant could secure? Why cannot the State get exactly such a man for the place of the supreme judge? Let us see the man. We have agreed upon him, and he is brought into this room, and you, Mr. Chairman, say to this gentleman: "You are the man selected by this Convention as a fit man to be judge of the supreme court. We want you to take the office." That is very well. He feels complimented by it; he is a courteous gentleman, and he asks you what is the inducement which you propose to make him become a judge of the supreme court? He says: "I am now forty years old; I have had a thorny road. In my early youth I had to get my education as best I could." If he is worth any thing, he has obtained his value through toil. I do not know the history of the members of this Convention, but one thing I do know, that there is not a member who is worthy to be a member, who was dandled on rosy beds up to this Convention. He has gone through trials. If his right arm is strong, it is because he has lifted weights. If his moral nature is lofty, it is because he has lifted moral burdens. And now the man stands in this room before you and tells you that through a road beset with difficulties, he has prepared himself for future success in life. He has his wife and children to support; he sees before him a career from forty to seventy—thirty years, where he has a right to hope he may reap a rich reward for his patient toil, for his integrity and for his high moral character, which he has preserved untarnished. Has he not such a right? What do you propose to him? To divert him from that career which he has laid out for himself and that he give his services to the State. This is the proposition: "We propose to give you a salary of five thousand dollars a year; we propose to elect you for a term of fourteen years; and however able and just you may be, and however you may prove that our judgment in your selection was wise, we propose that by no possibility shall you ever be allowed to hold that seat again. You shall go from forty to fifty-four, and when you reach fifty-four and shall have broken yourself off from all connection with the world of business and fitted yourself to be a judge, by a constitutional provision we propose that you shall never serve the State again in the office which you honorably fill." I fancy I see the courteous gentleman bow and retire. I think he would not wish your votes on those conditions. Well, what are the conditions upon which you can get such a man to serve the State? It is a great mistake to suppose that a judge requires the full measure of a large professional income. It is by no means necessary. But as he is a human being, as he labors for some kind of reward, he does not propose to labor for the State from the age of forty to the age of fifty-four and thus to leave his wife a household drudge and his children beggars, for the empty honor of these few years, after which the State says, "we cast you off; you shall never serve us more." The State can always secure the services of such men and at a reasonable cost so far as money is concerned. But honor must mingle with the money and make up the fair reward; that honor which comes with the permanency of office. You cannot ask a man to break off the career for which he has been all his early life in preparation without any reward. You do not propose a pension, nor to re-elect him at the end of his term, and thus you say "if you have served the State fourteen years as a judge you never can be fit to serve it again." There is neither justice, reason, or wisdom in this, and it will not strike the people as just or wise. It will not strike the people as likely to secure the best services of its best men in the administration of justice. You can give him a moderate salary, you can make the office a permanent place until the age of seventy years. And if the judge does his duty well ought he not to stay there? If he does not do his duty well you have an easy mode of removing him: there is no trouble about that. Hence there is no danger in giving him the office until the age of seventy years, and if he doth well you may keep him there, and if he doth not well provision is made for his removal. Without reward you surely will not get his services at all. Some one will take the office. We can safely set it down that it will never happen that there will be any difficulty in getting somebody in the State of New York to take the office of supreme judge; and if he is not the man I have described he is the man I will now describe. He is neither cultured lawyer nor courteous gentleman nor honest man; he is of feeble capacity, unable to live at the bar or he is ready to be dishonest on the bench. If your system drives away all the able and honorable men, the weak or the knavish men will take the places. The present system, which allows re-election, is far better than the one proposed where the term is short and no re-election is allowed. Under the elective system we have had very good judges. The evils are not in election, but in re-election, and the want of sufficient permanency and independence. It is well known that men of good character and capacity have, when they found themselves after a term of years of service upon the bench, with all their business relations broken up, and the question of their renomination before them, taken such course in order to secure their re-election as made them blush with shame. And let no man condemn before he has been tried himself. As wise legislators we should so shape the laws as not to lead into temptation. You can get the best men to take this office when you give them permanency and, with permanency, honor. They do not require the great rewards of high professional incomes; but reasonable compensation, permanency and independence, and the honor which follows the discharge of duty in high place. I understand there have been in this Convention objections urged to permanency of office upon the ground that, when a judge has his place fixed until the age of seventy years, there is danger that he will grow arbitrary, that he will be insolent and overbearing. Now, I ask every lawyer who has practiced in our courts if he thinks, under our present system, where the office is not permanent, the manners of the bar or the manners of the bench are any better than in the time of Chancellor Kent. Does any body find the bar more courteous here than in the city of Washington, where judges hold their offices in permanency? Is it human nature that when you place a man in a position of security where he is expected to respect himself and expects others to treat him with respect, that his conduct will be less courteous or dignified than when his position is insecure? I would place a judge in a position where he would be independent of all those influences which injure the manners and weaken the character and dignity of a judge. Place him in a situation of honor, and give him a reasonable salary and permanent term of office, and you will never have any difficulty in getting good men to fill those places. But so long as you leave it otherwise you cannot get the best men to hold the office. And hence the State is not well served, because it does not give such rewards as are proper for it to give, to wit: reasonable salary and permanency of place, and that honor which attends a reasonable salary and permanency of place. When you give an honorable man a place of power he will use the powers with justice and with courtesy; when you give him a place of responsibility, if he is rightly constituted he will feel that responsibility, and not abuse it. If this Convention should adjourn and come before the people with the proposition that no judge shall hold his office more than fourteen years and then shall never have a chance of re-election, the Constitution will be defeated; I should feel that it ought to be defeated. I know that a great many of the best men with whom I am acquainted would oppose its adoption and would be zealous to defeat it. The Constitution cannot be readily changed; it will remain for twenty years to come. You cannot change it when once adopted without great difficulty. It seems to me that no really competent lawyer will ever accept a position as judge upon the terms propoeed; he will reject the place, and it will be filled by an inferior grade of incompetent and dishonest men. I have heard it said that the supreme court should have a term of service less than the court of appeals. I think a moment's reflection will show that if there is to be any difference it should be in favor of giving the shorter terms to the court of appeals, and for this very reason: the greatest objection that has ever existed against placing men upon the bench for life has always been that they would be so far removed from the influences of laymen and from an intimate knowledge of the sentiments of the people, and from their acquaintance with business in the ordinary affairs of life, that they were in danger of forgetting whence they came, and of losing the feelings and sentiments of the people who placed them there. But a judge of the supreme court who sits at circuits to hear the trials of cases, to see witnesses, to examine and hear testimony, to see men, women and children, and thereby through that magnetic influence to learn what is in the human heart, is in a better situation to hold his office longer, if there is to be any difference, than the man who is always removed from these influences. But of all things let us have the law so that a judge shall hold his office until the age of seventy years. There is no greater fallacy than is contained in this idea that in the days gone by men were wiser or more learned than now. The world has never seen so high a degree of intelligence as exists to-day, and never in the history of this State were there as many intelligent men and able lawyers as to-day. Nothing is more erroneous than the notion that every thing which is old is good, and that whatever is new is inferior. The same influences operate now which operated in former years; the same things which made good and eminent judges in years gone by, will make them again if you will apply the same motives. There can be no doubt about that. Human nature is a permanent and enduring force; it is as unchanged as a fixed star; you can always rely upon it. Now, it has been stated upon this floor, by one or two gentlemen, at least, that certain things which are here proposed ought to be done, and yet they think the people will not vote for them. Now, I undertake to say that the people will vote for any thing which they ought to adopt, if the subject is fairly brought before them; they are capable of understanding it, and the result of their deliberations and of their varied wills will be found to be right? Do you not believe it? You believe it in all your actions in life. You go to Albany and make inquiries concerning a public man; you find out his public reputation, what the public think of him, what is his character in that community; and if his reputation in that community for truth is bad, you go into court and swear that you would not believe him under oath. Would you blast the reputation of a man for truth, if your oath was not founded upon the truth and justice of public sentiment which has finally settled down into firm belief, and which, when it settles down, is right? It has been repeatedly doubted whether we can make a Constitution which the people will adopt. If this is so, then one of two things is certainly true; either we have not the capacity to make a good Constitution, or the people have not sufficient intelligence to appreciate our labors. I think we can make a good Constitution, and if we do, I believe the people will fully understand it and adopt it. I think no one in this Convention will pronounce us incapable. Will any one say that the people are too ignorant to vote for a good Constitution? I think there can be no greater mistake, than for us to hesitate in carrying out whatever honest convictions we have in framing this fundamental law; and if we carry out our convictions, and make a Constitution suited to the age and the State in which we live, the people will know that it is such a Constitution, and that it is suited to their wants, and they will certainly adopt it. But I doubt not both parties will join in defeating it, if it is not a good Constitution, and not suited to the wants of the people at this time. What I ask, what I urge, is that, the members of this Convention will be fearless as to what the people will say or do about our work, feeling quite certain that if we do right the people will find it out, and also that if we do wrong they will find it out. What made General Washington President of the United States for eight years? It was not the politicians; they had little to do with it, and they could not control it. It was not that he was a brilliant soldier. He was made President of the United States and continued in office for eight years because the people, in their sagacity, with instinctive knowledge of what they needed, saw in him a fit representative of their will. Whenever the public mind is agitated and awake upon any great public question, the sagacity of the people will select the right man to represent their wishes and to direct them in the way of safety. The people will judge of this Constitution according to its merits, and they will act upon it as they find it suited to the exigencies of their case. And when we come to so important a matter as the making of the fundamental law of the State, you will find that no politician can control this business in the present state of our affairs. Not long ago the Attorney-General of the United States said to me in Washington, "You ought to remember that the State of New York is not only making a Constitution for itself, but is making a Constitution for all the rest of the States." You will find that all men in the other States are looking to the State of New York to see what kind of a Constitution it will adopt. Shall we, then, in framing this Constitution, be looking about to see what views a few politicians express over an oyster supper or at a hotel dinner? If we peep about for that, we had better go home "and peep about to find ourselves dishonorable graves." We have all talked with the people during the time we have been away from here in the recess, and you know that they understand what we are about, and that they will find out whether we finally present them with a Constitution which is the result of our best deliberations and of our honest convictions or not. I undertake to say that no lawyer ever yet has been able, in the trial of a cause, to impress upon a jury convictions which he did not himself really entertain. The jury see through the hypocrisy, and the mass of the people will see through the hypocrisy of their delegates just as quickly; and if we do not present a Constitution which we believe is on the whole the best that can be framed, the people will vote it down, and they ought to vote it down, and the honest men of all parties will be active in trying to expose the sham, and to defeat what we ourselves believe to be something not the best. When we come to this sixteenth section of this article, which relates to the tenure of office of the judges of the supreme court, and the mode in which they shall be placed in office, I trust that the section may be wisely considered, and that we will give up the idea that we can get a good judge by offering a place upon the bench for eight, or for fourteen years without a chance of re-election. To get good judges in that way, is, in my judgment, entirely impossible. We have got through the war; we have started on a new career; we have reached the time when a new Constitution is needed. I know that many doubt whether we have yet reached it, and think that we should wait to see the result of the next presidential election. I have heard many members of this Convention say that; and I have heard it said outside of this body that we had better wait to see what will be the result of the next presidential election. Now, how will the presidential election affect the Constitution of the State? You do not doubt that the country will remain permanent; you have not any doubt that we have now reached a time when there is a reaction following the inflations caused by the war. If you read the papers of this morning you will discover that in the city of New York there are five thousand persons thrown out of employment within the last few weeks; you will discover that prices are falling, and that many men are failing, that labor is not in demand, and that business is in a depressed condition. We need not wait for the next presidential convention, or the next presidential election to see what kind of judges are wanted. You want honest men, whoever is President; and you want able men, whoever is President; and you want to surround the office with such inducements as will invite the best of men to accept it, whoever is President. You will find when the public mind is awake and agitated, as it now is, upon the great ques tion of finance, and question of suffrage, on the question of human rights in their varied forms — when the whole public attention is called to these questions—that the public will, and the public choice will center upon some one man who will honestly represent the public sentiment, and the great wave of public feeling will lift him into the presidential chair as easy as a ship is lifted by the waves of the ocean. You need not wait to see what is to be done in the future before you present to the people of this State a Constitution for their adoption. The people have sent us here for the purpose of getting something in the way of a Constitution that will be an improvement upon the present. We of the Judiciary Committee have taken all the pains we could to get information upon the various subjects with which we had to deal in framing this article. And on this subject of the tenure of office, and on the mode of placing the judges in office, it seems to me that if gentlemen will reflect there can be but one opinion. Now, it is said by some gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject that they would be in favor of the tenure until seventy years if the judges were appointed, but not otherwise. I do not understand the logic of that distinction. The judges are appointed; what is the difference? In England, where the sovereign power resides in the crown, it makes the appointments. In this country where the sovereign power resides in the people, the people make the appointments. There is no real difference, and there is no reason in saying that you would be in favor of a tenure for good behavior if the judges were appointed, but that if they are elected you insist upon a short term. Why not re-elect the judges if they do their duty well; but we have all come to the conclusion that it is unwise to make the judges subject to the temptations attendant upon re-election, and therefore why not agree to make the office of supreme judge honorable, independent, and permanent during good conduct, until the age of seventy years.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat in many respects, though in several I shall be compelled to differ with him. I do not rise for the purpose of combatting any remarks that he has made, but for the purpose of expressing some views in regard to another question that arises here. I agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Pierrepont] that it is very desirable to elect General Grant to the Presidency; and I agree with him in the opinion that the people will elect General Grant, whatever politicians may do [laughter]: but I go for the election of General Grant for the term of four years instead of during good behavior or until he shall be seventy years of age, and in that I differ with the gentleman. [Laughter.] But to the purpose for which I rose. I understand that the proposition of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], and the views of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke], both concur in seeking to prevent any man who holds the position of circuit judge—

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I would ask the Chair if it would be in order to move the previous question on the nomination of General Grant.

The CHAIR—It would not. [Laughter.]

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I would like to ask the gentleman from Cattaraugus [Mr. Van Campen] whether he will be governed by his party and vote with his party on that question, or whether in case the question is moved he will, although his party should adopt General Grant in their caucus, feel at liberty to vote otherwise?

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—The gentleman will feel bound to follow his own convictions.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Then there is no use in my trying to go with my friend on this subject, for I will follow my convictions, and I suppose he will follow his. As I said before, I understand that both these propositions prohibit any man who holds circuits from ever taking part in the deliberations of the general term. Now, I believe that to be a bad proposition and that the result of its adoption would be injurious. I agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Pierrepont], that a man, when selected for the office of judge, whether selected by the Governor or by the people, will, in all human probability, be, the day after his election, precisely the same man that he was the day before. A man is not elevated into a god by being made a judge; he is not made any wiser by it. His elevation gives him neither more legal knowledge nor more legal experience than he had the day before, when he was a mere lawyer. So believing, I think we should look to this question a little, and should not forget that it is quite desirable that the judge himself, after his appointment or election, should grow, and that we should not adopt any course of policy which would prevent him from having all the opportunities for the improvement of his own mind, and the enlargement and extension of his own capacity that it is possible to give him. I have heretofore spoken of the advantage which the bar obtains from the opinions of the judges being written out with deliberation and published in the books. The gentlemen of this Convention who are lawyers cannot but know and appreciate the fact that a judge when he sits hearing arguments at the general term, and participating in the decisions which are made there, is himself at school, and is not only at school, but at the best school for him in the world. A lawyer prepares himself perhaps by months of study for the argument of the question at the general term, and probably his opponent, looking from a different stand-point, has devoted as much time to preparation. They both go down to the general term, and there, before the judge, who has his mind entirely relieved from all other business, they make their arguments. That judge, I say, is at school. He is listening to instructors with views acquired by looking carefully and laboriously at the same question from different stand-points—schoolmasters who have learned all that there is in the books, and all that is to be drawn from their own experience and from the experience of the world, so far as they have participated in it. The judge listens to their views, and from their respective propositions seeks to discover the truth, and sifts out from the chaff of the argument on the one side and on the other the grains of truth that must necessarily be contained in them. Now, is not this an improving process? Is it not a fact that our judges grow faster than any other class of men in the community because they have this school. Now, shall we close that school against the judges? My friend from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] intimates that a man who is a circuit judge is a circuit judge. True; but he may be a circuit judge with very extensive knowledge, or he may be a judge with very limited knowledge, and if we would not compel him to be, at the end of twenty years, the same that he is when he goes upon the bench, we ought not to shut him out from the opportunity of having a little mature reflection occasionally upon questions of law. It may be said that these questions of law are discussed in the circuit; but I appeal to the experience of the profession if there is time at circuit, especially when you impose these heavy duties upon your circuit judges—when one circuit judge is called upon to try in the first instance every case involving principles of law and equity, in a range of country equal in extent to two senatorial districts—if there is time at circuit for that extended argument and calm deliberation which are necessary, both for the proper determination of great questions of law, and for the improvement of the mind of the judge himself. The minds of the profession, and the minds of the judges have hitherto reacted upon each other, and for myself I believe there could be nothing but disaster resulting from a provision that hereafter a circuit judge should never have the opportunity of listening to or participating in the discussion of causes where every question is committed to writing, and where opinions are formed that are fit to go upon the record and be perpetuated in the books. For this reason I am opposed to the system offered by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] and advocated by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke]. In this respect I deem the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] infinitely superior, and I deem the proposition of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary infinitely superior to the system proposed by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. As I have already stated, we want to put our judges themselves at school. They are mere men after an election as before; an election does not make them omniscient, it simply puts them in a position where, if they have the ability to profit by the advantages presented, they will make, from time to time great advances, and I contend that the State is entitled to the advantages which the position of the judges gives them. For these reasons I regret exceedingly to see a system proposed which will deprive the judges and the State of the advantages which must necessarily be derived from the judges listening to the discussions at general term, and participating in the investigation and decision of cases there.

Mr. FERRY—It is my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that that system will be the best, at least so far as the court of review is concerned, which shall have the least number of judges, provided they be found competent to do the business of the State. I believe that two courts, confined strictly to an appellate jurisdiction, would be able to do all the business. But, in deference to what I believed to be the views of members of this Convention, I, in the plan which I had the honor to suggest, made provision for three courts, supposing that one would be located in the city of New York, another perhaps at Albany, and the third at Rochester. However, they were to be located wherever the Legislature thought proper. My reason for believing that a less number might do the business is the fact that the old court, composed of three judges, was able, previous to the adoption of the present Constitution, to transact the entire business of the State, and perhaps it may not be difficult for us to estimate the increased power for the transaction of business which one court would possess over any other one court of a numerous class, for two reasons: First, it would have greater familiarity with all classes of business, and, as I have said before in this body, a very large proportion of the business of the court arises out of questions of practice with which one court must become familiar, and if one court could have the decision of all these questions, that familiarity would enable it to make those decisions much more readily than other courts less familiar with these questions. Then, again, the less the number of our courts, the less frequently will there be conflict in decisions, and there will be a much less number of cases carried to the court of appellate jurisdiction. I believe, therefore, that the effect of this change upon the business of our courts would be such that two courts would be fully able to transact the entire business, although I have provided for three for reasons already stated. Now, the system proposed by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] is, in that respect, substantially the same as that of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke]. But I prefer a system differing somewhat, in other respects, from the views of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke]—a system which shall more completely separate the business of the courts at the circuits and at the special term from the business of the general term; and I prefer that the judges who act in the one class of cases, and who are selected to deal with that class of business only, should not be allowed to transact business in a different capacity, for reasons which have been already stated here, and which I do not now intend to elaborate. However, I regard the present as a favorable time to add my contribution to the mass of matter already submitted for our consideration, and this I can do more directly by calling attention to the plan heretofore submitted by me, and which may be found in document 121. I will first read to the Convention the three sections which embrace my views of what the supreme court should be. The first is that:

SEC. 5. There shall be a supreme court having general jurisdiction in law and equity.

§ 6. The State shall be divided into three judicial districts to be divided by county lines, and to be compact and equal in population as near as may be. There shall be five judges elected in each district by the electors thereof respectively. They shall be classified so that one of the judges shall go out of office at the end of every two years. After the expiration of their terms under classification, the term of the office shall be years; provision may be made by law for ...ating from time to time, one or more of ...d judges to preside at said courts, and any ...e or more of said judges may hold said courts. ...y shall have an appellate jurisdiction only. ...d judges shall reside during their entire term ...ffice at the place where their respective courts ...ll be held, and such courts shall be always ...en. The judges of said court shall have power ...appoint and remove a clerk for their courts re...pectively.

§ 7. There shall be elected in each of the ...ranches of this State, by the electors thereof, a ...stice of the supreme court, who shall hold his ...ffice for the term of eight years. He shall hold ...a court which shall have jurisdiction of, and in ...which shall be transacted, all business now done ...by circuit courts, courts of oyer and terminer, ...special terms of the supreme court, county courts ...and courts of sessions, and such justice may perform ...at chambers all such business as justices of the su...preme court and county judges now perform. He ...shall appoint and may remove a clerk of said ...court; he shall reside at the county seat where ...a court shall be held, and such court shall be ...always open. Such justice shall have jurisdiction ...to act in any county within the State, and the ...legislature may provide for the temporary ex...change or transfer of such justices, from one ...county into another.

These three sections provide for the entire judicial system, so far as it relates to the supreme court, and also to the transaction of the business that is now performed by our county judges and courts of sessions. If the plan is feasible, it must be admitted that it is more simple than any other proposed, and that it requires a less number of judges to transact the business of the State, than under any other plan which has been submitted. We now have, in each county in the State, a county judge, and we have thirty-two judges of the supreme court. My plan only provides for fifteen judges to hold three general terms, and independent of these, I only provide for the same number of judges throughout the State, that we now have as county judges. I give them, as will be seen, a jurisdiction comprising the entire business which is now performed by the courts of oyer and terminer, circuit courts, special terms of the supreme court, county courts and courts of sessions. And if a judge living at the county seat, in each county, holding open court there, can transact the business proposed, why, it is certainly all the judicial force that we need. This plan is also more simple than any other in this particular, that under it, there is no such complication arising out of numerous courts, as under the present system. The transaction of the whole judicial business of the State, above that of justices of the peace in the several towns, and the surrogates' courts in the several counties, is all comprised within these provisions, and is all to be performed in the supreme court. We have, in fact, by this plan, just one court in this State, independent of what other courts may be necessary in the cities. I will not occupy more time at present, but will leave the system to the consideration of the Convention. I ask for it a respectful examination, and if it shall be of service to any member, in arriving at the adjustment which we are ultimately to adopt as the final action of the Convention upon the subject of the judiciary of the State, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Without discussing at present any of these propositions, I wish merely to correct a misapprehension that may exist in regard to myself from something that was said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Pierrepont]. He seems to suppose that all the members of the Judiciary Committee concur in the plan of that committee for the organization of a new supreme court. I, for one, sir, most certainly do not. I opposed in the committee the system as it now stands after the committee had taken out from it the principle of minority representation. I could only be induced to support any plan of organization by departments which shall include a provision which would secure minority representation. Without that I prefer the present system, and to leave the present districts as they are and the judges as they are. If we are to adopt a new one, I trust it will be one that will secure representation from both political parties. I have no doubt that the present system needs improvement. I believe it would be well if the tenure were more stable and the term of service longer, and I think all will agree that the judges should receive a larger compensation. I believe, too, that if we can have a plan by which the circuit shall be held by one class of judges who shall devote themselves entirely to that duty, and the general terms by others devoting themselves to that kind of judicial duty, it will be a great improvement; and certainly there is much merit in the plan suggested by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], but I doubt very much whether we shall be able to agree upon any such plan or upon any of the plans that are proposed; and as between the proposition of the committee and the present system, I shall certainly vote to sustain the present system.

Mr. PIERREPONT—I hope I was not misunderstood by the gentleman who has just taken his seat. I think I stated that after great deliberation and much diversity of opinion the members of the committee, with the exception of one, came to the conclusion to accept this report. The learned gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. A. J. Parker] signed this report, and I remember to have been present when it was signed, and from that fact I inferred, as I think did others, that he had concluded that it was the best we could get. Although we differed on many points during the discussion and the debates that ensued in committee, yet when the gentleman signed the report I supposed that I was justified in saying that we had all come to the conclusion to adopt that report as the best we could get.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOLGER—I rise to a point of order, that it is not in order in the discussions of this Convention to allude to the transactions of a standing committee.

The CHAIRMAN—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—We will not allude to the transactions of the committee. I allude to the report as presented here. That report is presented as the result of our deliberations and so far it is truly presented. Each portion of it is the result of a vote taken upon that portion, but it by no means commits any one to the report as a whole; and such was the distinct understanding agreed upon by all who signed the report. Indeed, the report does not, in its language, imply any thing different.

Digitized by Google

Mr. HALE—I am very glad to hear the statement made by the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], who has just addressed the committee. I am certainly somewhat surprised, after what occurred in the committee, when I consider the distinct understanding that was had upon the day before this report was presented to the Convention, that when any member of that committee rises here to state that the committee were not unanimous in regard to the organization of the supreme court, he should be met by what I regard as a technical objection from the chairman of the committee that it is not in order to allude here to proceedings had in the standing committee. It has been stated here by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Pierrepont] that the report of the Judiciary Committee should not be changed, that no part of that plan should be changed because there was entire unanimity in the committee upon that subject. Now, Mr. Chairman, I claim that the report as it is now here before the Committee of the Whole does not show that there was any such unanimity. It merely shows what is the fact, that by the votes of that committee taken as those votes necessarily were from time to time, and often when the committee was not full, that this was the plan adopted by the majority of the committee and is now presented by those who have signed the statement prefixed to it as the report of the majority of the committee. It is the conclusion, it is said, to which the majority of the committee have come after weeks of laborious investigation, etc. Now, it has been said upon this floor with great propriety that the votes of this Convention were not always apparently consistent with each other, for the reason that the Convention changed from time to time, that the Convention of to-day is not the Convention of last week, but is made up in part of different men. Just so it was in the committee, and I do not think I trespass upon any rule of order in saying this, because just so it must be with any committee constituted of so large a number as was this Judiciary Committee. Votes were had, plans were adopted by the committee at different times which were reversed or rejected when the committee happened at times to be constituted of different members; and I say, Mr. Chairman, with great deference to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Pierrepont] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], who addressed the committee on this subject the other day, that every member of the Judiciary Committee is entirely at liberty whenever he dissents from any measure or proposition adopted by the majority of that committee, to express his dissent upon this floor.

Mr. DALY—I beg leave to correct the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale.] I said nothing that I now remember upon the subject.

Mr. HALE—I may be mistaken, Mr. Chairma but I understood the gentleman from New Yo [Mr. Daly] to speak with reference to this pl and argue in its favor, as one which had be approved by all the Judiciary Committee, wi one exception. It is true, sir, that only one me ber of the committee thought it necessary make a minority report; but I would say, and think every other member of the committ would say that, while in most of its features t judiciary report was cordially concurred in by the members of the committee except the o who made the minority report, yet, on this subje of the organization of the supreme court, the was great diversity of sentiment in the committe from the commencement to the end of its labors and therefore I feel at perfect liberty to expres my dissent upon this question.

Mr. DALY—If the gentleman from Essex [Mr Hale] will permit me, I will state that the re mark which I made in regard to this matter wa in reply to a remark made by the gentleman fro Ulster [Mr. Cooke], and all I said was that there was very great unanimity in the committee on the subject of life tenure.

Mr. HALE—If that was the remark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] it was perfectly correct, one which I can very fully indorse. Upon that subject there was very great unanimity in the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. PIERREPONT—I was not aware that I had said any thing to lead any member of this Convention to suppose me to have said that any member of the Judiciary Committee was so committed to this report that he could not dissent from it; all I intended to say was that the presentation of this report by the committee was an evidence that it was the best plan we could possibly agree upon, and to argue from it that having been the subject of so much deliberation, and having received such general assent, it was worthy of a good deal of consideration from this Convention.

Mr. HALE — With the gentleman's remark on this subject, as he explains it, I certainly have no hesitation in concurring. The majority of the Judiciary Committee presented this report, and it is undoubtedly entitled to all the weight which the recommendation of that majority can command; but I think the idea that would be carried away, by those who listened to my friend's remarks, although he did not probably intend to convey that idea, was that, with the exception of the member who made the minority report, all the members of the Judiciary Committee were committed to sustain every feature of the majority report—an idea which, as the gentleman has just explained, is not correct. Now, I wish to state very briefly a few reasons why I shall support this proposition presented by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. First, I think it has more unity and simplicity than any other plan proposed here, with the exception of the one which I introduced, and which was voted down the other day—for, of course, each of us is inclined to think his own plan the best. Of all the plans now pending, I say this one has in my opinion the most simplicity and unity. It proposes to elect twelve judges by the people of the state at large. They are to constitute the appellate branch of the supreme court, and are to be capable of acting in sections. If two departments cannot do the business of the State the court can divide into three departments of four judges each, and if from the increase of business or any other cause, four general terms are necessary, the court can divide into four general terms of three judges each, and can hold general terms in the sections of the State. The circuit judges or justices proposed by the plan of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], will be elected by the electors of the respective districts, and they are to have power to perform all the duties pertaining to a supreme court judge, except to sit at general term. It may be that the plan provides for a greater number of justices or circuit judges than is necessary, but that is a matter of detail which can be easily modified if it is thought best The system is a flexible one. As I said before, it permits either three or four general terms. It also permits these judges, if they choose, to come together in one term as often as may be necessary to reconcile conflicting views and to establish precedents which shall be of equal authority throughout the entire State. I think the tendency of such a system would be to diminish a great evil which has often been spoken of upon this floor—the immense number of reports. The number of reports in this State was regarded as very large in 1846, when, after sixty or seventy years of judicial life, we had only one hundred and twelve reports; but now, after twenty additional years, we have over one hundred and seventy additional reports. I think the system proposed by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] would do a great deal to obviate that difficulty. Under it only the decisions of the general terms would probably be reported, and we should have but twelve judges sitting at general term instead of thirty-six, as we have now. This is a system, too, which can be adapted to any mode of selecting judges. Some gentlemen are anxious to retain in their office the present justices of the supreme court. If it be determined to do that it can be done with the greatest ease under this system. One justice of the supreme court in each district who has the longest time to serve can be put upon the State bench, the people electing a sufficient number in addition to make up twelve, and the residue made circuit judges; or if the Convention prefer, as it was evident it did in the case of the court of appeals, the system by which the minority shall be represented upon the bench, they can carry out that system by providing that each elector shall vote for only eight or nine judges on the State bench, and each elector in each district shall vote for only two justices. Now, there are some objections to this system, and I will speak of them very briefly. The first is that the judges will become tyrannical, and that from their non-familiarity with circuit duty, they will be too technical upon the appellate bench. I answer by saying that, in most instances, undoubtedly, the State justices would be selected from men who had had experience as judges at circuit, and that that would be the case is evident from the fact that, under our present system, the men elected to the court of appeals are generally those who have had experience as circuit judges, or at least men who have had great experience as lawyers; and I would further answer that objection by asking gentlemen upon this floor, are the decisions of the court reported in Wendell, Hill and Denio any less valuable than those of judges, under the present system, who have had the benefit of both special and general term experience, which we find in the forty-seven volumes of Barbour; whether the profession could as well afford to part with the reports of Hill, Wendell and Denio as with the reports of Barbour? Another objection to this system is that it will tend to centralization. There is no necessity for that. We can provide that general terms shall be held by the judges as now in every district of the State, and there will be no more inconvenience to lawyers than there is now. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, briefly expressed, and for many others which a full examination of the question, I think, would present, I am decidedly in favor of the substitute of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle].

Mr. COMSTOCK—I would inquire of the Chair whether, if the proposition of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] be accepted, it will take the place of the plan proposed by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], the existing system?

The CHAIRMAN—That will be the effect.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Leaving the question still open between this plan recommended in the report of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN—Yes.

Mr. PRINDLE—I ask to have my proposition read.

The SECRETARY again read the substitute offered by Mr. Prindle.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Is an amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN—An amendment is not now in order, there being two amendments already pending.

Mr. PRINDLE—I would suggest to the committee that, if those who believe in the system of separating the functions of judges at circuit and judges in banc, will vote for this proposition, it can subsequently be amended as the committee think best.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I wish to make a suggestion to my friend from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. I think that two justices in each district are abundantly competent to hold all the circuits, when they have no general term duty to do, and that they will still have a good deal of leisure during the year.

Mr. PRINDLE—I would inquire of the gentleman how many he would prescribe for New York.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Oh, New York would require more; I only spoke of the other districts.

Mr. EVARTS—As I understand this proposition it provides for forty judges of the supreme court.

Mr. PRINDLE—Three in each district and five in New York.

Mr. EVARTS—Three judges in each of the seven districts—twenty-one; five in New York—twenty-six, and twelve in banc—that is thirty-eight in all.

Mr. PRINDLE—Yes, sir.

Mr. EVARTS—Is there any provision in this scheme as now presented to be voted for, that determines what the constituency of election is to be, whether it is to be local for all of the judges

Mr. PRINDLE—The question of their election is left for future provision.

Mr. EVARTS—The constituency is left undetermined, whether they are to be elected for the State at large, in departments, or in districts?

Mr. PRINDLE—Yes. My purpose in doing that was, to combine if possible all the friends of this system, leaving the details to be determined afterward. If it is thought that two justices of the supreme court can hold the circuits, I am willing to accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN—The proposition will be so amended if the gentleman from Chenango accepts the amendment.

Mr. PRINDLE—Or it can be left to be modified afterward, or left in the power of the Legislature.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I would place the number at two, with the power in the Legislature to increase it, if the public good should require it.

Mr. PRINDLE—I will consent to that.

Mr. BICKFORD—I rise merely to inquire what would be the effect of an affirmative vote in favor of this proposition of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], whether it would supersede the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer]?

The CHAIRMAN—An affirmative vote would substitute this for the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], leaving the committee still to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], as amended by the substitue.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—For one sir, I am decidedly opposed to this scheme of dividing the judges of the supreme court into judges who hold general terms only, and other judges who hold circuits and special terms only. It is to some extent a return to the judiciary system framed under the Constitution of 1821; but as I understand this proposition, it even goes beyond the provisions of that system. As I understand, it prevents either of the judges of the supreme court from holding circuits or special terms, or transacting the ordinary business of a justice of the supreme court, under any circumstances. Instead of being a scheme furnishing to the people of the State increased facilities and instrumentalities for the transaction of their judicial business, it gives them judges restricted in their jurisdiction and restricted in their powers, so that the people who have business to transact cannot rely upon any of these twelve to do it for them, but must go elsewhere, to some point perhaps far distant from where the attorney or the party lives, to find a judge that may grant an injunction or an order, or to do any business of that character. Now, sir, if the interests of the people of the State are to be in any degree regarded, instead of the interests of the individuals to be put upon the bench, and to be given a tenure of office not only for eight years but un they become seventy years of age, it seems me that some consideration may be given to t existing system. It has been shown by the hi tory of the last twenty years that notwithstan ing the great number of new questions that ha arisen under new acts of the Legislature, und new provisions of the Constitution, under a ne system of practice—

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, th PRESIDENT resumed the chair and the Conve tion took a recess until seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock and again resolved itself into a Committee of th Whole on the report of the Standing Commit tee on the Judiciary, Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, of Cayuga, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be on the amendment proposed by Mr. Prindle, on which the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—Mr. Chairman, the proposition of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] to organize a supreme court in such form as to have a portion of the judges assigned exclusively to the discharge of the duties of general term, and another portion assigned exclusively to the holding of circuits, special terms, and courts of oyer and terminer, is, in my judgment, unwise, inexpedient, and not called for by any consideration of public interest whatever. It has been admitted upon this floor that the judiciary system that existed in this State previous to 1821 was, in this respect, certainly, if not generally, unobjectionable. Whatever fault was found with the judges of the supreme court then existing, had relation to their connection to the legislative department of the government, as members of the council of revision, and not to their services as judicial officers simply. It is conceded that the reported decisions of that court commanded the respect, not only of this State, but of the United States, and of foreign countries; and complaint is made that the present judiciary system does not afford a series of reports of such high standing and character as those of that court. I say that the experience of forty-four years of the supreme court, under the Constitution of 1777, afforded no ground of complaint as to this particular characteristic of that court, that is, the holding of circuits, presiding in courts of criminal jurisdiction, and also in banc, and so far as it was necessary, that the judge should sit in review of his own decisions made at circuit or at oyer and terminer. We have in the constitution of the court of the United States the same feature, and this court has been highly spoken of on this floor, as it deserves to be, and the judges of that court are not confined, in the discharge of judicial duty, to sitting in banc or sitting in review of decisions of other and inferior courts, but all the judges of that court sit upon the trial of issues in the different circuits to which they are assigned; and it is not found by experience in that court that those duties are inconsistent with each other, or that it has any tendency to lower the character, the dignity, the standing or usefulness of that court; and so I might go on and repeat the same statement as to the courts of the different States, the court of common pleas and the queen's bench in England, where these two different kinds of services are combined in the same court. It was not an advantage to the judiciary of this State that there was a change made in 1821, which continued for twenty-five years, where one supreme court was organized, consisting of three justices, whose duties required them mainly to sit in banc and sit in review of decisions made at circuit by another class of judges. Whatever may be said in regard to the usefulness of that court, or the series of courts existing in this State from 1822 up to 1847, it cannot be said that this change inaugurating circuits, inaugurating vice-chancellors' courts, both to be held separately by a distinct class of judges, and organizing a supreme court, whose judges were confined to holding the general terms and special terms for motions only, it cannot be said that that was of any material advantage to the people of this State. On the contrary, it worked great disadvantage. It is true that the population of the State, the business of the State, largely increased from 1821 to 1827. In 1821, courts, as then organized, practically discharged all the duties that devolved upon them. There was no great complaint of delays in the supreme court, none at all in the court of chancery, very little, if any, in the court for the correction of errors. But this change was made in the supreme court. The duties that had devolved formerly upon the court of chancery and the supreme court were changed. The court of chancery was materially modified by the addition of vice-chancellors, and the supreme court proper was changed, and the duties separated and divided, and one class of judges appointed exclusively for the purpose of holding circuits, and presiding at oyer and terminer, and the other part to hold general terms mainly. Was any thing gained in that respect by the people of this State? The court of chancery, I believe, in 1847 had about a thousand causes undecided upon the calendar. The supreme court had about six hundred, and the court of errors a considerable number, I do not know how many — from a hundred to two hundred. Under that system the business of the State fell in arrear, litigants were delayed, those seeking justice were put off, and if a cause was carried to the supreme court proper, it lay there for three years—from two to three years. I believe it was shown the other day to be three years before a hearing could be had in the regular order of the calendar. Unless justice is speedy, unless a decision can be had within a reasonable time, certain injury results to all parties concerned. I say that this change, instead of working any benefit whatever, worked mischief, and only mischief in this respect. What occurred in 1847 under the change that was made? This reconstruction of the supreme court. It is objected that the court was divided into eight districts, or the State divided into eight districts, and that we have eight separate courts. As I said the other day, that is because the State of New York is a great State. It is eight times as large, and twenty times as large, in respect to its population and business, as some other States, and the idea of going back to a system which shall compel all the litigation in the supreme court which is appealed from the special terms, from the circuits, and from the oyer and terminer to the general terms of the supreme court—the idea, I say, of passing all that business through one court, is as impossible as to force all the waters of the North river through an augur hole. It cannot be done. It is impossible. In 1822 there was a population of about one million four hundred thousand in the State and in the city of New York, and I will allude to that in this connection. In the city of New York there were perhaps one hundred and twenty five thousand at that time. The courts as then organized, as I said, were able substantially to keep up. The increase from that time up to 1840 was very great—the population then nearly two million five hundred thousand in the State, and three hundred and twelve thousand in the city. Business increased accordingly. Gentlemen complain that appeals to the court of appeals are more numerous now than formerly, and some sort of scheme is to be devised, if we are to credit the arguments of the gentlemen, by which appeals are to be diminished. You cannot diminish the people of the State of New York very well. You cannot very well diminish their business, their activity and energy. The objection might as well be made that more mowing machines are sold and used now than there were in 1846 or 1850; there is greater pressure upon the manufacturers of these articles; that more sewing machines are made and used now than there were twenty years ago—more railroads, steamboats and canals, the use of all which lead to litigation. The increase of population and the multiplication of business necessarily results in the increase of litigation, and the increase of appeals from inferior to superior courts. It is urged that if we diminish the number of districts or the number of general terms in the State from eight to three, we diminish the number of appeals. Does that follow as a matter of course? It follows if the business is obstructed in the supreme court, so that you cannot get through the supreme court, and those who desire to go to the court of last resort can have the opportunity to do so. If appeals to the court of appeals are to be diminished by throwing obstructions in the way of litigants who desire to go to that court, then I admit that this scheme of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] will have the effect to diminish appeals from the supreme court to the court of appeals, because it will obstruct decisions in the supreme court to such an extent that diminution must necessarily follow.

Mr. PRINDLE — Does the gentleman think that four general terms, with no other business except sitting in general terms, could not do the business that comes from the circuit?

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I think I shall answer the gentleman as I proceed. The gentleman desires to separate these two functions, to create, as he says, four general terms. I understand him to provide for three courts, and I suppose they will hold as many general terms as they please or as the law may provide for.

Mr. PRINDLE—The proposition provides for twelve judges, any three of whom, or more, may hold general terms.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—My conclusion upon that subject, and I do not propose to argue it to any great extent, is this, that whereas, with less population, less business, less litigation in the State of New York altogether, we had but one court to hear these appellate causes, and which was unable to discharge the business of the court, and in the course of twenty-five years business accumulated so that litigants were delayed three years—now, with twice or three times the business we change that system by creating instead of one, three such courts to transact the business. But the population of this State is not to stand still. The business of this State is not to die out. The world is not coming to an end; and the result, I claim, will be that those courts will very soon be delaying the litigants in this State, and obstructing the business, from the very nature of things, from the constitution of the court which he proposes, aside from the other objections that are made to separating the different functions of these judges. What is to be gained by it? The gentleman says there are differences of decision, contradicting decisions made in the eight different districts, and it is said there are eight separate courts, that the court in one district pays no respect to the decisions of the court in another district. Now, I respectfully dissent from this as a matter of fact. I have always understood, and never heard it controverted until I heard it controverted on this floor, that it was common—not universally true, but common—for the general term in one district to pay great respect to the decisions previously made in another district upon the same point, that they usually follow that decision, that they dissent from it or decide different from it only when they conceive that the first court had committed a great error; and I ask, if there is any objection to having contradictory decisions when the first decision is an erroneous one? I mentioned an instance the other day of Chancellor Kent, who overruled his own decision in open court, and said that he was satisfied he was wrong the year before. I say it is common, it is usual for the general terms in one district to pay respectful consideration to the previous decision of another district. But how would it be if you held three courts, twelve judges elected and three of them to hold general terms? I would like to know if there is not the same opportunity in deciding the same number of appeals from inferior courts, for these three, the one to disagree with the other? They cannot decide three ways; they cannot decide very well more than two ways, and I think it would be just as likely for one of these courts to decide against the other as in the other instance. But suppose they do in either case, what is the great mischief of it? One may be right and the other wrong. Suppose one term that has the first consideration of a question growing out of a law that is passed in pursuance of a provision of the Constitution upon which we are now engaged. The first time the question comes up the general term in one district decides one way. It is a new question; it has not had very extensive examination or full consideration, and they decide it, perhaps, without sufficient consideration. They decide it wrong, if you please. I would like to know if they are to insist everlastingly upon that decision? I would like to know if it is the practice in this country or any country for a court under such circumstances to be bound absolutely by such decision? It goes before another court, the superior court of New York, the superior court of Buffalo, or the common pleas of New York; what is the difficulty about deciding it the other way if they, on further consideration, more careful examination and more thorough discussion of the question, come to an opposite conclusion? You have provided the court of appeals for the very purpose of settling the law in that case, as in all cases of controversy. Limit appeals? One gentleman says that he looks over the reports and he finds this decision one way and that the other way, and he is greatly embarrassed in advising his clients. It reminds me of the saying of a very good lawyer in regard to a decision that had been made. He did not know but that was the decision of the court, but if it was it was not the law; and I take it that a counselor who is called upon to decide the law should take into consideration all the decisions that he sees, and then advise his client, according to his best judgment, as to what the true construction of the law should be. It is notorious that one court differs with itself from time to time, from generation to generation, as well as one court from another court. I say that you gain nothing in respect to uniformity of decision by the proposed scheme over what the existing court affords—nothing practical. There is one thing that you lose. There is one disadvantage growing out of it in addition to what I have named, and that is this: you change your system. It is not very important what the precise form of proceedings is always; it is not very important precisely how many judges you have, but it is important that the system of practice should be in some degree uniform and well understood. How many difficulties have grown out of, how much litigation, how many errors, how many decisions, and how many books have been published in consequence of the change in the practice of the court by the Constitution of 1846 and the laws passed in pursuance of it. And how many more books, how much more litigation would be required to settle the new system of practice, no better than that we have, but, being a change, controversies, differences of interpretation of statute, of rules and of practice will be constant and continued from year to year, and I think that is just as bad as conflict of opinion between two different general terms of the supreme court. I think the proposed amendment renders the judiciary system complicated and uncertain, unnecessarily so, and you gain nothing by this change. I said that these various courts under the Constitution of 1821 allowed the business to accumulate—necessarily so. It could not be helped, I say, that in the courts that now exist under the Constitution of 1846 this business has ven cleared off. You have got rid of some two ndred and fifty county judges. You have got d of some two hundred and fifty or three hundred sters in chancery, and I don't know but as ny examiners and quite a number of supreme rt commissioners, who entered into and formed rt and parcel of the administration of justice der the previous Constitution. You get rid of that, and the court as at present organized charges the duty fully and keeps up with the siness of all the courts, the old supreme court, e court of chancery, the vice-chancellors, and rts of common pleas. They have taken in and charged all the business that devolved upon ese various courts and these various officers; d I say that under this proposed change you ave no assurance that they can accomplish any ch thing, because the twelve judges that are proposed to be elected as judges of the supreme urt, to hold general terms only, do nothing else whatever, and the parties who are seeking the services of a judge, a mandamus, an injunction, or ny thing of that sort, have got a smaller number judges to resort to and a greater distance to go. You are removing the administration justice further from the people. And nother objection, to my mind. You organize these three general terms in different parts of the State, you will have one in the ity of New York, say another in the city of Albany, and the other in the city of Syracuse or Rochester, as you please. They do not attend the circuits. They attend simply to appellate usiness, and they very soon get into some old rut, whether right or wrong, and they get some sort of a system of decision, right or wrong. I assume that they will be right generally. I notice, too, that there will be two or three lawyers in each place, whose voices they can hear and whose arguments they can understand and appreciate, but when any other counselor appears before them they do not understand him. His voice sounds harshly upon their ears. They will be afraid that he is attempting to get them out of some old rut in which they have been traveling year after year. It is useful to all these men to mingle with the people of the State; to hear all of the various questions that come up at the circuits as well as at general term, and special term; to hear them discussed and to take part in their decision. And I say litigants and parties will suffer by having the business removed from their locality. I will not take up any more time upon that particular subject, but there is another point in regard to this question of the supreme court that has been alluded to, in relation to which I desire to say a few words. If we retain substantially the present system, I presume that we are to retain substantially the present system of election of the judges of the supreme court. Because this committee of the whole has framed an article in relation to the court of appeals providing for the tenure of office to be fourteen years and not allowing a re-election, it does not follow that that scheme is to be applied to the supreme court. Gentlemen argue here that, theoretically, it is unjust to a man who is put upon the bench ever to allow him to go off, whether he is elected for one year, or it is unjust to elect him for one year, or eight years, or ten years, or fourteen years; but he should be elected until he is seventy, and then he will feel comfortable on the bench. He will feel entirely independent of the people. To be sure he ought to regard public opinion, but he is entirely independent of the people and of every body else. It is admitted that the system that we have lived under for the last twenty years has worked well, certainly in seven of the eight districts; that the people have secured the services of very respectable judges, capable and honest men, and they have been re-elected many times. In our own district four of those judges have been re-elected without opposition. In two of the districts judges have been elected and re-elected and are now in office, who were first elected in 1847. I do not know whether they are seventy years of age or not. Has it ever been alleged in regard to any of these, that they have failed in the discharge of duty, or have demeaned themselves improperly upon the bench, or that they have attempted improperly to influence the people in regard to their re-election? Is there, has there been, any difficulty about that? It is said it will be hard for these men, after serving eight or fourteen years, to go back to the walks of professional business or private life. That may be so; but in this country we have no grades of society that makes it illegal or improper, in a social point of view, for a man who has been a judge to go back to his profession. Practically, there would be no particular difficulty about it. Most eminent men who have been on the bench have become subsequently eminent as counselors. This is an active country, it is a live country. Men may serve one year, or five years, or ten years on the bench, and then they can work on a farm, or practice law; and they do not by so doing, lose their social position or standing in the community. There is no such class or caste in this country as to disqualify a man, make it degrading for him to do these things after he has served acceptably as a judge. It is said that judges have failed to be re-elected in some cases because political parties change, and in other cases because the machinery of the party is so worked that the judge is not renominated and re-elected. That is so, undoubtedly; but does it follow that when the change comes that the new man is not just as good for the position as the old one? Does it not sometimes follow that an improvement is made in that respect, and just as often an improvement as the contrary? And I apply the remark of the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. Pierrepont] —in case the judge so demeans himself on the bench that when his time is about to expire that it can be said of him that he can decide against his friend or in favor of his enemy, if his duty requires him so to do; that while on the bench he is not known to have done one thing but what at the time he believed to be right, proper and honest. I say if the judge so demeans himself, and he has an inducement so to demean himself, as to satisfy the public that he deserves a re-election, the people somehow have a way to find this out, and ascertain the fact that he merits a re-election, and if he really deserves it they will give it to him. This is not a universal rule, to be sure, nor is any other proposition to be made here upon this subject of universal application. It is a general proposition—every man on the bench who shows himself worthy, and desires it, may be re-elected. Of course the facts may be such that public opinion will call upon the dominant party to change this officer, as well as the incumbent of any other important office.

Mr. BAKER—I infer from the remarks made by the gentleman who has preceded me [Mr. E. A. Brown], and others who have participated in the debate upon this question, that one of the complaints made by the people against the present judiciary system is, that of the judges reviewing their own decisions, and the action of the committee upon one of the sections we have adopted, has provided that no judge of the court of appeals or supreme court shall sit in review of a case on which he has given his vote. Now, if we can construct a court under the section providing for a supreme court, in which the nisi prius judge is divorced and separated entirely from reviewing in any way, directly or indirectly any case that he has given his vote upon, I take it that we have provided for that difficulty. But it seems to me in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary that they do not practically provide for the absolute separation of the circuit court judge who tried the case, from sitting, to some extent, in review of his own decisions. As was remarked by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke], the bench of judges are collected together at general term; the cause is called up, and perhaps the presiding judge announces to his brethren on the bench that he tried that case at circuit. He takes his seat upon the floor; the other judges hear the case. The next case that is called on, perhaps another judge has to make the same announcement to his brethren upon the bench—that he has participated in, or that he decided that case at the circuit or special term. When they go into consultation, when they come to write out their opinions, compare them, and get the votes, the question must occur, in almost every instance: "Why, Brother A., or B., I have just been looking over your decision and I feel constrained to vote against you, to overrule your opinion given at the circuit"

Mr. E. A. BROWN—In connection with these remarks I desire to call attention to what I intended to say in relation to the former practice of the court of errors, when it was provided that the chancellor, on an appeal, was not allowed to vote, but he was required to furnish the reasons for his decision in each particular case. So in regard to judges of the supreme court. When a case was brought to the court of errors, from the supreme court, they were not at liberty to vote in the court of errors, but they were required to furnish the court of last resort with the reasons which governed their decision.

Mr. BAKER—That is true; but, as I remarked, this Convention had come to the conclusion to separate or divorce the votes of the trial judge from the reviewing court. Having come to that conclusion, it seems to me rational to carry out the rule. They should complete the separation, not in one section declare that no judge shall sit in review of his own decision, and then in another section allow him at least to sit or be present to hear the comments and criticisms of counsel and the views and opinions of his brethren in overruling him. It requires no very great amount of ingenuity to discover what the effect would be at general term where one judge was writing down and overruling the opinion of another judge on the same bench. It would lead to criticisms, strictures and animadversions upon each other. It seems to me that that would not conduce to harmony in feeling or unity in decision. The better way would be, if this Convention comes to the conclusion to effect a divorce, to do it absolutely and effectually—in fact, by an explicit provision in the section organizing this court. And the section under consideration seems to be framed in such a way that all the evils growing out of the present system are retained. While another clause we have adopted in the Constitution says he shall not vote upon any case he has decided at circuit or special term, yet his influence will and must be felt in the decision of his brethren, though he may not participate in giving that decision. And that is one of the evils which the Convention is attempting to remedy and upon which it is nearly unanimous.

Mr. WAKEMAN—Allow me to make a suggestion as to the question here whether or not the judge, who is placed upon the supreme court bench, would not in his decision, and the opinion he should form, make it a point to decide the case as he believed to be according to the law of the land, rather than to undertake to favor another judge; for it must be remembered that every judge who overrules a decision at circuit must give his reasons for so doing on paper, and they are often published in the books. Is it not his desire to stand right with regard to the law rather than to favor a brother judge?

Mr. BAKER—Before I close my remarks I apprehend the question will be answered. I think the remarks I design to make will answer that question when I come to another branch of the question. Now, I wish, if it be the will of this Convention, to separate the nisi prius judge from the reviewing judge, it should be done effectually, fairly and honestly, so that the plan is carried out absolutely under this section in good faith. If, as it will appear by reference to the section providing for the construction of this court, the Constitution places it out of the power of the Legislature to prohibit or prevent any judge from sitting at nisi prius in any county in the State, and they can hold the circuit in any county in the State, and the Legislature would have no power to prohibit or prevent it, it would often arise, where judges who held circuits and have to sit in the same court where their decisions would come under review and subject to the criticism of counsel and of their brethren. I leave it for the members of this Convention to reflect whether that would produce any effect upon the several members of the bench, though not having the right to give a vote on the question under the consideration of the court. Mr. Chairman, there is another evil which I infer from the remarks made by almost every delegate in the Convention who has preceded me, is felt not only by the judges and the members of the profession, but the people at large. It is an evil that pervades the whole State, and every court, and every branch of the judiciary and ramification of business in the State, and that is, the conflict of decisions that have grown up under the judiciary system of the Constitution of 1846. There is, I am aware, a diversity of opinion in this Convention, whether it be an evil. There are gentlemen in this Convention who think that it is rather a benefit to have conflicting decisions, and multiplicity of decisions, and printed reports, merely for the purpose of enabling them to make briefs; so that they may have the benefit of opposing views and conclusions to which different judges have come, to enable them to arrive at a just conclusion of what the law of the State is. Let us, for a moment, see whether that benefit which arises to the members of the profession is to outweigh the evils which it inflicts upon the people of this great State. There are some questions which occur to me of conflict of decisions of the courts of this State. I mean the supreme court; and how I find it to work in our system I will state. Take the question of the opinion of witnesses not experts. We had supposed, way back prior to 1846, that there was a tolerably well settled rule upon that question, but since that time the supreme court of the State of New York has, so far as it has had the power, unsettled that principle entirely, and the evil is felt at the door of every man in the State. In every court, every police, justices' and county court, and all inferior courts, and courts of concurrent and equal jurisdiction, and in the supreme court itself, it might be of some benefit to a member of the profession, in making up his brief, to argue a question on the exclusion or the admission of evidence, as to the opinion of witnesses that were not experts, it might be of some little or trivial benefit to a member of the profession. But look at the immense evil that it carries home to the pockets and business interests of the people everywhere in this great State. Every man's property or business is affected by that question. In the case of Clark v. Brockway, (21 Barbour, 331), an action was brought to recover damages for carelessly threshing a quantity of wheat. A witness was called who was conversant with the situation of the wheat, who had examined the straw after it was threshed, who had informed himself as to all the facts of the manner and mode in which the wheat was threshed. The question was put to him at a justice's court, from the examination that he had made of the quantity of wheat that was left in the straw after the threshing was finished, how much would be the loss to the owner of the wheat by the threshing of six hundred and forty eight bushels? Objection being made to the question on the ground that it called for the opinion of the witness, and that he not being an expert could not give an opinion, the objection was overruled and exceptions taken by defendant. The case went to the county court and from the county court to the supreme court of the State in the eighth district. Judge Marvin giving the opinion of the court and deciding that the evidence was improper, and that the opinion of the witness could not be given in such a case he not being an expert. Let us see how it affected the people of the eighth district. A competent witness might stand by and see the land or property of another destroyed in his sight, and yet could not state to the jury in his judgment how much of the property had been lost or destroyed, because he could not measure to a kernel of grain or weigh to a pound the precise amount wasted or destroyed. Although he was the most competent man in the world to speak to that point, he having been present and seen all the facts about it and knew better than any other human being could know the extent of the injury and amount of loss, yet it was held by the court that he could not give his opinion on the ground that none but experts could give opinions, substantially holding that carelessly threshing wheat by which some of it was wasted and lost was a question of science or skill. Now, I ask, notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown] and other gentlemen who have preceded me on that point, whether that decision constituted or should not have constituted the law for all inferior courts not only in that district but over the whole State as well as the supreme court in that and all the other districts. And yet, if the doctrine promulgated upon this floor be correct, any justice of the peace even could overrule the court of appeals decision because, they say, it is not the law of the land. Very well, if that constituted the law of the land for the eighth district.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—If such a decision as that was wrong, would it not be equally mischievous if the court that made it was the only court there was in this State?

Mr. BAKER—I shall answer that objection before I sit down. My answer will be embraced in the remarks that I am about to make. If the gentleman will follow me out in the remarks I intend to make he will see how I shall answer that question. I say that that decision of the supreme court in the eight district constituted, or should have constituted, the law of that district for every inferior court therein. Still, if the doctrine of some of the members of this Convention be correct, it might be utterly disregarded and a county judge or even a justice of the peace might overrule the decision of the supreme court.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—If the gentleman alludes to me he misunderstood me. I made no such statement.

Mr. BAKER—If I have misstated the gentleman I did not intend to do so, and do not wish to misconstrue him.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—On the contrary I maintained that the law once laid down by a general term should be the law in every district, unless shown to be clearly erroneous, until otherwise determined by the court of appeals.

Mr. BAKER—Very well. We do not disagree then about the principle I am contending for, and if the gentleman will ask fewer questions we shall get along much better and have fewer misunderstandings and he can make the best of what I have to say. That decision was made in 1856. Then, in 1861, in the case of Nellis v. McCarn reported in 35 Barbour, page 115, an action to recover damages for an injury done to the plaintiff's growing oats, committed by the cattle of the defendant, the same question precisely in principle was put to a witness in the justice's court in which the suit was pending, and the justice allowed it to be law, thus actually overruling the decision in the case of Cook v. Brockway. So that it happened that a justice of the peace in Montgomery county exercised the right of overruling, in 1861, a decision of the supreme court, in full bench, rendered in the eighth district in 1856! The case was carried to the county court of Montgomery county, and from thence to the supreme court in the fourth district, and was there decided by Judge Bockes, who prepared and gave the opinion of the court, in which he held that the question was proper. In the one court of the eighth district it was held that a question of that kind calling for an opinion as to the amount or quantity or value in damages occasioned by an injury to or destruction of property committed by cattle was improper, and in the other court in the fourth district holding that it was proper; and each court wrote an able opinion upon the question. Now, it is not the province of this Convention to decide which was right, though I apprehend we could come just as near the true rule as those two courts did, because we could not take more than two sides to the question; but it is our duty to provide a remedy in the organic law that will hinder and prevent such things occurring. That is our province and our duty. Then, again, in 1862, in the case of Harpending v. Shoemaker, reported in 37 Barbour, 270, an action was brought for damages occasioned by waste in threshing a quantity of buckwheat. The witness had examined the buckwheat straw, immediately after it was threshed (the same as in the case of the wheat straw in Cook v. Brockway), in order to ascertain how much buckwheat was left in the straw and wasted in consequence of imperfect and careless threshing. And in that case the court held that the opinion of a witness not an expert as to the quantity wasted, was proper, sustaining the decision in the fourth district, given by Judge Bockes, and that the opinion of a non-professional witness or a non-expert, in such a case, could be given. This decision in Harpending v. Shoemaker was in the seventh district, and sustained the case of Nellis v. McCarn. Then, in 1865, in the case of Armstrong v. Smith reported in 44 Barbour, 120, the action was brought for injury done by the defendant's cattle to the plaintiff's growing crops, consisting of hops, grass, oats and wheat, in which Judge Balcom, in the sixth district, overruled, in just so many words, the decisions in the eighth and fourth districts. Now, sir, gentlemen undertake to say and tell the members of this Convention (although I apprehend they will tell the people of this State with very little effect) that it is no injury to the people of this State to have such conflicting decisions. In the fourth district we have respect for the decisions of our supreme court, and feel bound to follow them as declared in that district, and yet my friend from Herkimer [Mr. Graves], who resides in the fifth district, may feel more respect for the law as promulgated in the sixth district, than as declared in the fourth, and as he and I live in adjoining districts, and so near to the dividing line that we must cross into each other's territory, how are we to determine what the law is in his district, neutral ground, where the general term of his district has not pronounced what the law is therein? He, as a counselor at law, or even any justice of the peace in his district, might, with propriety, set himself up as the judge of the law there, and overrule the decisions of the supreme court, as pronounced in any of the districts I have mentioned, because the court of last resort for these cases has, in the fourth and seventh districts decided the law one way, and in the sixth and eighth districts another way, leaving the profession, business men, and all courts of all grades inferior to the supreme court, and even that court, to grope their way in the dark as to what the rule of law is upon that question. I happen to know a case, sir, and I presume other gentlemen in this Convention who have been in the practice must also have known cases, where an action was brought, after one of these decisions was promulgated, and the counsel prosecuting the action brought into court one of these decisions, and relying upon and urged it as the law of the land; and it was acted upon as such by the magistrate, in his favor, until his adversary got up and read the law as decided in another district of the same court, when the tables were turned at once by a change in the opinion of the justice, thus rendering the law, as administered under the decisons of the supreme court, a snare and delusion to the suitor and his counsel, and even the court. And yet we are told that no great evils result from conflicting decisions of this court, though it has rendered the law as uncertain as the fleeting clouds that are passing over our heads, as unstable as a puff of smoke, and as fluctuating as the tide — that it is no evil to the people of the State, this conflict in the decisions of their courts! It may not be to the lawyer anxious to increase his business in these trials of legal legerdemain, where impudence and assurance are more valuable qualities than a knowledge of the principles and maxims of the law; but to the people who want certainty and stability, it is no light tax, either upon their pockets or their patience. Sir, in my judgment, it is to the commonwealth an unmitigated evil, costing the people millions of unnecessary expense, and producing, in the administration of justice, a state of actual barbarism. The arbitrary will of the presiding judge for the time being is the law of the land, to be treated with contempt and disrespect, and overruled by his co temporary or successor, in the same court, and disregarded by the inferior courts and magistrates. The maxim of stare decicis seems to be entirely obliterated from the jurisprudence of the State, and to have become obsolete in the learning of the bench. It is useless for us to condemn the supreme court for these conflicting opinions it is but the result of the defective organism of that court under the present Constitution. Divided into eight independent and isolated tribunals, each charged with co-ordinate duties, jurisdiction and functions, conflict must be the inevitable result, and uncertainty and fluctuation the product of that conflict. We are convened here to remedy this organic defect of our present system; and if we desire consistency, uniformity and stability in our laws and jurisprudence we must here so recreate this court that conflict is impossible, and we should remember that we are charged with the great duty of making a Constitution and creating courts for the people, and not solely for the legal profession. The question of conflict of decision does not end here. You may take the question under the married woman's act of 1848, as amended in 1849, as to what are the rights of the husband under that law, and you will find that the decisions of the supreme court are in conflict. So that to-day, so far as the judicial construction of those statutes is concerned there is not a lawyer in the State who can tell what the courts have decided or what the law is as declared by them. Is it not an evil that the people do not know the law? What will any of you who do not think that conflict in the decisions is an evil, when called upon as a counselor, tell your client when he comes to your office and asks you to draw his or her will, and demands of you the true judicial construction of that law? Where do you stand as a professional adviser? If you are an honest man and give a faithful statement of the truth, you must tell your client that the law on the subject is in such intricacy, confusion and conflict, that you do not know what it is; and that you cannot tell, in framing a will or other instrument, whether your will or document will hit the law as it is or not, or whether the law will hit your will or document right or not. In the case of Blood v. Humphrey, reported in 17 Barbour, 660, where a husband brought an action to recover the lands of his deceased wife, to which she had acquired title subsequent to the acts of 1848 and 1849, against her grantee (she having conveyed the lands), it was held at general term of the supreme court in the sixth district, "that a conveyance by her defeated the right of her husband as tenant by the curtesy." Again, in the case of Sleight v. Read, reported in 18 Barbour, 159, where the proceeding was an application by judgment creditors of the husbands of two married women, who had acquired title by descent from their father of real property, subsequent to the acts of 1848 and 1849, to have the surplus moneys arising from the sale of the property on foreclosure of a mortgage given by their father in his life-time, applied to the judgments against the husband, it was held by the supreme court at general term in the first district that "in regard to real property belonging to the wife at the time of marriage, if prior to the act of 1848, the husband took a vested interest, was entitled at once to the rents and profits during their joint lives, and in case of the birth of a living child, to a contingent right on the death of his wife, to the sole enjoyment during his life; but that as to her future acquired property, his interest is subject to any change the Legislature may prescribe, and that the wives held to their sole and separate use." In Billings v. Baker, reported in 28 Barbour, 343, in an action for a partition of real estate, where the question was raised as to what inchoate right or interest the husband had, it was held "that the acts of 1848 and 1849 absolutely abrogate the prospective right of the husband as tenant by the curtesy." But in Vallance v. Bausch (28 Barbour, 633), where the right of the husband to the personalty of his deceased wife was raised, the court at general term in the first district held "that the common law or statutory right of the husband to all his wife's personal property, is a right commencing with marriage, continuing during their joint lives, and surviving on her death," and that it "was not the intention of the Legislature to abolish or change the husband's prospective right of succession to her personalty." I could add other cases, decided by this court, involving this question, where the opinions are conflicting. But again, sir, I will pass to the question of the statute of limitations, which we had supposed was pretty well settled, and upon which there was a rule by which we could be governed in practice, but it has so happened that the question as applicable to a stock note given to an insurance company, has been differently decided, in different districts. In one case, the name of which I do not now remember, it was held in the fourth district, in a very elaborate and able opinion, that the statute of limitations did apply to such a note, but in some of the other districts it was held not to apply, and that such a note was a continuing contract—thus producing conflict, confusion and uncertainty upon that question. This conflict has arisen, not from want of ability, or honest intention on the part of the courts or judges, but from the organic construction of the supreme court, and is the legitimate and necessary consequence of the division of the court into eight independent and isolated tribunals. Conflict in opinions and decisions is an inevitable result, it is an organic disease, and nothing short of organic reconstruction can remedy or cure the evil. Again, sir, every gentleman who has had occasion to go into our courts at special term, and there observe the practice, must know that there is hardly a section of the Code of Procedure (which was designed to be so plain that any man of ordinary capacity or understanding might understand it) but has received different constructions from different judges, for there are hardly any two judges in the State who have agreed upon the meaning of many sections of the Code. It may be a very pretty state of things for the attorney, at least for him who wins, though not so pleasant for the litigant who has to pay the bill, nor for the unsuccessful counsel, who, having prepared his case and his papers according to the promulgated opinions of a judge, goes into court in the faith that that opinion is good law, and that it will be adhered to as such, at least by the judge who promulgated it, yet finds that the law he reads, admitted to be good law by the presiding judge in some other district, while informed that, he, the judge, being in a district where some other judge has given a different opinion, feels constrained, by a sort of judicial courtesy to overrule his own opinion of the law in deference to his erring brother. I myself, was the unfortunate victim of an instance of that kind of practice a few years ago. and now I wish my learned friend from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] was in his seat, as he is one of the gentlemen in the Convention who think the evils of conflict and uncertainty in the decisions are exaggerated and overrated, and as he or his firm was particeps criminis in perpetrating the evil upon me, I would like to face him now and here while I detail the incident, which is but a sample of hundreds illustrative of the beauties of conflict of decision and of the abandonment of the common law maxim, stare decisis. I based my motion upon a section of the Code and in conformity to a decision then recently made, giving it judicial construction by his honor, Judge Parker, and if the gentleman is present he will excuse me in saying now that I thought his decision was an enlightened, liberal and able opinion, giving the true construction to that section of the Code prescribing where special motions should or must be made. As I said, I based my motion upon that section and upon that decision which had been made by his honor, Judge Parker, in the third district. My adversaries, Townsend & Kellogg, met me at St. Johnsville, on the way to Herkimer, where my motion was to be made. Mr. Kellogg told me he thought I had better not go up there, as they intended to beat me in my motion. I did not see how I could be defeated in my motion with such a clear and conclusive opinion in my favor. The cigars were wagered and we went on to the court. I found Judge Parker on the bench, and felt still more confident of success with my motion. I got up and stated my case, which was identical with the one decided by his honor in the third district—upon which he stated to the counsel on the other side that he had recently decided that question and that Mr Baker was right. "But," said Mr. Kellogg, "your honor, if it were in the third district we should yield the point without debate or question; but we are in the fifth district, and Judge Allen has decided just the other way." His honor, shrugging his shoulders, and perhaps coloring a little at the inconsistencies of the law and the dilemmas into which judges were thus put by the conflict of decisions, read or heard read the decision of Judge Allen, and very kindly told me if he were at home, he should hold my law was good; but he, being in a district where the judges differed with him, felt under obligations to defer to the opinion of the judge in the fifth district as a matter of judicial courtesy. I was beaten with my case with the best law on my side.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I did not hear what the gentleman said. I will ask him a question—if he refers to me in any thing he said?

Mr. BAKER—Not at all. It was suggested by a friend near me that it was only a matter of the cigars.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I certainly never had any case with my learned friend, and never was in the Herkimer court-house in my life.

Mr. BAKER—I do not want to go over the statement of the case again, but will say to the gentleman that it was his partner.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—It was Mr. Kellogg to whom the gentleman alluded, I presume.

Mr. BAKER—It was Kellogg & Townsend.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—There never has been any such firm.

Mr. BAKER—Perhaps the gentleman will remember the case of a very worthy client of his from Montpelier, Vermont, who brought an action, laying the venue in Rensselaer county against the defendant in Montgomery county, the case of Bancroft v. Haight?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—There was no such case in my office.

Mr. BAKER—There was such a case prosecuted by Townsend & Kellogg, but I believe it was the gentleman's partner who had it in charge.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I was not there; I do not know any thing about it.

Mr. BAKER—I think, if the gentleman was there, and had seen the effect of the conflict of decisions, and the mortifying position in which the judge of the supreme court was put in finding himself contradicted in what he decided to be good law, he would have a better comprehension of the evils attending such conflicts of decision. I believe that this evil of fluctuation and uncertainty and conflict in the law is the greatest evil our judiciary system labors under to-day. I believe the people suffer more from it than any other defect, or all other defects, in the present Constitution put together. I believe that grievance had more to do with the calling of this Convention, to provide a remedy for it, than any other; and I confess my surprise that I see member after member getting up in this Convention and conceding all we claim as to its being an evil, and an unmitigated evil, and not proposing any remedy for it. I can tell gentlemen here that the legal profession all over the State understand this question precisely as I do. And why? Because they have suffered as well as I have and as every delegate to this Convention, in practice as a lawyer, must have suffered. If he has had any practice, he must have had cases of that kind. Is it or not an evil, where you go to a justice of a court and there propose a certain kind of evidence which has been given a legal status in your district, to have your adversary cite something directly contrary in his district of equal authority? These are facts; and if there is any honorable delegate who would deny these facts, let him examine Barbour's Reports and look at the conflicting decisions, since 1846, especially those that have grown out of the construction of the Code of Procedure. In making these comments, I do not mean to impute bad motives to the judges who have promulgated these decisions. Nor is it the duty of this Convention to decide the matter as to which is right or which is wrong. Each one is entitled to his own private opinion. But it is the duty of this Convention to provide an organic structure to the court by which this conflict, by no possibility, can accrue without the court stultifying itself. That is the point I make. How is it to be done? One gentleman says you may get unity in the law and uniformity in the decisions, by carrying your cases to the court of appeals. I say to those delegates who take that view, that each one of these cases that I have mentioned, containing questions as to the opinion of witnesses, originated in justices' courts, and could go no further. In the sixth and seventh districts the law is declared to be one way, and in the fourth and eighth districts just the opposite way. Then, what is the law? You cannot take your case, originating in a justice's court, to the court of appeals." You may do so if it commenced in the county court, or in the supreme court. You cannot take a case that originated in a justice's court according to our present system, and according to any system that is proposed here, and carry it to the court of appeals, and there get a decision which is a finality upon this question. Hence, you will find there is a class of cases like this question cited, upon the opinion of witnesses who are not experts, where the law is conflicting and has been differently decided in almost every district in the State, and you have no remedy until somebody pleases to take a case up to the court of appeals and there get it settled. In the meantime, while your appeal is pending in the court of appeals, the people are to rest under this uncertainty and in a position where the decision of a justice of the peace, is just as binding, as an authority, as the decision of the supreme court. This I regard as a great evil and, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment it is one of the evils, and the principal one, that has resulted in the clogging up of the court of appeals. It is this constant conflict of decisions that has grown up in the multiplication of supreme courts in the State, that has clogged up and accumulated such an immense business in the court of appeals, cases involving these conflicts which have gone to that court for final decision. There is no doubt about it. But if you create a supreme court that promulgates but one law, you will diminish, in my judgment, from thirty to fifty per cent in the first year after the court goes into operation the number of appeals from that court to the court of appeals. It is the uncertainty, the fluctuation of law, and conflict in the lower courts, that compels the people, in order to know what the law is, to go to the court of last resort. It is inevitable from the independent and isolated eight supreme courts. There is no remedy for it, but to make the court a unit.

Mr. M. H. LAWRENCE—I would like to ask the gentleman a question. It is said that lawyers seldom go to law with each other. Is it because of their lack of confidence in the decisions of the judges? They have no confidence in lawyers' law.

Mr BAKER—I will adopt the answer which my friend from Clinton [Mr. Beckwith] whispers, because they know how to keep out of the law. Every careful man, and every man who is careful of his property, or his reputation, will be careful how he goes into a mill where he cannot tell what course he will take to find his way through. He wants to know where he is coming out, and where and how he is to end. And that is the complaint I make against the present judiciary system. I want to know, when I go to court, what its precedents have been and that it will adhere to such precedents. I want to have confidence in the judge, that when I cite a case which has been decided by that same court that its opinions will be received and respected as the law. As it is, as I have shown, the opinion of the court is not received or respected even by itself. I have not taken pains to look up the cases where the court has disagreed with the decisions in its own district. I can find a great many such cases, however, in the reports. In some cases it is very proper for the court to correct itself where it has made a mistake, or has not given the question the proper consideration. But this eternal fluctuation and conflict of law renders it unsafe for business men, and unsafe for counsel to advise their clients. If a counsel be honest he can only say: "I do not know what the law is, nor how your case will end. You must take your chances." That is the opinion every honest lawyer must give his clients. I want the law to be such that when I am called upon for my opinion, I can refer to some decision, or precedent established by the court, and say to my client, this is the law declared by the court itself, and will be adhered to by the court in the future.

Mr. M. H. LAWRENCE—Do I understand that the judges make the law?

Mr. BAKER—No, sir.

Mr. M. H. LAWRENCE—I thought legislative bodies only made laws.

Mr. BAKER—I have been talking about half an hour to show that lawyers and judges of the supreme court not only do not make the law, but do not know what the law is.

Mr. M. H. LAWRENCE—I would like to ask if it is possible to adopt any rule by which men will not construe laws differently?

Mr. BAKER—I will come to that in the course of my argument. I believe it was agreed that I should be let alone [laughter], but I will answer the gentleman's question now. If you create one supreme court the result, so far as the enunciation of decisions is concerned, would have this advantage over the present system: under the present system a full bench of the supreme court may be in session in two or more districts on the same day, as I believe they have been for many years past, since the present organization. The same precise question may be brought before those several courts on the same day, argued the same, and decided the same term, and in direct conflict with other, and yet any one can see that if the judges had been together, and had compared opinions, and taken a vote of the court, the similar cases must have been decided one way, and there could not have been two decisions from the necessity of the case. I do not undertake to say that the court at circuit would be any more apt to be right in its law. It is not within the province or power of this Convention to decide that question. There shall be but one law, and the people all over the State, the inferior magistrate and the business man would know what the law was for the time being. If the court of appeals promulgates a decision that is deemed bad law, or impolitic, every one knows that it is the business of the Legislature to provide such remedies as will cure the evil. I would inquire of any gentleman who believes in the multiplied and isolated courts, in these eight equal, independent supreme courts, how the Legislature can remedy such an evil as conflict of decisions? Upon the question of the admission or the exclusion of the opinions of a non-professional witness, two courts at general term have decided in one way, and two courts in general term have decided exactly the other way; the decisions were exactly in conflict. How can the Legislature remedy this evil? If the court of appeals, being a final court, had pronounced a judgment which was a finality, then the Legislature could correct the evil—it being done by the supreme court there is no remedy. But nobody ever having taken a case to the court of appeals involving these conflicting decisions, and the Legislature not being the proper tribunal to decide, the people are left without remedy in all cases where they cannot get the decision of the court of appeals. But I inquire how can you get there with the cases I have mentioned? You cannot get to the court of appeals with a case arising in a justice's court; you are at the end of the law when you get to the decision of the supreme court. Now there is another question. I had supposed that the question of the tenure of office, and of every accompanying question as to the manner and mode of appointing or electing judges, was disposed of. I have not participated in the debate on that question. Various gentlemen have given their opinions as to which would be the best mode of appointing our judges, or which mode would best conduce to the independence and stability of the court. Gentlemen may give opinions here—mere abstract opinions. If you give a judge a life tenure he is comparatively independent, and such a tenure will add to the dignity and character of the court, and perhaps, to its honesty. But this, after all, is not the question, it is a question of appointment; and I would inquire, does it not depend more upon the character of a man appointed than upon the mode of his appointment? We are not without examples, both in England and in this country, not without historical cases bearing upon this subject. I shall not undertake to review any remarks upon the manner of appointing judges in the English courts. The gentlemen who have preceded me have discussed that question more ably than I can do. But we have been appealed to, to compare that august tribunal, the supreme court of the United States, at Washington, with our own State courts, and to see if we could not derive an argument in favor of the appointment of judges by the Executive power for a life tenure from the character of the supreme court at Washington. It seems to me, so far as I have been able to study the history of the supreme court, at Washington, and the court of appeals of the State of New York, that the argument is entirely in favor of the mode in which we have appointed our judges. The late chief justice of the United States, it is conceded by politicians and by the legal profession, was a man of eminent ability. He was a man of powerful intellect, well cultivated, and nobody distrusted his ability as a judge; and yet we know that same judge, with the concurrence of a sectional portion of his court, a political section of his court, promulgated a political decision which had, perhaps, more than any other one thing to do in precipitating rebellion and insurrection upon this country, and involving the people of the United States in an amount of public debt and consequent taxation that is resting so heavily upon the resources, the labor and the commercial enterprise of this country, which will, as some say, rest upon it for a hundred years to come. That decision had more to do with the precipitation of this country into the rebellio and civil war than perhaps any other one thin and that political decision is a sample of judici independence and integrity. Now, although happen to differ with the recent chief justice c the court of appeals of the State of New York i politics (I refer to Judge Denio), and althoug he was elected by the people, elected b the democratic voters and some republican yet I am proud to say, upon and soon afte the rendition of the Dred Scott decision, Judg Denio wrote an opinion in the Lemon slav case, in which he declared the law of thi State to be different from what the advocates of the Dred Scott decision held it to be. For it wa held in the Dred Scott case, by Judge Taney, a a maxim, as a principle of law, to control in the Federal courts, and by being the supreme law of the land, to control the State judiciaries, that the Constitution of the United States recognized and protects property in slaves wherever that Constitution is the supreme law, and that any owner of property had a right to take his property into or through any State in the Union, and no one had a right to interfere with him; and it was argued and insisted upon by the claimant in the Lemon slave case that, under that clause in the Constitution of the United States which provides "that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," that, as a necessary consequence, and as a legitimate result of the decision in the Dred Scott case under the protective clause of the Constitution of the United States that Mr. Lemon had a right to take his slaves into or through the State of New York without molestation or interference, and without the emancipating effect of the statutes of this State. Still, Judge Denio pronounced the law of this State in accordance with and in affirmance of our statute on that subject, though his decision was certainly in opposition to the prevalent doctrine of his party, as I understood it then, and as I understand it now. Again, when the metropolitan police bill was brought before that court, the same judge sustained the constitutionality of that law, also in opposition to the principles and desires of his political party. But he could not be induced by political arguments to pervert the law or prostitute the court for political purposes. I am proud to compare, since we have been challenged to compare, the dignity, character and independence of the supreme court of the United States at Washington with the courts of the State of New York, though the judges of that court are appointed for life and of this State elected but for a limited term. I am proud to say that as a citizen of the State and as a republican in politics, I cannot find any fault with the decisions which Judge Denio or any other democratic judge has made in the State on the ground of supposed political bias. That a high and honorable sense of the dignity and true character of what the judicial department should be has pervaded our judiciary to a remarkable extent no one can truthfully deny, nor do I understand it to be the complaint of any class, party or person in the State to-day, or among any class or portion of the people of this State, that our court has ever been prostituted by the judges for political purposes or by political excitement. But that is more than we can say of the supreme court of the United States. And whilst I am now upon this subject of the independence of the judiciary as growing out of the manner and mode of their appointment, I desire to read the opinion of a distinguished statesman and politician of the State of Georgia on the subject of the independence of the United States supreme court. Some gentlemen take the ground that the supreme court of the United States never was considered a political court and never was said to have been prostituted by its judges for political purposes, but in answer let me for one moment read the opinion of that distinguished gentleman of Georgia, just before the secession of that State, when he appeared before the secession convention to tell them how it would involve not only the entire South but the United States in a desolating civil war which would not only involve the South in ruin, bloodshed and fraternal strife, but would cast upon this country a debt larger than any government of Europe labors under to-day. In that earnest and eloquent address he used the following remarkable language, which I will quote for the purpose of showing the opinion, the deliberately expressed opinion, of the Hon. Alexander H. Stephens as to the political character of the supreme court of the United States. After enumerating the blessings of the United States government as derived from and under the Constitution, and from practical operations and administration under the Constitution, from the organization of the government down to the time of secession and rebellion, he says:

"But again, gentlemen, what have we to gain by this proposed change of our relations to the general government? We have always had the control of it, and can yet if we remain in it and are as united as we have been. We have had a majority of the Presidents chosen from the South as well as the control and management of the most of those chosen from the North. We have had sixty years of southern Presidents to their twenty-four; thus controlling the executive department. So of the judges of the supreme court. We have had eighteen from the South, and but eleven from the North, although nearly four-fifths of the judicial business has arisen in the free States. Yet a majority of the court has always been from the South. This we have required so as to guard against an interpretation of the Constitution unfavorable to us."

Now, sir, I read these remarks, made by one of the ablest men in the South, if not in the United States, a man who had studied and watched over the political interests of the people of the South, from his boyhood until the day of secession and rebellion, a man who had wielded great influence in Southern politics for many years, a man who was familiar with the action of the Federal Government for many years, and who had studied its operations and its workings with reference to the benefits conferred by it upon the South, and had compared the advantages of the South under the Constitution with the disadvantages of remaining in the union, and whose fame was then upon the eve of passing an ordinance of secession. We have his opinion, and we have a right to claim the benefit of that opinion to-day, in argument against both the mode of appointment and tenure of office of the judges, because, so far as his political biases were concerned, his opinions would naturally be against the people of the North. It would be in the spirit and strain of complaint, reviewing the evils they, the people of the South, had suffered. We cannot presume that Mr. Stephens, upon that occasion, would have stated facts more strongly than the truth would bear against the South, and still he claims that they had had a majority of the judges in the supreme court selected from the South, where only one-fifth of the business arose, and "this they required so as to guard against any interpretation of the Constitution unfavorable to us." Now, I would inquire when and how, under our system, the court of appeals has ever been guilty of giving or pronouncing political decisions favorable to any particular political party or faction? I believe our democratic judges and our republican judges stand above the imputation or suspicion in any part or quarter of the State of New York, of any such sectional or political bias; and I will say the same of all the judges who have ever presided over the courts so far, at least, as the promulgation of political decisions is concerned. I am very glad that gentlemen have called our attention to and challenged a comparison of the courts at Washington with the courts of the State of New York. Now one word in respect to the allegations made by various gentlemen upon the floor of this house, that the business of the State of New York is so great that one supreme court cannot perform it. I have this to say, that if we shall construct but one supreme court, to consist of a competent and sufficient number of judges, and organize the court so that it cannot without stultifying itself, promulgate contradictory and conflicting law, by that simple organic arrangement, you will lessen the number of appeals to the court of appeals from thirty to fifty per cent the very first year such a court goes into operation. If you do that there will be no difficulty in organizing a court of appeals that can take the present calendar and decide all the cases now accumulated, together with the increasing business of the State. Mr. Chairman, I fear we shall find this to result from the article we have already passed upon in relation to the court of appeals. We shall find in this Capitol two independent tribunals sitting to decide cases which will and must necessarily conflict. I hold it to be just as inevitable as that daylight will follow the rising of the sun, that if you have two courts of last resort in operation with equal jurisdiction to decide upon the same class of questions, those courts will produce and promulgate conflicting law, and we will have to labor from ten to fifteen years, and perhaps twenty years, to get rid of the conflict and confusion of law. I trust the members of this Convention will live long enough, if that section is passed, to regret the day we adopted it. If we want uniformity, if we want stability, if we want a continuous consistency in the decisions promulgated by our courts, we must so constitute the courts as to produce that result, because I hold that an opposite result will follow from a different organization. It is useless for us to lay the blame upon one court or upon the other. Who will undertake to blame either of the supreme courts, that they promulgate conflicting decisions. Still the conflict is rendering every thing in business, in law, and in all the practical affairs and interests of society so uncertain that confidence in and respect for the judicial department of the government are absolutely destroyed. I am for getting rid of this uncertainty, this conflict of decision, and these perpetual fluctuations, and therefore I think we had better create one supreme court which can discharge all the duties which will be brought before it. It is objected that if you create one great court in the State called the supreme court, it cannot do all the business, and members of the profession in different parts of the State cannot all be accommodated in their several localities; that the supreme court will be located at Albany, or some other place, and that a few lawyers would monopolize all the business. I would combine the benefits of the system of 1846, in that respect, with the unity and oneness of the court. I would require the court, by law or by constitutional provision, to hold its sessions at such convenient places within the State as to accommodate the members of the profession and business communities in every county. I believe it could be done. I believe if you tinker up a court of appeals, consisting of two independent tribunals, promulgating a conflicting and different law, it will trouble us for years and years to come, and questions will have to be settled by the Legislature, which ought to be, and would be, under a proper system, decided by the courts, and we know what kind of a tribunal that is to settle law. If you create or continue the eight supreme courts, then the great difficulty which has been conceded by almost every member of this Convention who has preceded me, continues without remedy. We do not offer the people any relief, and how can we go home to our constituents and ask them to vote for a Constitution that we ourselves admit cannot effect the reform of the evils of which the people so justly complain?

Mr. SPENCER—Perhaps nothing further can be said to afford a better understanding of the several propositions now before the Committee. But I, nevertheless, ask the indulgence of the committee for a few moments. It would be extremely desirable, if it were practicable, for this Convention to recommend to the people a Constitution by which every party to a lawsuit might be successful. [Laughter.] Several of the gentlemen who have found fault with the present organization of the supreme court, have put it upon the ground, substantially, that under it they have been unfortunate in some of the litigations in which they were concerned. But, so long as there are to be two parties to a lawsuit, some one must always be unsuccessful, and the unsuccessful one will always find fault with the system, which, he claims, has been the cause of his failure. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the fault is in the organization of the court, or that the remedy for this state of things is in this Convention. I am inclined to oppose the plan proposed by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], in the first place, because it tends to that centraliza which was the great evil complained of un the system existing prior to 1846. It will not, deed, under the proposed plan, exist to the sa degree, but it will, nevertheless, exist. Gen men say that the Legislature will obviate t difficulty; but the plan proposed puts no restra upon the Legislature in that respect.

Mr. PRINDLE—Will the gentleman allow m Could we not adopt a provision that the judg should hold terms in the district as they now held?

Mr. SPENCER—All that may be done. I speaking simply of a plan as it is now proposed

Mr. PRINDLE—It was the intention to p them together in one section.

Mr. SPENCER—Many of the gentlemen wl have advocated this plan have advocated the lea ing of some latitude to the Legislature for t organization of the court. The Convention c 1846 undertook to obviate this evil of centraliz tion, and they proposed to have the general ter of the supreme court held in every county of th State. They proposed that the court of appeal should travel from one end of the State to th other, from east to west, from north to south and hold their courts in every part of the State The system was tried a few years and the judge found it so inconvenient that it was changed, and so far as the court of appeals was concerned, all the terms of the court were held at Albany, where the terms of the principal courts had always before been held. And in regard to the terms of the supreme court they were held in the centers of the several districts instead of being distributed around among the counties as was the intention of the framers of the Constitution of 1846. The gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] puts his proposition as a test to determine whether the Convention will sustain the principle of separating the duties appertaining to the trial of cases at circuit, and those of the law terms of the court. But I apprehend that he cannot have been acquainted with the complaints that were made of the system as it existed under the judiciary system prior to 1846. There was no complaint more loud, no complaint more universal than that the judges of the court who decided the cases were not familiar with the working and the practice of the trial, and therefore were not so competent to form an opinion and decide upon the questions that came before them, as if they had been practically acquainted with the proceedings of the circuits. It was a complaint that I have heard urged to courts and addressed to juries, and from the profession at large. And it was reiterated in the debates of the Convention of 1846, again and again; and the complaint prevailed to such an extent that the system was overturned. If this proposition is put forward as a test as to which of these systems shall be adopted, I trust that the members of this Convention will not hesitate long as to the one to which they will adhere. Now, a word as to the proposition which has been submitted by the Judiciary Committee. Before coming to that, however, I will add another suggestion in regard to the plan proposed by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. It is an experiment; no such plan has ever before ion proposed in this or any other State. It is impossible, from any experience we have had, or from any history with which we are acquainted, to determine what will be its practical working. It can only be a matter of mere conjecture. It is entirely uncertain whether the force which is proposed to detail for the holding of a general term to decide questions of law will be adequate for that purpose. It seems to me entirely clear that the proposition to delegate to two judges of the several districts the performance of circuit duties will be to devolve those duties upon an entirely inadequate force. The plan provides no remedy by which this force can be increased in either of the departments. It provides that there shall be twelve judges of the supreme court, who shall have appellate jurisdiction only. The phraseology is open to criticism, although this may be corrected.

Mr. FOLGER—Of what plan is the gentleman speaking.

Mr. SPENCER—Of the plan of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. The language of this proposition implies that all these twelve judges are in the aggregate to have appellate jurisdiction. But it still provides that three or more of them may hold court, but the Legislature may provide that they shall all be employed for that purpose. And you may, under the authority of the Legislature, have a second court of appeals of equal authority with the court of appeals which we have already established. But it is enough to say that this system is an untried experiment which would be dangerous and unsafe to adopt in the place of the one which has been tried and which has been found adequate to every emergency in which it has been placed. I now have a word or two to say in regard to the plan of the Judiciary Committee, and in regard to that the committee do not seem to be very well agreed among themselves. Of the whole number who joined in the majority report, seven, I believe, have addressed the committee upon the subject of several of the propositions now before it. Of those seven, one dissented entirely and has presented a plan of his own, which, being rejected, he now falls back upon the plan of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. Another member of the committee gives his adherence to the present organization of the supreme court. Another gentleman of the committee has given utterance to his eminently sound judgment and his superior common sense in favor of the present system, and, of the whole number, only four have given their unqualified adherence to the plan which is proposed by the majority of the committee. What is there in that plan which should commend it to this committee, or which should commend it to the people of the State, over that which is at present in existence? It only differs from the present plan of organization of the supreme court in providing that the judges shall be elected by two districts instead of by one, and in every other particular it leaves the court precisely where it is. The judges who are to be elected are to reside in the same districts, as now, and it only differs from the present plan in allowing the electors of one district to assist in the choice of judges in another. But gentlemen say the Legislature will organize these all right. They will make the general terms so that the judges will be designated for holding that court, so as to avoid that conflict of decision of which my friend from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] has so much complained. The gentleman who proposed this will see that it can be as easily, as properly done under the present organization as under the one which he has proposed.

Mr. BAKER—Is the gentleman of opinion that I made a correct statement as to the conflict of decision?

Mr. SPENCER—Yes, sir. I have experienced something of the same trouble as the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker]. I have thought sometimes that I had a decision that sustained my case, and the court thought differently. I had to submit to go to a higher tribunal.

Mr. BAKER—I desire to ask the gentleman what he would do if he went to the last court and there found a conflict in decision?

Mr. SPENCER—Well, I do not know what I should do. I rather think I should submit if the case there were decided against me.

Mr. BAKER—I intended to ask what the gentleman would do in reorganizing a court to prevent these conflicts?

Mr. SPENCER—I would do precisely what we have done. We have organized a court of final resort, and it is there that all conflicting questions of law must be settled, so far as they can be settled by a human tribunal. I do not know that there is another State in the Union which has an intermediate court where appeals are had, where reviews are had of questions occurring at the trial, but as a general thing, in nearly if not quite every State in the Union, the question passes at once from the inferior court to the court of final resort. In Connecticut, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and in nearly if not quite every State in the Union there is no such thing as a supreme court and a court higher than that.

Mr. BAKER—In those States is there more than one court of last resort?

Mr. SPENCER—There is not, it is impossible in the nature of things.

Mr. BAKER—Then the gentlemen would provide one court of last resort?

Mr. SPENCER—What I said when I addressed this committee before was that the supreme court is an inferior court, and that, holding courts in different localities, these become local courts, and it is impossible to make any thing else of them. The supreme court of the fourth judicial district is as much a local court as the superior court of the city of New York, or the superior court of the city of Buffalo, and nothing in the world can divest it of that character, and therefore it is entirely impossible to have that unity and that uniformity of decision in the supreme court, unless you can have a single court, and composed of the same men, which shall decide all questions of law in it.

Mr. DALY—I refer the gentleman to the notes in the annotated copy of the Constitution, under article six, for a correction of his statement that there was no intermediate tribunal in the other States of the Union, analogous to our own court. He will find a classification of the different States where there are courts of appeals, or courts of this character, some of them by the same name, and some of them by the name of superior court, but all of them intermediate courts and subject to appellate jurisdiction, of the character of the court of appeals.

Mr. SPENCER—There are several.

Mr. DALY—There are a great many.

Mr. SPENCER—I stand corrected in that particular. But that does not affect the argument that these courts which are referred to are local courts. They possess no other character.

Mr. DALY—I refer the gentleman to courts of general jurisdiction, subject to an appellate tribunal, generally called courts of appeal, but sometimes by other names.

Mr. SPENCER—Will the gentleman mention in what States there are such courts?

Mr. DALY—It is a very long list.

Mr. SPENCER—A single one.

Mr. DALY—Delaware, Maryland.

Mr. SPENCER—It is not so, I believe, in the State of Pennsylvania, or Massachusetts, or Connecticut. Those are the States that I mentioned as instances; but if there are as many as the gentleman states, I have overlooked the fact.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Prindle, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 30 to 51.

Mr. DALY—I move that the committee do now rise and report progress.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Daly, and, on a division, it was declared carried by a vote of 50 to 39.

Whereupon the committee arose and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had instructed their Chairman to report that fact to the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. WAKEMAN—I move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from further consideration of the article, and that the same be referred to the Convention.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Wakeman, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 20 ayes—noes not counted.

The question recurred upon granting leave, and it was declared carried.

Mr. STRATTON—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion to adjourn, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 13, 1867.

The Convention met at ten o'clock A. M., pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Dr. WYCKOFF.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. GOULD—I ask leave of absence for Mr. L. W. Russell, of St. Lawrence until Tuesday morning next.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. GOULD—I ask leave of absence, also, for Mr. Mattice until Tuesday morning next.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. MERRITT, from the select committee appointed to confer with the authorities of the city of Albany relative to a hall for the use of the Convention, made the following report:

The committee appointed to confer with the authorities of the city of Albany, in relation to a suitable hall and accommodations for the use of this Convention after the meeting of the Legislature, would respectfully report: That they met a special committee of the common council of the city of Albany who offered them the choice of the following rooms: First, the common council chamber. This chamber is in the City Hall nearly opposite the Capitol. It is a room seventy-four feet long by thirty-two feet wide, with high arched ceilings, well lighted, and heated with furnaces, having convenient registers. Connected with this chamber are several smaller rooms which would answer for the post-office, library, cloak room and other conveniences. The mayor's room will also be placed at the disposal of the Convention. Second, the lecture room of the Agricultural Hall. This room is in the basement of said hall, and is sixty-four by thirty-four feet, with low ceiling and insufficient light. Third, Association Hall, which is near the foot of State street, in the third story, and is sixty-two by forty-two feet in dimensions. It has a gallery which will seat about two hundred persons, but is not well lighted. From the fact that Tweddle Hall could not be obtained for evening sessions of this Convention, your committee deemed it unnecessary to give it their consideration. While neither of the above-mentioned halls would afford as ample accommodations as we now enjoy, your committee are unanimous in the opinion that the accommodations which could be secured in the City Hall would be superior to any of the others offered; and sufficient for the business of this Convention. After a full examination of the subject referred, your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That this Convention hereby accepts the proposition of the city of Albany to fit up the common council chamber and other rooms in the City Hall for the use of this Convention, with chairs and desks, cloak closets, post-office and such other conveniences as may be required, without expense to the State, either for such fitting up, or for use, or for lighting and heating the same; and the Secretary of this Convention is hereby directed to confer with the committee of the common council having these matters in charge, in order to inform them what will be necessary to be done.

EDWIN A. MERRITT,
JAMES A. BELL,
WM. H. MORRIS,
Committee.

ALBANY, December 13, 1867.

Mr. MORRIS—Wishing to be consistent on the record, I desire to explain that I signed this report, accepting the test vote of yesterday as sufficiently indicating the intention of this Convention to remain in Albany. At the same time, I wish it to be understood that I reserve to myself the right to vote for an adjournment to New York, should that question again come up.

Mr. DEVELIN—I move to lay that report on the table.

Mr. MERRITT—I hope not, Mr. President.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Develin to lay on the table, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 39 to 50.

Mr. MERRITT—While the committee are not desirous of the adoption of this report now, it is important that some conclusion should be arrived at very soon, as it would take some time to prepare a room for our accommodation. As the vote taken yesterday showed a larger number of delegates present, than at any other time for the past few weeks, it seems to me proper that this important question should now be decided.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I move to postpone the consideration of this resolution until Tuesday, or perhaps Wednesday, of next week, until the resolutions now lying upon the table, looking to the appointment of committees to confer with the authorities of other cities upon this subject, shall be acted upon by the Convention one way or the other. Sir, the more I reflect upon the subject of our meeting here when the Legislature is in session, the more convinced I am of the inappropriateness of any such action. I do not believe that the public interest will be subserved either on the part of this Convention or on the part of the Legislature, if these two bodies hold their sessions at the same place and at the same time. The hall which the committee have selected certainly bears no appropriateness, in comparison with this hall, for the accommodation of this body, and I do not see any reason why we should be thrust from this hall into an inferior and more inconvenient place, or why we should be compelled to go to a place that is not one-half the size of the present Assembly chamber. I think it but fair on the part of the majority of this body to allow the minority at least to examine and report whether there is not some other place more accessible and more appropriate than can be found in the city of Albany for our deliberations. I think the majority can well afford to allow a committee of five, more or less, to examine and report whether there is not some place more appropriate and convenient than the one before us, which has been recommended by this select committee. I think, indeed, Mr. President, that the more we reflect upon this subject the more convinced we must all be that if we are to conclude our work in a becoming manner it is not advisable that the two bodies—this Convention and the Legislature—shall be in session here during this winter. I think I could give many other reasons for this view of the case, but as they would, perhaps, imply some reflections upon the one body or the other, I shall not now indulge in them, but leave them to suggest themselves to the members of the Convention. I appeal now to the sense of justice and magnanimity on the part of the majority of this body that they will allow this report to remain upon the table, or that the consideration of the report be postponed until some other committee can examine and report whether some more appropriate place can be found, and I therefore move you to postpone the consideration of the resolution until Wednesday next.

Mr. DEVELIN—If I understood the Secretary as he read that report, the room which the committee recommended us to accept is seventy-four feet long by thirty-four feet wide. Now, if gentlemen will for a moment reflect, they will see that it is utterly impossible for this Convention to sit in a room that is only seventy-four feet long by thirty-four feet wide. Its length is two feet less than the width of this room. Now, I submit whether this Convention can meet in a room of these dimensions? I say it is utterly impossible. The room which the committee recommended was designed for the meeting of the board of aldermen of the city of Albany, a small room utterly incapable of containing comfortably the number of gentlemen that compose this Convention. I do not understand the vote of yesterday as deciding that the Convention must continue to meet at Albany. One gentleman who voted against the resolution to go to New York, said expressly that he was in favor of a committee to inquire and examine in regard to the accommodations that could be obtained in other places, and so I have heard other gentlemen say. I hope, therefore, that this matter will be postponed at least long enough to let members go and look at this room and decide for themselves in regard to its appropriateness.

Mr. CURTIS—I hope the motion of my colleague [Mr. E. Brooks] will be adopted by the Convention. I certainly understood, in voting yesterday, that we were not concluded by that vote to remain in Albany. The scope of our action was that inquiry should be made as to where it was best that the Convention should continue its sessions. By the terms of the report this morning it is perfectly clear that none of the halls which have been inspected are exactly convenient for the meetings of this Convention. It seems to me, therefore, necessary that we should await the reports of the other committees which have been suggested, and then let the Convention itself make comparisons and decide. I hope that the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. E. Brooks] will prevail.

The PRESIDENT—The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. E. Brooks] to postpone the consideration of this resolution until Tuesday next. Gentlemen will please confine themselves strictly to the question of postponement.

Mr. BELL—Without going into any discussion of the propriety of meeting here or elsewhere after the convening of the Legislature, I would say that the committee of this body have been informed by the committee of the common council that it is important that an early decision be arrived at in order that they may put the room in proper condition for our sessions if the Convention decide to continue its sessions in Albany. In regard to the capacity of this room, I would say that, while the report contains as nearly as may be a correct statement of the length and breadth of the room, and while it may seem too small to accommodate this body, yet the committee were informed that it has frequently held three hundred persons. It is capable of seating one hundred and sixty members comfortably, and will leave ten feet in the rear and eight feet in front for desks and reporters' chairs. It is not as large and capacious a room as the committee would have selected had they had such a one at their disposal; but it is thought by the committee that this room will comfortably accommodate the members of the Convention. I do not know that a delay of a day or two will cause any material delay in our deliberations, and as a member of the committee I am not disposed to press the matter to a vote this morning, preferring allowing members an opportunity to examine the premises for themselves, come to their own conclusions, and so vote upon the matter.

Mr. DEVELIN—I will trouble the Convention just one moment longer. I have measured the room which the committee recommend. Its length is equal to the distance from this partition on my left to the window on my right, and its width is equal to the distance from the door behind me down to the fourth row of seats in front of me, that is all.

Mr. MERRITT—It will give the delegates as much room as is ordinarily allowed to each one in this chamber when the Legislature is in session. There can be comfortably seated in that hall two hundred persons. We have not now and seldom have had recently in this body over one hundred delegates at a time, so there will be considerable space left in the hall for the accommodation of the public. I am not anxious to press this matter to a vote now; but if it is to be postponed for any definite time, I insist that we shall take a vote upon it at the time indicated, and that time should not be later than Wednesday, as provided for in the motion of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks].

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I hope this postponement will not take place, and I appeal to the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], who has been here regularly since we met on the twelfth of November, that it will be unkind toward those gentlemen who have come here now for the first time in many weeks, and for the purpose of voting on this question, to compel them to attend again for the same purpose next week. [Laughter.] It is very pleasant to see their faces once more, but their attendance next week can but involve considerable expense and inconvenience on their part. [Laughter.]

Mr. DEVELIN—The gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] promised me yesterday that he would not tell that joke in Convention. [Laughter.]

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—No, I promised to rise in the Convention last night and denounce the gentleman from New York [Mr. Stratton] for adopting a course on his amendment which would bring about this result. [Laughter.] That occasion having passed by, I now make this appeal to the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks].

Mr. ROGERS—I move the previous question, and on that I call for the ayes and noes. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT—The previous question is not at all applicable in this case.

Mr. MORRIS—It does not seem to me that there is any necessity for immediate action upon this subject. A delay for two or three days will certainly effect no injury. For one I cannot see any impropriety in sending out two or three reconnoitering committees in order that we may ascertain what may be the best course for this Convention to pursue. For one I am in favor of this motion to postpone the consideration of this report until Tuesday or Wednesday next, as is suggested by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], in order that we may get all the information that it is in our power to obtain upon the subject. These committees, the Convention will understand, do not in any way bind us to any particular course of action. They are merely for the purpose of seeking information and reporting the same. It is very certain that we have got to leave this chamber, and the question is, where is it best for us to go? I am sure it would be very desirable to know whether we could be well accommodated in the city of New York in case we should make a flank movement upon that city. [Laughter.]

Mr. EVARTS—I do not know, Mr. President, but it is desirable that the sense of the Convention should be taken upon this question without much delay. In my own judgment, there is an inconceivable repugnance on the part of a great many members of this Convention, and on the best and most public reasons, to holding a session of the Convention in Albany during the sitting of the Legislature. I feel that repugnance myself. In my judgment, the labors of this Convention will be much jeoparded, in their promise of usefulness to this community, if the conclusion of our labors, and the final shaping of the Constitution, be had under such influences as will then prevail. If this Convention shall determine that for reasons either of personal convenience of members from the country, or hostility to the character and interests of the city of New York, or repugnace to the convenience of members residing in that part of the State, they shall exclude from choice that city, as their place of meeting, and shall determine that here is to be the place where the labors of the Convention are to be resumed and concluded, I hope the majority of the Convention will decide that our only solution of the difficulty will be to postpone the further session of this Convention until after the rising of the Legislature. If no other gentleman sees fit to do so, whenever it is determined that, by circumstances or by choice, we are held to Albany as the place of our session, I shall myself deem it necessary to ask the Convention to consider whether we had not better adjourn until the first Wednesday in May. Whether the Convention are ready for that alternative consideration now, or would be better prepared for it on next Wednesday, it is not for me to say; but I wish gentlemen to have it in their minds that, if it be determined that this is the only place where the Constitution can be made, there are many of us who think the only time that it can properly be made here, is after the rising of the Legislature, when we can resume possession of this hall.

Mr. AXTELL—With due respect to the gentle-gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Evarts], I think the insinuation comes with an ill grace from him, that the action of the majority of this body has been decided either by motives of personal convenience or hostility to the city of New York, or repugnance to the interests or convenience of delegates from that part of the State. I have listened with some degree of attention to what little discussion there has been on this subject—what little discussion has been allowed upon it—and I have not heard any member who has advocated the continuing of the sessions of the Convention in this city give as a reason that this would serve the personal convenience of the members from the country On the contrary, so far as I know, the action of the majority of this body has been decided by a regard to the public interests. So far as I know, it has been with us solely a question of public propriety and the public interests. We have thought that an adjournment to the city of New York might be used by an unscrupulous press against this body. Judging from the history of this body, and from the attitude of the press toward it, we have thought that an unscrupulous press might use the circumstance of an adjournment to New York city to detract from the character of the body and to damage its work before the people. We are quite certain that there can be no occasion for an unfair attack, merely on account of the fact that we remain in the city of Albany. We have looked at the matter in that light, and not in the light of our own private interests or convenience; and, therefore, I repeat, that for one, I think the insinuation comes with an ill grace from the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts].

Mr. EVARTS—If I have exhibited an "ill grace" in what I have said, it is a grace I have borrowed from my opponents in this matter. The subject has always come up in reference to the city of New York, and the members from New York and its neighborhood, their non-attendance here, and I find that those who are nearest to Albany are the most tenacious for keeping this as the place for the sessions of this Convention. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that if we sit here during the session of the Legislature it will be an imputation against our labors by a scrupulous press. What the "unscrupulous press," to which the learned gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Axtell] refers, is, I do not know; but a scrupulous press, a scrupulous public, and a scrupulous public opinion, will make it an imputation against us.

Mr. CURTIS—I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CURTIS—It is, with great deference, that the gentleman is not discussing the question before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] must confine his remarks to the question of postponement.

Mr. EVARTS—I pass then from that consideration. Now, sir, on the question of postponement. Those views which have been presented on the one side and on the other are applicable now, and on Wednesday next will be equally apposite. If this Convention are ready now to finally determine this matter, I have no objection, but I trust that if we at any time fix upon Albany as the place at which our sessions will be continued, we shall fix upon a day after the rising of the Legislature.

Mr. FRANCIS—I hope the motion for postponement will prevail, not with a view of favoring New York, or any other place in particular, but to enable members of this body to visit the City Hall, and judge for themselves with reference to the accommodations offered us there by the city of Albany.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. E. Brooks, to postpone the consideration of the report of the Special Committee, and it was declared carried.

Mr. MERRITT—I would state in connection with this matter, that some person will be present to show the rooms to any of the delegates who may desire to examine them.

Mr. MERRILL—I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That debate in Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on the Judiciary be limited to ten minutes to each speaker, no member to speak more than once on any proposition except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SILVESTER—I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Silvester to lay on the table, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 35 to 49.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move to amend by striking out "ten" before the word "minutes" and inserting "twenty."

Mr. PRINDLE—I move to amend by inserting the word "fifteen" before the word "minutes."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Prindle, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred on the resolution of Mr. Merrill as amended.

Mr. DUGANNE—I ask for a division of the question.

Mr. MERRILL—It seems to me that that will defeat the object of the resolution; all the gentleman will have to do in order to make an hour and a half speech is to resume his seat for a moment and then go on again. If there is an obvious propriety in any gentleman making such a speech I suppose there will be no difficulty in obtaining unanimous consent.

Mr. DUGANNE—I withdraw my call for a division.

Mr. BARTO—I renew the call for a division.

The question was then put on the first division of the resolution, limiting debate in Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on the Judiciary to ten minutes to each speaker, and it was declared carried.

The question was then put on the second division of the resolution, that in such debate no member should speak more than once upon any proposition, except by unanimous consent, and it was declared carried.

Mr. STRATTON—I call for the consideration of the resolution offered by me yesterday.

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to ascertain and report to this body what accommodations can be provided in the city of New York for the sessions of this Convention after the first day of January next.

Mr. STRATTON—I wish to amend the resolution by inserting after "New York," the words "without expense to the State," so that the resolution will read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to ascertain and report to this body what accommodations can be provided in the city of New York for the sessions of this Convention after the first day of January next, without expense to the State.

Mr. GRAVES—Is a substitute in order?

The PRESIDENT—A substitute is in order.

Mr. GRAVES—Then I offer the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourns for vacation it adjourn to meet at this place on the first Tuesday in May next.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this is a proper time to consider this matter.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a point of order—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair anticipates the point of order [laughter]; that this amendment is not germane to the original resolution?

Mr. ALVORD—Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MERRILL—I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Merrill to lay Mr. Stratton's resolution on the table, and it was declared lost.

Mr. DUGANNE—I call from the table the resolution that I offered yesterday, and offer it as an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Stratton].

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That two additional members be appointed upon the committee just raised, and that said committee be instructed to extend its inquiries to the city of New York, to communicate with the board of supervisors of that city thereon and report on the 18th instant.

Mr. BICKFORD—I am informed by the papers this morning that the city of New York is at this time wholly inaccessible. [Laughter.] It is therefore quite profitless to consider that resolution now, as there is no means of reaching that city, and it would be an imposition upon members to appoint them upon the committee called for by this resolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. E. BROOKS—If the gentleman will allow me I wish to inform him that he is wholly misinformed in regard to that matter.

Mr. DUGANNE—Has that committee, of which I spoke in my resolution as just raised, been discharged upon the report of this morning?

The PRESIDENT—It has not.

Mr. ALVORD—It seems to me entirely proper that inasmuch as the original proposition has been referred over until Wednesday next, this whole matter may very appropriately go over until that day. I therefore move that the consideration of this resolution be postponed until Wednesday next.

Mr STRATTON—My object in bringing it up this morning was that we might have a report from the committee contemplated by the resolution by next Wednesday, so that the Convention could then take their choice between the accommodations offered by Albany, and the accommodations offered by New York.

Mr. CURTIS—I think the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] defeats the conclusion to which the Convention had previously arrived. As I understood the proposition of my colleague from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], its object was, that on Wednesday next we might have a comparison of places and of views in regard to this matter.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord to postpone, and it was declared lost.

The question then recurred on the resolution of Mr. Duganne.

Mr. MORRIS—Is an amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT—An amendment is in order.

Mr. MORRIS—I would like to add at the close of the resolution under consideration the words: "or as soon thereafter as practicable."

Mr. DUGANNE—I accept the amendment.

Mr. COMSTOCK—What is the resolution to which this is an amendment?

The PRESIDENT—The resolution will be read and also the amendment.

The SECRETARY again read the resolution offered by Mr. Stratton yesterday, and also the substitute for it offered by Mr. Duganne.

Mr. COMSTOCK—If I understand the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Duganne], it refers to the committee which has reported this morning.

The PRESIDENT—It does.

Mr. McDONALD—I propose an amendment, that the committee be instructed to inquire elsewhere, in any other city.

The question was put upon the amendment of Mr. McDonald, and it was declared carried.

The question was put on the substitute offered by Mr. Duganne, and it was declared lost.

The question then recurred on the original resolution offered by Mr. Stratton.

Mr. McDONALD—I now offer the same amendment to the original resolution, that the committee be instructed to inquire elsewhere in any other city.

Mr. STRATTON—I accept that amendment.

Mr. ALVORD—I move another amendment to the resolution, "that there shall be a committee of five, three of whom shall be of the committee heretofore appointed upon this subject."

Mr. E. BROOKS—I submit that that proposition has just been rejected by the Convention. That is an indirect way of overruling the will of the majority of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] will please read his proposition.

Mr. ALVORD—It is, "that there shall be a committee of five, three of whom shall be of the committee heretofore appointed upon this subject."

The PRESIDENT—That is substantially the same proposition that has already been voted down.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I move the previous question upon the adoption of the pending resolution.

A sufficient number voting in the affirmative, the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was then put upon the resolution of Mr. Stratton as amended, and it was declared carried.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I offer the following resolution:

WHEREAS, Any provisions which can be adopted by this Convention for the suppression of bribery and corruption in legislative and State offices, if accepted by the people of the State, cannot take effect for a long time yet to come, and

WHEREAS, The offenses referred to are now so frequent as to produce alarm in the minds of all good citizens, and

WHEREAS, Except in rare instances there have been no adequate attempts to ferret out or punish offenses of this character, and

WHEREAS, The punishment of such offenses is a matter in which every portion of the State is equally concerned, therefore

Resolved, That the Legislature be and they are hereby respectfully requested to pass such needful and proper laws as shall provide for the payment by the State of all such necessary expenses as shall be incurred by any county in prosecutions for such offenses, and as shall secure the efficient aid of prosecuting officers in ferreting out and punishing the guilty.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I propose to debate the resolution.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman proposing to debate the resolution, it lies on the table under the rule.

Mr. GRAVES—Is it in order now to call up the resolution that I have already offered?

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman may call for the consideration of his resolution, and it may be considered by unanimous consent.

A DELEGATE—I object.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, the resolution goes over for the day.

Mr. CHURCH—I call for the consideration of the resolution that I offered yesterday.

The PRESIDENT—The Secretary will read the resolution:

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That this Convention will proceed to perfect the article on the judiciary, and provide for submitting the same to the people, and that the Convention will then adjourn, subject to be re-assembled by the Legislature for the purpose of completing its business, and such adjournment shall take place on the 20th day of December, instant, at twelve o'clock M., unless the article on the judiciary shall be sooner perfected.

Mr CHURCH—I only desire to say a word or two upon this subject. It seems to me that the time has arrived when we should make some disposition of the labors of this Convention with a view to its adjournment, permanently or otherwise. I am not tenacious as to the form of the action which this Convention may take on this subject. The resolution which I offer contemplates the perfection of the article upon the judiciary and the submission of that article to the people. So much we provide for certainly. I make this provision because I regard that subject as the most important and necessary of any in relation to an amendment to the Constitution. There is more necessity for improvement in relation to the judiciary than any other subject, and, therefore, I do not propose to leave that subject to any uncertainty. As to all other matters connected with an amendment to the Constitution, I propose to leave it to the determination of the representatives of the people, who will soon assemble here. I would leave it for them to say whether this Convention shall re-assemble to complete its labors, presuming that the Legislature will reflect the wishes of the people on this subject. I have no objection to submitting any action which this Convention has already taken upon any subject other than the judiciary. While it would be very desirable for us to finish our labors, it seems to me it is important and proper to consider the surrounding circumstances in which we are now situated. The Legislature is about to convene. I regard it as open to serious objection that we should continue the labors of the Convention during the session of the Legislature for various reasons which must occur to the mind of any gentleman who has any experience in such matters. I agree entirely with the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts], which he made this morning. However desirable it may be for us to finish our labors and complete a Constitution to propose to the people, we must look the circumstances by which we are surrounded squarely in the face. We must accept the situation and determine our action accordingly. If gentlemen desire to adjourn the Convention to a day certain, to the first of May, or any other time, I am entirely content; but I do not believe it practicable for this Convention to continue its labors successfully during the session of the Legislature. Whether we take our papers and march over to the inconvenient council chamber in the city of Albany, or go down to the foot of State street in the third story of some building, or whether we take the Hudson River railroad to the city of New York, or anywhere else outside of the city of Albany, I do not believe that this Convention can successfully complete its labors outside of this Capitol. This is the place to hold the Convention, and the Convention, in my judgment, ought to be in session to complete its labors disconnected with the Legislature of the State. For these reasons I have offered this resolution. It seems to me now is the time when we ought to decide this question.

Mr. GRAVES—I now offer a resolution as an amendment to the resolution of Mr. Church.

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourns for vacation, that it adjourns to meet at this place on the first Tuesday in May next.

Mr. GRAVES—In offering this resolution, I do not intend by it to express the opinion that I am decidedly in favor of its provision, but rather to leave it for further consideration. It is quite evident that we are now laboring under some embarrassments in the attempt to provide a suitable place for our future deliberations. It is quite evident, too, that we shall have some difficulty in getting accommodations in this vicinity sufficiently commodious for the members of this Convention. To my mind there are some good reasons why we should adjourn this Convention until the Legislature has closed its session. Personally I desire the Convention to resume its labors and to reorganize at as early a day as is convenient. But there are some circumstances which induce me to believe that the public interest would be better served, that the Constitution which we make would meet the greater approbation of the people, by completing the work after the close of the Legislature. I can see some good reasons, without assigning them at this time, why it would be improper for us to be in session here while the Legislature is in session. I therefore introduce the resolution, that the opinion of this Convention may be ascertained distinctly to-day, whether we shall meet again in January, or procrastinate our session until May.

Mr. CURTIS—I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Wednesday next.

Mr. OPDYKE—I hope that motion will prevail. There seems to be a great propriety in considering all these propositions at the same time. I agree with my colleague from New York [Mr. Evarts], that it will be better to adjourn until the first of May, than to sit here at the same time the Legislature is in session. I think there are very grave objections to this. Besides, I believe the convenience of the members would be promoted by an adjournment to New York, and that we would accomplish our labors at an earlier period. I feel that it would be better for this Convention, better for the convenience of the members, and better for the public interest, if we could complete our labors this winter, rather than mortgage our time for another year. But, as I have already said, that cannot be done without continuing our session along with the session of the Legislature, in this small city, which will then be overcrowded, and where we will be exposed to the necessary collison which, in some respects, will take place between the two bodies. I therefore hold that it is better, if we cannot go to the city of New York, to adjourn over until May. I rose simply to say that there would be great propriety in considering all the various questions relating to this subject, at the same time on Wednesday next.

Mr. CHURCH—I am quite willing that this resolution should go over if desired.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Curtis, and it was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT announced the following committee under the resolution of Mr. Stratton, with reference to securing accommodations for the holding of the sessions of the Convention in the city of New York: Messrs. Stratton, Beadle, Flagler, A. R. Lawrence and More.

The Convention again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, of Cayuga, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer].

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

Amend section 6 by striking out all after the word "law," in line three, and insert the following:

SEC. 6. The State shall be divided into eight judicial districts, of which the city of New York shall be one, the others to be bounded by county lines, and to be compact and equal in population, as nearly as may be. There shall be four justices of the supreme court in each district, and as many more in the district composed of the city of New York as may be authorized by law. The present justices of the present supreme court shall be justices of the supreme court hereby established during the term for which they were respectively elected. Provision shall be made by law for the election of justices of the supreme court by the electors of the several judicial districts.

Mr. FULLER—I would suggest the propriety of striking out the latter part of this amendment, so as to present the question of the organization of the supreme court by itself, that we may have a vote upon it apart from any other proposition in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN—The object of the gentleman can be obtained by a division of the question.

Mr. SPENCER—I am disposed to accept that modification of the amendment proposed by myself. The arrangement of the body of the judiciary article proposed by the committee is such that the matter is disposed of in a form different from that presented by my amendment; and with a view to present the naked question of the continuance of the present organization of the supreme court, I provide for those subjects in a future section. I will consent to amend the proposition as suggested.

The proposition was so amended.

Mr. FOLGER—I will say a word or two, and only a word or two, in defense of the report of the committee so far as it relates to this question. The proposition of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] having been disposed of, the issue now seems to be squarely raised between the system proposed by the Judiciary Committee and the present arrangement of the supreme court as contained in the Constitution of 1846. The gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] is correct when he says that the difference between the two systems is small. I do not understand him to object to that difference which the Judiciary Committee proposes. I do not understand him to say that that is a defect and that it vitiates the proposed system. I have a right to infer, and do infer, that he considers it an improvement. If so, then it appears to me the argument ends here. If the system which we propose is identical with the system which now exists, with only one difference which makes in its favor, why does he offer a substitute for the one we propose? He must assent by his amendment that the present system is good, and if, then, in any part we propose to make it better, why not accept that which we propose? I agree with the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], that the difference between the two systems is small; but I conceive that difference is one of importance. The present supreme court is arranged so that the judges sit in eight separate districts. The Judiciary Committee proposes that they shall sit in four departments. The system of the Judiciary Committee further proposes that no judge shall sit in review of his own decision, and that the general terms shall be made up from two districts instead of one, and that the judges shall be elected by departments. There is nothing in the proposed system which is additional to that now existing in practice, but what may be obtained by legislation, except the single provision that the judges shall be elected by departments. The Legislature may say as to the present system of the supreme court, that no judge shall sit in review of the decision in which he has participated; they may say in reference to the present system of the supreme court, that the general term shall be made up from two adjoining districts: but the Legislature cannot say, in relation to the present system, that the judges shall be elected by departments. The gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke], the other day, queried why the members of the Judiciary Committee did not exhibit to the Convention the merits of the system which they propose. And perhaps, indeed, it was a sincere inquiry, and one naturally arising out of the circumstance of our remaining until of late silent, while this part of our system was under debate. And I now desire to satisfy that query by showing how, in one particular, in my opinion, the system proposed by the standing committee has merit. The difference, as I said, is small. It has been to some extent explained, but this one feature has not met with the consideration of the Convention, that is, that these judges shall be elected by departments. This is the feature of it which persuaded me to give my vote in committee for this system in preference to the existing system of the supreme court. Let us see how that is a benefit. Let us suppose a community in this State which is the focal point of business and the wealth of the State, where great and varied interests accumulate and intensify. Let us suppose such a community to be mainly of one political cast. Let us suppose that political preference to be exercised with great intensity and uniformity, and some times, we may say, without much reflection. Let us suppose that the party having that preference shall grow to number its majority by thousands and tens of thousands, and then we have a community where, if a person secures a party nomination, he is almost certain of an election by sheer party strength. Let us suppose a community where a person has been nominated for judge of a high court, whose alleged character and reputation were such that, when the ticket upon which he was running succeeded by forty or fifty thousand, he himself only succeeded because of that reputation and character by some eight hundred majority. Can we not also suppose that if that community had introduced into it or added to it some other element of reflection or care or solicitude as to the character of the judiciary in the State or those elements in greater degree, that the result would have been different and that the eight hundred majority would have been overcome? If a person is nominated, the allegations against whose character appear to be so well founded as that his own party hold back to the extent of thousands and tens of thousands from supporting him, and if near the community from which he is nominated lies a long island, and that near it are rural districts, lying along a great river, would not those outlying, these rural districts, if they should be given a chance, express their opinion as to the fitness of such a nominee?—and can we not see that one cause of complaint against our judicial system would be lacking? This is why I gave my consent to the division of the State into four departments. That was one reason. You enlarge by such means the constituency of the judges. You give greater chance for the selection of candidates, greater chance for an element to be introduced into the ballot-box, of deliberation, and care, and solicitude, and intelligence. Hence I conceive that this feature of an election by departments makes a very important difference, although it looks small upon paper. A very important difference, and one which will work out great advantages in the selection of a judge of the supreme court. The other differences between the existing system and that proposed by the Judiciary Committee the Legislature may provide for. It may provide for a general term from two districts now as well as they can under the system of the Judiciary Committee. They may provide for no judge sitting in review of a decision in which he participated, as well now as under the system reported. Then comes up the very objection, and indeed the sole objection, I have heard urged in this Convention with any force, against the present system of the supreme court, which is the contrariety of decision, and which was stated so forcibly and exhaustively last evening by the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker]. Now, as to that, let me say that humanity is always bounded by two forces. One is what it desires and the other is what it can achieve. Undoubtedly we all desire that there should be uniformity and exact uniformity in the annunciation of what is the law of the land. But can we always achieve that? I conceive that we cannot always achieve it, for there will be contrariety of decision at times even in a single court. There will be in a single court assertions of what is law and here will be reversals of those assertions. It would undoubtedly be a great thing if in this State there should be no contrariety in the opinion of the courts as to what is the law of the land. But there must be a balancing of evil. We must so hold the scale that we can put it upon an equipoise or as near that as possible, and get the greatest good with the least evil. Does the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] suppose the bar of this State would accept a return in our judicial system to one supreme court holding a single term? I think they would not; I know they would not. I need not reiterate the argument of the gentleman from Rensselear [Mr. M. I. Townsend] which was advanced the other day as to the views of the bar upon the question, of the improvement of the present system of holding courts over that from 1822

Digitized by Google

to 1846 and the advantage, of the interest, of a client in that respect. The bar of this State would never consent to a single supreme court holding its terms in a single place. I do not know even if there should be consent that it would be practicable. I believe that this week there are sitting in this State perhaps as many as sixteen special terms. Would the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] consent that all this business be done at one place? Consider that it is a business which, from its nature, cannot be postponed from month to month and be heard, determined all at one time, and once a year. It must be decided immediately, almost upon the instant, of the motion, and there must be opportunity for motion to be made almost immediately. Let one conceive the business of these sixteen special terms centered at Albany, or at any other one place. Either there must be an inroad of attorneys here, which would frighten the good people of Albany (for they must come from all parts of the State to attend to their business), or there must be the old system of agents here to do the business which comes from all over the State. And from that and the consequent practice, I say, and the bar will say, "Good Lord, deliver us." I remember of one instance in my own practice, before the present system began, where my brief, sent to Albany to able counsel, was returned unopened, with a curt remark indorsed upon it that the law was well settled against me, and referring to a decision, which reference showed that the counsel had never read the brief and did not know what was the point involved, and not because the counsel to whom I sent my papers did not mean honestly to attend to my case, but because he was overwhelmed with business and had not time to attend to that which I sent him. I am induced to believe that we cannot attain the establishment of a single supreme court in the State. We must take the next best. We must balance the difficulties and the inconvenience and the impossibilities of a single supreme court, or a single term of that court, with the evils of a contrariety of decisions, and strike the balance as near as we can. We have made an advance in this respect by saying that instead of eight general terms there shall be four. By our plan, the plan of the Standing Committee, if carried out, the Legislature will draw together four general terms from the eight districts, which, I think, will make a good and satisfactory general term, and which will at least diminish by one half, the liability to contrariety of decision, and secure so far, uniformity and reliability.

Mr. LUDINGTON—How much would the reorganization of the State into four departments lessen the conflict of decisions, from what they would be if the eight districts were continued?

Mr. FOLGER—I think Daboll will answer that query. If eight general terms make one hundred conflicting decisions, I suppose four would make but fifty.

Mr. LUDINGTON—Would not the four departments be required to decide as many cases in the aggregate as all the eight judicial districts?

Mr. FOLGER—I suppose that they would. But I suppose that each general term would adhere to the precedents set by itself. And that thus there would be, by one-half, more uniformity, under a system of four general terms, than under a system of eight general terms.

Mr. POND—Did not the gentleman say just now that the same court sometimes reversed its own decisions? How does he provide against a repetition of that by a system of four departments?

Mr. FOLGER—That is inseparable from any court. You see it under any system to a greater or less extent.

Mr. POND—Has the gentleman made allowance for that in his Daboll illustration?

Mr. FOLGER—I have not made allowance because arithmetic makes no allowance for the same man changing his own mind and has no rule for that case. [Laughter.] That is inseparable from any court; the court of appeals is a single court, and yet it at times reverses or explains and modifies its decisions, very much to the disgust, undoubtedly, of the gentleman [Mr. Pond] himself. I conceive that if one supreme court would achieve uniformity of decision, or make any considerable approach to it, then, by as much as we diminish the distance between eight supreme courts and one supreme court, we advance so far toward uniformity of decision. It must be so.

Mr. FULLER—I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If the judges are to be elected by departments, and there is to be but one general term, what is the use of dividing each department into two districts?

The CHAIRMAN—The time of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] has expired.

Mr. SEAVER—The gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] has not addressed the committee on this subject. I move that he has unanimous consent to continue his remarks.

Mr. FOLGER—I propose to adhere to the rule.

Mr. COMSTOCK—In answer to the question of the gentleman from Monroe [Mr. Fuller], I shall move to strike out so much of the article, if it be excepted by to this committee. I think myself it is an excrescence on the article.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Spencer, and it was declared lost,

Mr. COOKE—I propose to introduce the substitute I intimated yesterday in my remarks.

The SECRETARY read the sections as follows:

SEC. —. There shall be a supreme court to consist of not less than nine justices. General terms shall be held by not less than three justices, to be designated according to law. The supreme court shall have original, general jurisdiction and the same appellate jurisdiction as has heretofore been vested in the supreme court of this State.

SEC. —. The State shall be divided into a convenient number of circuits, not less than fourteen, in each of which there shall be a circuit judge, who shall possess the powers of a justice of the supreme court in the trial of issues of fact and of law, the hearing and decision of motions, and in criminal cases, and at chambers; provided, that no county shall be divided in the formation of circuits. Provision may be made by law for one or more additional circuit judges in the city and county of New York.

Mr. COOKE—I desire to say that this plan contemplates that the justices who sit in banc shall be elected upon the general ticket, and it leaves it to the Legislature to increase the number as necessity shall require. It further contemplates that the Legislature shall provide for the holding of terms around through the State at different points as in a manner stated by me yesterday.

Mr. HALE—The gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] who last addressed us, said he had heard but one objection raised to the present system, and that was the contrariety of decisions. I wish to appeal to him and to all the members on this floor whether there is not another great evil which results from the present system, and which will result from the adoption of the principle recommended by the majority of the committee—that is, the power of the judges in certain localities to absolutely control the interests of those localities without any adequate remedy. The gentleman in advocating the plan of election proposed by the majority of the committee alluded to certain localities of the State. I think it just as well to call them by name as by geographical description. I will take the first district, the city of New York. There is a city of great population, a city which has immense interests, and where the judges, as a matter of necessity, have immense power. I do not desire to say any thing against the judges who are there now. Many of them I know to be men of integrity. But suppose that under the influences which sometimes control that city, judges get into power who are not honest; that a majority of the judges upon the supreme court bench, in the city of New York should not have the qualifications of integrity, of learning, and ability which are necessary to fit them for that position. What is there in this system proposed by the majority of the committee which gives the slightest relief from the power which they may exercise over that community? Now, it is said that joining two districts in a department gives that remedy. I ask this committee whether, instead of remedying the matter, it does not extend the evil; whether it does not extend the power of the influences that control the city of New York over the whole of the second district, embracing the island and river counties. It seems to me there is but one remedy for this evil. Every lawyer knows that there is an immense number of cases coming before the judges at special term which are appealable to the general term, but are not appealable to the court of appeals. We know there are many, multitudes of orders which cannot be carried to the court of appeals for review which involve immense interests, by which the property and liberty of the citizens of the State are affected. If we elect an appellate tribunal by the people of the State at large, we put them beyond the reach of local influences, either in New York or anywhere else. If decisions in a particular locality are wrong, and influenced by improper considerations, the evil will be limited, because the large mass of orders which are appealable only to the general term, may be reviewed by judges elected by the people of the State at large. This would break up this system of localization, or of "rings," as it is sometimes called. And for these reasons I favor any proposition which looks to the election by the electors of the State at large, of an appellate bench of the supreme court.

Mr. PIERREPONT—The danger which the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] seems to suppose may exist in this State, and which particularly he seems to imagine may exist in the first district, the district of New York, he will not find, I apprehend, to be entertained by any gentleman from that city. He will find from the city of New York, in this Convention, gentlemen of both political parties, and I fully believe that no gentleman in this Convention, from either political party will say that he believes that, if the judges in the city of New York were elected to hold their places until the age of seventy years, there would be the slightest danger of any of those evils which he supposes; not the slightest. The moment you place a man in a judicial position, and he understands that he is independent, and that he is placed there until the age of seventy years, he becomes abundantly conservative. That is the tendency, that is the experience of the world. The judges of the city of New York, as any gentleman will find, if he examines the subject, have performed labors which have been truly colossal. They have been gentlemen who have not been well rewarded for their time, but as a rule they have satisfied the community, who have felt that justice has been done. Now, the apprehension that when you have placed men upon the bench, and given them a position in the supreme court to the age of seventy years, they will have so much power as to trample upon and destroy the liberties or the rights of the people, is not entertained, I undertake to say, by any gentleman in the city of New York. Our experience has not thus far been of the kind to awaken any such fear. And it will be found, if we undertake to have a supreme court in the modes suggested, that the great size of the State will make it impossible, as was stated by the gentleman who took his seat a short time ago, and as the chairman of the Judiciary Committee remarked, to organize such a court, to send all briefs back to the lawyers duly noticed. It will be found that they will be returned as was his, unopened; the duties of the counsel will not have been performed and the rights of the client will not have been attended to. I think that any one who has observed the course already adopted in this Convention, would have been led to suppose that the city of New York was somehow or other accursed by a judiciary which was imperilling the rights of the people there. But yet when you have heard gentlemen of both political parties speaking upon this subject, you have not discovered that they felt any such alarm. The alarm seems to have been felt outside of the city of New York, and the fear is entertained by those upon whom no evils could fall arising out of any system in that city. It will be time enough to be alarmed about the condition of the city of New York when you shall find a gentleman from New York who shall arise here and awaken your fears about the danger of the judges of the city of New York doing injustice to the citizens of that commonwealth. It is well known that there have been instances in the city of New York where the people have not been altogether satisfied. So has it been in other parts of the State. But when you take the whole together, and when it is all considered, and when you see it all, you will find that the judges in that city have done their duty; that they have acted with honor and fidelity, and have performed the most herculean labor of any judges who have sat upon the bench in any country in the world. The single question of the New Haven railroad alone was a case which in itself required more time, more labor, more research, more diligence, as much fidelity, and greater comprehension than any case that has been tried of which lawyers have any knowledge. And it was done in the city of New York to the satisfaction of the entire community, And other cases have been treated in the same way, and the people of the city have not felt any injustice from the labors of their judiciary. The complaints which are constantly heard of arise from a fear which, I repeat, is entertained outside of the city, not inside of it, and so far as I know of, not expressed by any member from that city.

Mr. COOKE—I desire to say a word simply in regard to this matter of holding special terms. This system does not contemplate that the justices of the supreme court shall hold special terms. The plan is that the judges in their districts shall hold special terms, and that they shall be kept constantly open.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Cooke, and it was declared lost.

Mr. McDONALD—I offer the following amendment to this section:

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the amendment as follows:

Strike out all after "the," in line three, and insert: "The State shall be divided into three departments, the first and second judicial districts to be the first department; third, fourth and fifth judicial districts the second department; sixth, seventh and eighth districts the third department. There shall be thirty-six judges, twelve in each department, four of whom shall reside in each judicial district. The Legislature shall have power to provide for an additional justice in each of said departments. The Legislature, after such enumeration of the inhabitants of the State, may redistrict the State in eight judicial districts and three judicial departments—the districts not to divide counties and the departments not to divide districts."

Mr. McDONALD—The only change that is proposed by this amendment, as will be seen, is to reduce the departments from four to three, and leave the districts as they are. I only offer it in order to accomplish what is desired by this Convention with the least possible change upon the present method and the present organization of the courts. The whole argument has been gone over, and with this statement I submit it to the committee for their approval, on the ground that it is believed that three departments will do the business, and thus get rid of this uncertainty of decision.

Mr. YOUNG—I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does he propose in his amendment that the judges be elected, as they now are in the districts?

Mr. McDONALD—There is no proposition in regard to the election in the amendment, as there is nothing of the kind in the proposition which it is proposed to amend.

Mr. YOUNG—There appears to be a chronic disease in this Convention which exhibits itself in the desire to have the State divided into large districts. But I have been unable to discover any reason for it. The report of the Committee on the Organization of the Legislature proposed to divide the State into eight senatorial districts. And here, again, we have the same thing repeated in dividing the State into four judicial departments. I am at a loss to understand why there is such a longing desire for this great reform of making large districts in this State, unless it shall be that, in the future, we shall not have an opportunity of knowing any thing about the character, the ability and judicial standing of the candidates for whom we are to vote. Now, so far as I am concerned, I am well suited with the present organization of the supreme court; and no amendment, or plan, or report, has been suggested here which, in my judgment, will be any improvement upon the present system. At any rate, we, living in the third judicial district, are well suited with our judges, with the organization of the district, and with the tenure of office, and we desire no change. I do not see why gentlemen here are solicitous of having us united with another district, so that we shall have to travel as far again to attend the general terms, and will not be enabled to know as much of the character of the men for whom we are to vote for judges as we can now know as our district is at present constituted. It appears to me that from seven to nine counties make a district large enough.

Mr. McDONALD—It is proposed by this plan to require four judges to reside in each department of the general terms. The object of the plan is simply to continue the present system as near as we can, at the same time getting rid of this contrariety of decisions.

Mr. YOUNG—The object is to have three places for holding the general terms.

Mr. McDONALD—Not at all; they are held in every district.

Mr. YOUNG—Instead of traveling eight, ten or fifteen miles to attend general terms, we must travel a hundred or one hundred and fifty miles. Is that what the gentleman wants?

Mr. McDONALD—The gentleman misunderstands. The idea is to have the general terms held, as they are now held, in every district, to get the districts as they are now, except that there will be three separate general terms, and that they will go from one district to another, so the people will be accommodated as they are now.

Mr. YOUNG—Then the gentleman proposes to have a migratory court—a traveling court. I am not convinced by the gentleman that it is any improvement upon the present system. I now propose to say a word in regard to the judiciary of the city and county of New York. There has been a good deal of fault found, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] stated, about the judges of that city and county. But I apprehend that the fault comes from the "outs," who are eternally clamoring about those who are in power. It is a disease with which the American people are infected, always to be finding fault with the party in power. Consequently, the party in the city and county of New York who are out of power, and who see no way of ever getting in power, are continually clamoring about those who are elected by the dominant party and who are likely to continue to occupy their position. I have been in New York, in attendance upon the courts, as much as any place out of my immediate county. And I state that, in my opinion, the judges of New York city compare favorably in honesty, in candor, uprightness and ability with the judges in any other part of this State. One of those judges who has been pointed out here by some gentlemen of this Convention, I have been acquainted with ever since he arrived at the age of manhood, and I believe the charges made against him are erroneous and unfounded. I believe him to be an upright and honest judge. Now, I will say a word or two in regard to the conflict of decisions so much complained of by gentlemen on this floor, to avoid which, it is proposed to divide this State into four judicial departments, and to continue the superior court of the city and county of New York, and the court of common pleas in the city and county of New York, and the superior court of the city of Buffalo—with which you have seven different courts under your proposed plan, all of which hold general terms, from which appeals are taken directly to the court of appeals. The decisions of these seven different courts, held at different times, and in different parts of the State, will be as likely to conflict as the decisions of the eleven different courts which exist under the present system. Some gentlemen have stated that three of these courts are local courts; but I ask you what security you have, or what assurances you have that the four courts which you are organizing—the four branches of the supreme court, will make decisions which will not conflict with each other? What assurance have you that the decisions of the supreme court and the decisions of the court of common pleas of New York city, and the decisions of the superior courts of New York and Buffalo will not conflict? And I ask where is the remedy you propose against those conflicting decisions in this report? It is impossible, in my judgment, to organize a court which is not a court of last resort, but an intermediate court between the circuit and the court of appeals, which will not make conflicting decisions, and which will make decisions entirely reliable. It is not in the nature of things. Gentlemen have mentioned a number of instances where there have been conflicting decisions between the several judicial districts of this State. Now suppose we had but one court, and had but one decision upon any one point, and that decision was wrong but was nevertheless relied upon. Would not it be infinitely worse than if we had two conflicting decisions upon the same point?—because every lawyer then would have his own opinion in regard to the question of law involved in those conflicting decisions. But if there was but one decision, and that decision was wrong, the profession and the community generally would follow that decision, and be misled by it, until the decision was corrected by the court of appeals. I say it would be better to have conflicting decisions in the supreme court, upon doubtful and difficult points of law, than to have one single decision which might be erroneous, as was the case in the decision involving the constitutionality of the law prohibiting cattle from running at large on the public highways of this State, passed by the Legislature in 1862. That case is reported in 44 Barbour, and holds that that law is constitutional. The profession generally, and the people, acted upon that decision because there was no conflicting decision made by any other court. Yet the court of appeals decided that law unconstitutional, and the Legislature at its last session, considered it necessary to amend it, and to pass an act creating a bar against action for damages, which could be brought by those who had their cattle taken up on the highway and sold. We must take into consideration that since 1846 the courts of this State have had to settle the law of an entirely new system of practice. In construing the Code they could not resort to the decisions of England, or any other country for light or authority. They had to settle the cases upon principle and depend upon their own judgments; the only light afforded them was the arguments of counsel. There have been many new reformatory acts passed since that time, the construction of which involved many very difficult and perplexing questions of law. The constitutionality of most of these acts originated in these inferior courts, and there could be no light afforded by the decision of the courts of other countries. And taking all these things into consideration, I do not think our reported cases deserve the censure which has been heaped upon them by gentlemen of this Convention. We should take into consideration another fact, that there has been a great competition among bookmakers. The publishers of our reports have been anxious to get every decision in their power. They have reported special term decisions, and county court decisions, and I believe there is one decision in Howard's Practice Reports of a justice of the peace. A reward has been offered for the decision of every judge who could be induced to write out an opinion upon any point, whether it involved a new question of law or not; and consequently our reports have become trashy. I deny that these reports are not used and cited as authority in other States. I have traveled through many of the Western, and over the Eastern States, and in almost every lawyer's library that contained reports at all, I have found the reports of the State of New York in connection with the reports of their own State, which lawyers deemed necessary to have in addition to elementary works.

Mr. DALY—I beg leave to state that my remarks were limited to one class of reports—Barbour's reports. They have had less weight out of the State than any other. I adhere to that opinion; it is the result of very considerable experience.

Digitized by Google

Mr. YOUNG—I will agree with the gentleman that Barbour's reports have less weight in other States than the reports of the court of appeals. But I have seen in the law libraries of Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Minnesota, Iowa, Connecticut and Vermont all the reports of this State, including the gentleman's [Mr. Daly's] own reports; and I have heard them cited as authority by counsel arguing cases in the appellate courts of most of those States, and cited as authority by the judges. The State of New York has given the law to almost every State in the Union. She is the mother of the law of this country. I am well suited with the present organization of the supreme court, and I believe the people generally are well suited. I have heard no complaint except in this Convention. The great source of complaint among the people was in respect to the court of appeals, not but what it was a good court, not but what its decisions were good law, not but what its judges were upright and honest and competent men, but that it was incapable of disposing of the business before it.

Here the gavel fell, the gentleman's time having expired.

Mr. COMSTOCK—If the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. McDonald] only involved the question of three departments of the State, or four, I might vote for it; but it presents a proposition which will prevent my sustaining it. If the amendment shall be voted down I will myself, if no one else does, present to the committee the single question whether the departments shall be three or four, so that may be voted upon by itself.

Mr. CHURCH—I offer the following amendment:

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

After "departments" in the eleventh line, of section 6, page 5, insert as follows:

"At the first election of justices of the supreme court, no elector shall vote for more than six of the ten judges in the first department, and five of the eight justices in the other departments."

Mr. CHURCH—I do not intend to take up the time of the committee in any extended remarks upon this proposition. It will be seen that it presents the principle of having minorities represented in our courts, and I regard it as of very great importance. It is well known to every gentleman of this Convention that there has been great apprehension among the people that the elective State judiciary would in time degenerate the character of our courts. That apprehension is still felt very extensively among the people of this State. Large numbers of the people regard the system as of doubtful utility. But this Convention, by the action which they have already taken, and the expressions which they have already made upon this subject, are not disposed to change the elective system of the judiciary. I believe, sir, that this minority principle will remedy many, if not all the evils, which we apprehend may result to the system by a continuance of electing judges. I believe it will tend to elevate the courts of this State, and improve the character of the judges. It will inspire emulation in the different parties to present for the office of judge their very best and most capable men. And when they are elected it will induce on the part of the courts themselves a greater spirit of fairness and of independence in the discharge of their duties. And after a good deal of reflection upon this subject, I believe that no provision can be made which would tend to elevate the character of our courts so much as this minority principle in the amendment I propose to incorporate in this section, and for that reason I trust that the committee will adopt it.

Mr. EVARTS—I rise not for the purpose of debating, much less of opposing the proposition, but to suggest to the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church] and to the committee, that it would be quite as well that this subject should be considered in connection with another subject which will undoubtedly be brought to the notice of and pressed upon the attention of the Convention, as to the manner of filling the first bench, to wit: whether the judges now in office shall be retained until the expiration of their respective terms. Both these topics could properly be postponed until we reach the tenth section of our report, which provides for filling vacancies in the office of judge, and in connection with which the manner in which the first bench shall be filled can be taken up. I would rather go on with what concerns the frame-work of the court before taking up that question.

Mr. CHURCH—I have no objection to accepting the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts]. I would inquire of him whether he considers it consistent with the minority principle to continue the present judges in office?

Mr. EVARTS—It is not; but I would say that we should consider this question in connection with that other proposition which we know to be in the minds of many of the Convention. I would say this much, that I have a very strong inclination to support the plan of those who would fill the vacancies, if to be filled at all, by this method of representation of minorities, rather than by political conventions, although the Convention knows that I am wholly opposed to the general principle of a minority representation. I now, however, desire that we shall not be retarded and pushed aside in the tenor of our course in the framing of the courts by this question of the manner in which the first bench shall be filled.

Mr. CHURCH—I will withdraw the amendment for the present, at the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts].

Mr. COMSTOCK—I said I would move and I now move to strike out the last sentence of this section: "One-half of the justices in each department shall reside in each district of such department at the time of their election."

It is in the plan of the Committee on the Judiciary, and it is the main feature of their plan in organizing the supreme court to make the justices by departments, in four departments. It is also in their plan that the courts in banc, or as we call them, the general terms, shall exist and operate by departments to be organized with a chief justice of the department, with a power in the Legislature to provide for assigning associate judges in those courts of review. These are the two main features in the plan of the committee, and from the votes which have been taken in this body, I judge upon good grounds, I think that we are about to adopt the substantial features of that plan. That being so, I do not see the function of these districts. They seem to have no useful office or function in the plan of the Judiciary Committee. Certainly I do not intend to convey the idea that these appellate courts—the courts in banc within the supreme court—are not to be held at all convenient places in the State which may be appointed by the judges, or may be required by the Legislature, so as to suit the convenience of the bar and of the public. That can be done without districts. You do not want the organization of the State into districts for any such purpose as that. This part which I propose to strike out is wholly impracticable, and I think impossible in practice. You say by this that one-half of the justices of each department shall reside in each of the two districts of the department at the time of their election. Political parties will nominate their judges undoubtedly with reference to that clause of the Constitution if it be retained. They will nominate eight judges in a department, four being located by residence in each district; but it depends entirely upon the will of the electors where they shall reside at the time of their election; and when you come to count the votes you may find that five or even six of them who have the highest number of votes are residing in one of those two districts. I think this clause discharges no useful purpose in the plan and will be wholly impracticable to be carried out; and I therefore move to strike out that feature in the report.

Mr. BECKWITH—I trust that it will not be stricken out, and I will give the reasons why I think it should not. If the gentleman resided in my neighborhood and knew the inconvenience which those of the profession sustain in consequence of the location of the judges at a great distance from our places of business, I think he would not be in favor of it. Much of the business now done in the supreme court is done at special term, and the special terms are now held as often as twice a month by each judge at chambers, when not sitting at the circuit or in general term. A great proportion of this business is done in that way. It is very often necessary to obtain orders that cannot be obtained except from a supreme court judge. Take my district: suppose they should elect them all in the third district; then I should have, in order to obtain an order, to come to Albany or Troy to obtain a single order and to do my special term business.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Let me make a single suggestion. I think the profession and the people will take care of their own convenience in the election and location of their judges.

Mr. BECKWITH—I think they should be compelled to locate four in each judicial district, as the State is now divided, for the convenience of suitors and the profession. It would be the means of saving a great deal of expense to both the suitors and the profession to have them thus located. I have suffered this inconvenience myself. I have had a party come to me in a very important case to appear and put in a defense in a suit. He came to me within a day or two before the time to answer had expired. The county judge had been his counsel or was absent from the neighborhood, and I, being unable to reach a judge to obtain an extension of the time to answer, have been obliged to put in a formal answer, and then obtain leave to amend it. If we had these judges elected all in one particular locality, it would be doing the profession and the litigants a great injustice and cause great inconvenience and expense.

Mr. KINNEY—I would like to ask the gentleman the question, if he can secure that equal division of the judges in each district unless they are elected by districts? and if that can, by any possibility, be secured by electing by departments?

Mr. BECKWITH—It is provided they shall be elected by departments; but the report also provides that one-half shall come from each district; that is, four from each judicial district; and the majority have no right to elect them all from one district. Then it may result in an election by a plurality vote, as in the case where there are three tickets running for the same office. Four of those running in one district will be elected, and four of those residing in another will be elected, although they may not have a majority of all the votes. It should be so organized as to bring about this result; otherwise, you cause great inconvenience to suitors, and great expense to attorneys. This provision, I think, would force parties to select their best men. It is certainly very inconvenient for persons residing in districts remote from a judge to travel one hundred and fifty miles to obtain orders, which will be likely to happen if the judges are elected by departments and be not obliged to locate part of them in each district. I hope the clause will not be stricken out.

Mr. WAKEMAN—I would like to inquire why the electors in a district may not have the privilege of selecting among the entire candidates in the district. By the report of the committee we would not have that power, or if we have the power, the result would be, it would amount to nothing; for, although we can vote for eight candidates, we are obliged to vote for four in a particular locality. There is an impropriety—an incongruity in this. We must remember that this is the judiciary, and why not give the elector the privilege of selecting from the entire district the best men he can find on either side. The point we are trying to arrive at, is to give the people a chance to scrutinize as between candidates. If I find in a single district that one party has put up a man of unsuitable character by reason of any party machinery, and the other party has put up a fair, good man, although he does not happen to reside in my particular locality, I cannot have the privilege of voting for him. The result is that we would be confined almost absolutely and entirely to party nominations. Now, I do not desire it should be so. I want to compel parties, in the first place, to put up their very best men, and if, perchance, they fail to do so, to give the electors of the district the power to vote for any number of men they think proper up to the number of eight, whether they may reside in the particular locality or not. Then you place every judge before the electors and the scrutiny of the entire district. I hope, for these reasons, and others, that the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] will prevail.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] will not prevail. I do not believe that the judiciary of the State should be established upon the principle that a tyro in a grocery thought he was to spell the word "coffee." He collected all the hard letters and combinations he could find and succeeded in spelling it "kauphy," [laughter] thus avoiding any letter contained in the original word. I do not believe that the judiciary will be any better for throwing burdens upon the profession and making it difficult to carry on the business of the law and to attend to the interests of suitors. Under the present system, in my own district, we have four judges. One of these judges is located at Troy, another at Albany, two more of them are located at Hudson. The judge at the city of Troy holds a perpetual special term. His special term accommodates not only the lawyers of the county of Rensselaer, but all the lawyers of that vicinity, for the transaction of all the business that shall properly be done at a special term. Another of the judges, Judge Peckham, resides at Albany, and although his special term is not perpetual, yet he is easily accessible at the city of Albany to those persons who wish to transact business. I want to know if there is any necessity for our adopting a system of things that will take all these judges, if a majority of the electors of the third and fourth districts so vote, and carry them to the fourth judicial district? Is there any public good to be obtained by it? Is there any benefit to be obtained in so modifying this proposition as to take these judges out of the district? Or suppose, on the contrary, that the two judges now residing at Hudson were removed to the fourth district; the people living in the lower part of this judicial district would be compelled to come over to Albany or Troy, or go farther and fare worse, before they could reach a judge to transact any special term business. It is but creating difficulty. It is but imposing burdens and labor upon the legal profession and expense upon the suitors. Now, certainly this feature, of all others, is one that ought not to be destroyed. If we get up to this enlarged plan, we might expect that the judge would be good enough, being elected by two districts, and yet the provision says that four judges shall reside in each of the districts of the departments that shall be made. It seems to me it is putting an unnecessary burden on the suitors, and therefore think we should not adopt it.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move to amend by striking out all after the words "by law," in the third line of section 6, and inserting—

The CHAIRMAN—An amendment, to be in order, must be germane to the motion now pending. There is a motion now pending from the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], and the amendment proposed is evidently not germane.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock, and it was declared lost.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move to strike out all of the sixth section after the words "by law," in the third line, and insert in place thereof section 4, of article 6, of the present Constitution, down to the word "population," near the close of it—as follows:

"The State shall be divided into eight judicial districts, of which the city of New York shall be one; the others to be bounded by county lines and to be compact and equal in population as nearly as may be. There shall be four justices of the supreme court in each district, and as many more in the district composed of the city of New York as may from time to time be authorized by law, but not to exceed in the whole such number, in proportion to its population, as shall be in conformity with the number of such judges in the residue of the State in proportion to its population."

I desire to say, in relation to the proposed amendment, that in my judgment, (and I believe that judgment is fortified by the experience of this State for all time), that half a million of people, and that the business of half a million of people in the judicial districts of the State outside of the city of the city of New York, affords business enough for four judges—affords a constituency large enough for the election of judges of the supreme court, and that it is not a public benefit to increase those districts by doubling them in population and business, and that we shall best subserve the public interest by continuing substantially the present system of the supreme court. And I do not believe that any of the evils, or any of the supposed evils, that may have existed, or may be supposed to exist, in the State of New York, are of sufficient importance to justify such a departure from the present system as is proposed. I think they are abundantly competent in this State, to take care of their own interests.

Mr. FOLGER—Is not that the same motion that was made by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer]?

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair will ask the gentleman to point out wherein it differs from that of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer].

Mr. E. A. BROWN—The amendment of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] seems to have provided for a continuance of the present justices in office.

Mr. SPENCER—That we are through now.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair understands that the question was taken distinctly on every thing in the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] which is not in the amendment of the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown].

Mr. SPENCER—It has been suggested to me by several of the members of the Convention that, either from want of attention or a want of understanding, the proposition, at the time the vote was taken upon my amendment, there was not a fair expression of the opinion of the committee upon it; and, if in order, I move to reconsider the vote by which my amendment was lost.

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair will first dispose of the question which was raised.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—Does my friend from Steuben consider my amendment substantially the same as his?

Mr. SPENCER—I understand it to be.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair holds the amendment of the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown] to be out of order. The question is, therefore, on the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] was lost.

Mr. SPENCER—I ask to have the amendment read, and to have a count in taking the vote.

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

Amend section 6 by striking out all after the word "law," in line three, and insert the following:

SEC. 6. The State shall be divided into eight judicial districts, of which the city of New York shall be one; the others to be bounded by county lines, and to be compact and equal in population, as nearly as may be. There shall be four justices of the supreme court in each district, and as many more in any district as may be authorized by law. The justices of the present supreme court shall be justices of the supreme court hereby established during the term for which they were respectively elected. Provision shall be made by law for the election of justices of the supreme court by the electors of the several judicial districts.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I would like to ask the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] this question: Is not this amendment precisely the same as it now exists in the Constitution? If it is, why not state it so, and let us know what we are voting on?

Mr. YOUNG—I do not know whether it will be in order for me now to finish the remarks I had to make or not.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Young] is in order upon the question now pending.

Mr. YOUNG—I was about to remark that I could not see any fault to find with the present system. My colleague [Mr. Cooke] gave as one reason that causes were frequently sworn off, because litigants thought that the judge who was about to hold the circuit was favorable to the attorney upon the other side, and that they would swear off the cause in order to bring it before another judge at another circuit. I would much prefer even this course of procedure to having litigants compelled to try a cause before a judge who had his pet lawyers in the county; and if the system recommended by some, of having a circuit judge to hold courts in two or more counties was adopted, I think that that judge would be more likely to have his pet lawyers in those two or three counties, than if he were compelled to hold his courts in seven, eight or nine different counties, as the districts are now divided, and not in any one county perhaps more than once in each year. The courts are now held throughout the State, so that it is very convenient, not only to the profession but to the people who are litigating, with special terms in every county. Judges are so located that it is convenient for almost every lawyer in the State to do chamber business, and so far as dispatch of business is concerned, I know of no general term in this State where the calendar is not gone through with regularly; and if an appeal is brought two months before the general term is held, it can almost invariably be disposed of at the general term. Of course I am opposed, and I presume every member of this committee is opposed, to having a judge sit in review of his own decisions. I have known that to be the case not only at general term but in the court of appeals. I have known causes to be tried at the circuit before a judge, with the same judge to sit in review of his own decision at the general term; and when the cause was to be heard at the court of appeals, the same judge was there advocating his own opinion on the bench. This, of course, is wrong, and it can be obviated by an amendment without materially altering the present system.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be on the motion of Mr. Spencer to reconsider.

Mr. GRAVES—I desire to ask the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] how far his amendment differs from the present mode organizing that court?

Mr. SPENCER—The amendment differs in this: that it authorizes the Legislature to provide an additional judge in any district, while the present Constitution only authorizes it in the first district. If the vote shall be reconsidered I propose, in accordance with a suggestion that has been made, to accept an amendment making the provision strictly as it is in the present Constitution, and confine that increase to the first district alone.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Spencer to reconsider, and, on a division, it was found that no quorum had voted, there being 35 ayes, 38 noes.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair is of opinion that there is no quorum in the house. The vote will be taken again, and gentlemen present will please vote.

The question was again put upon the motion to reconsider and it was declared lost, by a vote of 45 to 48.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—The amendment that I offered, on hearing the amendment of Mr. Spencer read, seems to be different. The distinction was pointed out by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer]. The amendments are not identical.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A Brown] offers the amendment previously offered by him. It is precisely the provision of the present Constitution.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. E. A. Brown, and, on a division, it was declared lost, ayes 21, noes not counted.

Mr. BAKER—I move to insert in the fifth line, after the word "departments," the words "having an equal population as near as may be."

Mr. COOKE—I would suggest that the gentleman also put in the words "composed of contiguous territory."

Mr. BAKER—I accept of that. If it is in order, I will propose a further amendment: to strike out, in the fourteenth line, after the word "department," the words, "at the time of their election." If there is any propriety in requiring a judge to reside in the district at the time of his election, there is a propriety in his being in the district after his election.

The question was put on the first proposition of the amendment offered by Mr. Baker, and it was declared lost.

The CHAIRMAN then stated the question to be upon the second proposition of the amendment offered by Mr. Baker, to strike out the words "at the time of their election."

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I think that if the provision contained in that clause of this section be left as it would stand after the striking out of these words, it would probably lead to this result, that the judges might be elected from any portion of the district, and that the clause in reference to half of them should reside in each district would be merely directory. It would be directory to eight judges. There would be no designation as to which of the eight should reside in the district, and that, in a word, the result which the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] desires, and in which I concur with him, could not be accomplished. I propose, as a substitute for his amendment, to add to the section these words: "and during their term of office." My friend from Montgomery [Mr. Baker], I understand, accepts it.

Mr. BAKER—I accept of that.

Mr. FOLGER—I think that this amendment had better be postponed until the amendment which is designed to be offered by the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church] is voted upon; because, if the minority of the electors are to have the right to choose certain of the judges, it might complicate all this question.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I think that no difficulty can arise in that way. Electors, when they meet for the purpose of making their nominations, will be admonished that this result must occur, and they must make their nominations accordingly.

Mr. FOLGER—Take the sixth and seventh districts. Nominations are to be made by parties; no doubt about that. One party meets and nominates four in the sixth and four in the seventh. Another party meets and nominates four in the sixth and four in the seventh. Now comes in the provision that the minority shall elect some of them. Who is to have the highest vote of the minority? Who knows whether it will elect six out of the eight in the seventh district, or six out of the eight in the sixth district? Then your provision that they shall reside "at the time of their election" will be inoperative. Therefore I think it had better be postponed until that question is disposed of, then we can frame something to meet the views of the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker].

Mr. BECKWITH—The sixth section does not provide that the judges of the supreme court shall be elected at all. The second section provides that the judges of the court of appeals shall be elected. This section does not provide that they shall be elected by departments or otherwise. It does not necessarily follow that they are to be elected by departments. They may still be elected by districts, all of them.

Mr. FOLGER—I would state that the sixteenth section does provide that they shall be elected by departments. I move that this amendment be postponed for the present.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

Mr. GRAVES—I would like to know what condition the section is now in, so far as relates to amendments.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair will state that it is in its original condition, as reported by the committee.

Mr. YOUNG—I move to amend by striking out the word "four," in the fifth line of the eighth section, and inserting "eight;" also striking out the word "and" in the fifth line, the whole of the sixth line, and the seventh line to the word "lines."

Mr. FOLGER—I rise to a point of order. That is substantially the amendment of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], which has already been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair must hold the point of order well taken.

Mr. BAKER—If it is in order, I desire to propose the following substitute for the sixth section:

The SECRETARY read the substitute as follows:

SEC. —. There shall be a supreme court vested with general, original and appellate jurisdiction in law and equity, subject to such appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeals as may be prescribed by law. Said supreme court shall consist of a chief justice, to be elected by the electors of the State at large, who shall hold his office for the term of twelve years, and of the justices to be elected in each of the eight judicial districts hereinafter mentioned. The Legislature, as soon as practicable after the adoption of this Constitution, shall divide the State into eight judicial districts, of which the city of New York shall be one, and each of the other seven districts to be bounded by county lines, and to be composed of contiguous and compact territory, having an equal population as near as may be. There shall be four justices of said court elected in each of said eight districts by the electors therein, and as many more in the district composed of the city of New York as may from time to time be authorized by law, but not to exceed in the whole such number, in proportion to its population, as shall be in conformity with the number of such judges in the residue of the State in proportion to its population. The justices first to be so elected in such districts shall be classified so that one of the justices of each district shall go out of office at the end of every three years, and after the expiration of their terms under such classification, the term of their office shall be twelve years. The chief justice of said court and the justice in each of said districts having the shortest time to serve, shall constitute the court to hold the general terms thereof, at such times and places as may be designated by law. The justices of said court other than those required to hold the general terms thereof shall be the justices for holding the circuit courts, special

...s of the supreme court, and to preside in the ...rts of oyer and terminer, to be held in the ...al counties of this State. Provided said ...f justice or any of the justices of said court ...ll attain the age of seventy-five years before ...e end of his term, he shall cease to hold his ...ice longer than the first day of January next ...er he shall so arrive at the age of seventy-five ...rs.

Mr. BAKER—The plan proposed by me is consistent with the views that I have expressed on this floor from the beginning—that we ought to have but one supreme court, and at the same time preserves another principle insisted upon by many delegates in the Convention, that the judges holding the general terms should also be familiar with the circuit and special term business and practice; providing that the judge who has the shortest term to serve shall constitute a part of the supreme court, with a chief judge to be elected by the electors at large, and all the other judges to be elected by the electors of the several districts, as now elected. I am aware that this proposition will not receive much support in this Convention, but I propose it now in committee, for the purpose of calling the ayes and noes upon it when we come into Convention at the proper time. As I remarked last night, I believe we shall all see the time when we shall regret having divided up or consented the division of the supreme court. Now, in answer to the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], who referred to some remarks made by me last evening. He assumes in his argument in favor of continuing a divided court, that the business will remain in the future as it has been in the past—will remain in amount and quantity the same. My theory is that by reconstituting and reorganizing a supreme court which will promulgate a consistent and uniform law, it will diminish the amount of business that will go before that court, and it is with that view that I propose this amendment. I believe that the Legislature can provide for the court holding its terms in the several counties and localities in this State to accommodate the legal profession and the business of the State. There is hardly a county in the State now, in which people cannot travel by railroad. It is very different now from what it was twenty years ago when the Constitution of 1846 was adopted, when it was difficult getting about the State. The facilities for traveling have increased, and it is just as convenient now for the profession in the fourth district to attend a general term in Albany as it is in Schenectady or Saratoga. There is no difficulty about lawyers in any county of the State going to any other county, and the court may bring the business home to the different parts of the State by holding their terms in the different parts of the State to accommodate the profession and the business, so that the system of having but one court will not re-establish that monopoly of the business which has been so much deprecated by the delegates in this Convention, and which led to the overthrow of the old system in the adoption of the Constitution of 1846.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Baker, and it was declared lost.

The SECRETARY then proceeded to read section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. Provision shall be made by law for designating from time to time the justices who shall hold the general terms, and also for designating from their number a chief justice of each department, who shall act as such during his continuance in office. Four of the said judges shall be designated to hold the general term, and three thereof shall form a quorum. And any one or more of said judges may hold special terms, and circuit courts, and any one of them may preside in courts of oyer and terminer in any county.

Mr. SMITH—I move to amend by adding:

"But no justice of said court, except the chief justice, shall sit at general term in the district in which he has been elected."

The purpose of this amendment will be seen at a glance. It provides that no judge, except the chief justice, shall sit at general term in the district in which he was elected. The design of it is to organize a general term in such a way that the judges cannot by any possibility sit in review of their own decisions, nor in any way influence those decisions. This whole subject has been sufficiently ventilated, and I will not, therefore, occupy any time in the discussion of it, but I trust that the amendment will be received favorably by the friends of the majority report, because it is not, in any way, as I understand it, hostile to that report.

Mr. EVARTS—The object of this amendment, as stated by the mover of it, is one which has, as he says, been discussed, but it is difficult for one to see how the method that he proposes accomplishes that object, and it certainly sacrifices some most important considerations. His provision requires that the general term in every district should always be held by foreign judges, as I understand it. That is so, is it not?

Mr. SMITH—That would be the result of the amendment, substantially.

Mr. EVARTS—Always to be held by foreign judges?

Mr. SMITH—With the exception of the chief justice.

Mr. EVARTS—That requires, to begin with, that all the judges should go from their homes and cross the line of their respective districts. That is a very great evil and a very great inconvenience. Then he refers to them as justices in the districts in which they have been elected. They are elected by a department. It is only as a place of residence that the district plays any part in this system.

Mr. SMITH—The language ought to be "departments," if it is not. The intention was to exclude them from sitting at general term in the department in which they were elected, and not the districts.

Mr. EVARTS—That shifts them, then, all from one department into another, whenever there is to be a general term. That is still more of a migration. That disposes perhaps of a criticism that I was about to make while it stood "districts;" and that is, unless the amendment proceeded to provide that no judge should hold a special term or a circuit except in the district where he resides, it would not secure this object of different judges for review from the judges of original jurisdiction, because these judges within the department certainly may, and are expected to hold circuits and special terms in either district within their department as convenience may dictate; and it is within the competency of the system, and is so intended to be, that judges shall be capable of holding circuits and special terms all over the State as the convenience of the public may require; so that it is difficult to see how this provision does secure the object at which it aims. If it did secure it in a fuller degree than the report of the committee accomplishes it, it would only do so at a sacrifice which I am sure the profession, the judiciary and the community, would never be ready to submit to, that is, requiring all general terms to be held, at all times, by judges foreign to the district, or the department in which they sit.

Digitized by Google

Mr. SMITH—Can I make further remark?

The CHAIRMAN—By unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH—I am exceedingly anxious that this majority report should be made acceptable; but it has seemed to me from the first that there was a failure in the organization of the general term. I do not see that it provides at all, substantially, against the difficulty of which so much complaint has been made. Judges are not effectually excluded from sitting in review of their own decisions; the organization of the general term is left to the Legislature, and for aught we know that body will never make such provisions as are needed. The clause or provision which says that no judge shall sit in review of his own decision, as was very clearly shown by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke], the other day, in his remarks, is a delusion. It amounts to very little. These men sit at general term; a cause comes up, and one of the judges says to his brethren, "I tried this case below; I cannot sit," and he stands aside. Another cause comes up, and another judge says, "I tried this case below: I cannot sit," and he stands aside. They may or may not listen to the argument; and when the judges come together for consultation, as was truly said, they may use their influence in sustaining the decisions which they made in the court below, and yet not have the benefit of the arguments which were addressed to the court in favor of reversing those decisions. This would be worse than the present system. I do not see that there is any great hardship in requiring a judge to go into a different department. Under the proposed amendment, the general term would be composed of judges drawn from other departments; and under this arrangement there could be no possibility of judges sitting in review of their own decisions. Why, then, object to it? The committee may insist upon pressing their scheme through in all its details, thrusting it down people's throats whether they will or no; but it seems to me, that is not the best mode of arriving at a conclusion that will command the approbation and support of the people. I trust, therefore, that in these matters of detail that are not in antagonism to the general features of the plan presented by the committee, they will consent that modification may be made; because this is not the end of the matter. We have got to present this Constitution to the people, and meet the practical difficulties that exist. Difficulties do exist, and will be felt when our work is submitted to the people; and although I may not possess the ability of the learned gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts], I am capable of understanding what the people in the country say, and what they think; and I do not deem it either wise or prudent to disregard public sentiment.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I think, Mr. Chairman, that we may carry our suspicions in regard to the judiciary of the State to an undue extent. The suspicion is pretty general that human nature, working in the minds of our judges, will render them strongly prejudiced at general term in favor of the conclusion which they have formed at the special term or at the circuit. I do not think that it is a well-grounded suspicion, in the minds either of members of this Convention or in the minds of the people of the State at large, that judges, acting under the solemnity of their oaths, lobby through their own opinions to any extent in this State; or, if a single judge should be found willing to thus step out of the line of his duty in office, I do not believe that the suspicion generally prevails that the three judges who sit and hear and decide the cause, upon the solemnity of their oaths (and upon what is equally binding upon them, the desire to keep the integrity of their own character before the State, which is the strongest motive almost that can operate upon the human mind), will suffer themselves to have that decision lobbied through: I do not believe there is that feeling; I do not believe that there is any necessity of creating differences in our judicial system to meet that part of the case. I often occurs, as judges have been previously lawyers in the case that comes before the court, that the judge finds himself, at the general term, incompetent to sit in consequence of having been consulted upon one side or the other. Did the suspicion ever enter the mind of any gentleman that a judge who had been counsel in a case before he came upon the bench lobbied with judges who heard the argument to carry through the cause in which he had been engaged as counsel and in which he originally had the feeling of a counsel, and in regard to which, undoubtedly, that feeling has not yet left him? It seems to me that we are carrying this notion of suspicion too far, and that we may prejudice the judiciary, prejudice public opinion, and prejudice the interest of the State, if we carry it further than there is reasonable ground to carry it. If there is reasonable ground, I certainly would vote for any proposition which would prevent it. It seems to me that we should not consider that the judiciary of this State, selected carefully and bound by the most solemn oath and the most solemn responsibility to do their duty will be influenced by one who has made a decision in that case, to vary the conclusion which they would otherwise come to in the consideration or disposition of the question at the general term.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Smith, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HALE—I move to amend by striking out all after the word "office," in the fifth line, and the whole of the sixth line, except the last word and inserting instead these words: "four justices in each department shall be designated to hold general terms. Three of them shall form a quorum, and the justices so designated may sit at general term in any district except as the Legislature may otherwise provide." My object in presenting this amendment is this: as the section reads now, I think it is doubtful whether these four justices (the word should be "justices" in all cases, but in this section by mistake the word "judges" is retained) designated to hold the general term would not be confined to their own department; whether the Legislature would have any power to provide for the interchanging of the justices among the departments. Now, if we are to have this system, as this committee seems to have determined, I think we should make it as flexible as is compatible with the preservation of the system, and give the Legislature power to provide that these judges may sit in different parts of the State, and also power to hold a State term if it shall be deemed best. Perhaps it might not be wise to require this in the Constitution, but it might be tried as an experiment by a legislative act, which could be repealed if found to work badly.

Digitized by Google

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Hale, and it was declared carried.

Mr. COOKE—I propose to amend the section by striking out all after the word "quorum" or rather all after the amendment just adopted. It is unnecessary to make that provision in this Constitution. The Legislature have full power to organize courts under the provision as it will stand without this clause. Again this clause may operate inconveniently. It may be that the Legislature will think it advisable to designate the judges either within the department or without the department who shall hold the circuit court. It may be necessary to give the Legislature power in order to carry out the spirit of the ninth section to control the whole matter of the holding of circuits and special terms, so as to prevent what the Convention is attempting to prevent, the sitting of a judge in review of his own decisions. As I understand this clause that I ask to have stricken out, it forbids the Legislature any power to provide for a case of this kind. It authorizes any judge to go anywhere in any county in the State to hold circuit without any reference to whether it will naturally, in the ordinary course of business, make him a member of a court that is to pass upon an appeal from his own decisions or not. I think it is better to leave it in the power of the Legislature to make provisions to remedy any such evil as was apprehended by the Convention when they adopted section 9.

Mr. FOLGER—I would merely state that that is a provision of the present Constitution copied directly from it, and I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. EVARTS—I take it that, although the object proposed by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] is all very well, yet the office of this clause of the section is to guard against any construction or conclusion that the justices in any one department were shut up to judicial duty within that department. I suppose that is the whole object of this clause. As the gentleman says, the Legislature arranges all these things; and this is merely to give competency to every justice, notwithstanding the division into departments, to serve as a justice of the supreme court in all parts of the State, and the regulations on this subject to be made by the Legislature. It is so now, and I suppose that that was the true object of this clause. Without this it might be argued that we had provided for judges in these departments that have no function outside of them.

Mr. ANDREWS—I am rather inclined to favor the amendment of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] for this reason. When we say by the Constitution that any judge may hold special terms and circuits anywhere in the State, I am afraid that we exclude the Legislature from the power to say that for a certain definite period the services of any judge shall be confined to the duties of the judge at general term or to the duties of the judge at circuit; preferring to leave this whole section to the control of the Legislature, so that the departments may be organized as shall be by them thought best. I am disposed, therefore, to favor the amendment.

Mr. EVARTS—If the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] will allow me, I will make a suggestion: that the points made out on both sides may be met by a modification of the clause in this wise, "and it shall be competent for any one or more of said judges to hold special terms and circuits, and to preside in courts of oyer and terminer in any county, as the Legislature may by law direct."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Cooke, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HALE—I would suggest that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] should move as an amendment the modification which he has just read.

Mr. EVARTS—I am willing to move that amendment.

Mr. COOKE—I would like to know whether the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] proposes to strike out this clause?

Mr. EVARTS—Yes, sir.

Mr. COOKE—Then the amendment will serve the purpose I have in view.

Mr. COMSTOCK—It seems to me that this whole subject is covered by the seventh section already adopted, to wit: that "the Legislature shall have the same power to alter and regulate the jurisdictions and proceedings in law and equity, as they have heretofore possessed."

Mr. COOKE—The gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] has suggested that the principle objection to striking out the clause altogether was that it might leave the Legislature to construe this section as confining the judges to their own departments. I had an idea that it would be better to simply say in this place instead of the language proposed to be stricken out "that nothing contained herein shall be construed to prevent any justice from holding court in any county of the State." I do not see any use in this provision, because it is not necessary to give the justices power to hold the court. They have that power without any constitutional and legislative provision, and therefore, I think, it would be better to strike out the clause, because that will abbreviate the section and the object will be answered without it.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I suppose the gentleman's purpose in that clause is to prescribe the function of the judge. The clause is copied from the old Constitution, and I am very well satisfied that it cannot be improved.

Mr. RATHBUN—I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts], and I hope it will prevail. These four judges may have, and, I have no doubt, will have a good deal of time upon their hands which will not be occupied in judicial labor. They will be able undoubtedly to devote a part of the time to the trial of causes and the holding of special terms. Now, adopt the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts], and they may be assigned by the Legislature to districts in which their services are needed, and they may aid in those departments where there is not sufficient force otherwise, to enable the business of the departments to be kept up promptly, and in holding courts of oyer and terminer. That duty will not interfere at all with their holding general terms in their own department, free from the objection that they are to pass upon decisions of their own, and it seems to me that it is perfectly proper to enable the Legislature to occupy the whole time of these judges, if necessary, in other departments, where their aid is needed, to keep up the business, and yet yield to the prevailing feeling that they ought not to review their own decisions. Upon this ground I am in favor of the amendment, and I think it is as near as this Convention can possibly come to the proper arrangement in this respect.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Evarts, and it was declared carried.

There being no further amendment offered, the SECRETARY read section 10.

Mr. COMSTOCK—A substitute for section 10 has already been adopted, and located as section 5 of this report. I now propose a section 10 to provide for vacancies in the supreme court.

The SECRETARY read the section proposed by Mr. Comstock, as follows:

SEC. 10. When a vacancy shall occur in the office of justice of the supreme court three months prior to a general election, the same shall be filled at such election, and until any vacancy can be so filled, the Governor, by the advice and consent of the Senate, if the Senate shall be in session, or, if not in session, the Governor alone may appoint to fill such vacancy. Any such appointment shall continue until the first day of January next after the election, at which the vacancy can be filled.

Mr. BICKFORD—I hope that will be amended by substituting "two" before the word "months" in place of "three." I move that amendment.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I would ask what length of time is provided for in section 5?

Mr. COMSTOCK — The same time — three months.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Bickford, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

There being no further amendment offere the SECRETARY read the eleventh section follows:

SEC. 11. At the general election in the ye 1870, there shall be submitted to the people, such manner as the Legislature shall provide law, to be determined by the electors of t State, the question: "Shall vacancies as the occur in the office of the judges and justic mentioned in sections 2, 6, and 15 of article V of the Constitution be filled by appointment?
And if the majority of all the electors voting such election shall vote that such vacancies sha be so filled, then thereafter all vacancies in th office of judge of the court of appeals, justice o the supreme court, judges of the superior court o the city of New York, and of the court of commo pleas for the city and county of New Yor and of the superior court of the city of Buffal shall be filled by the Governor, by and with th advice and consent of the Senate; or if the Sena is not in session, by the Governor, but in suc case the term of office shall expire at the end o the session of the Senate next after such appoin ment.

Mr. ANDREWS—I move to strike out "1870 in the first line, and substitute therefor "1873.

The question was put on the motion of M Andrews.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I demand a count.

Before the vote was announced—

Mr. HALE—If it is in order I would like t ask my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews what is the object of the postponement unt 1873.

Mr. ANDREWS—Why, it is very clear tha this Constitution is not to be adopted at as earl a day as was supposed when this report wa made, and if it shall not be adopted so as to tak effect before the first day of January, 1869, will leave the State without any experience o
the working of the system that we shall subst tute for the present one; and in my judgmen there should be time given so that from such ex perience the people of the State may be able t determine the question as to the best method o securing the selection of judges.

Mr. HALE—I would ask whether the post ponement for one year, until the year 187 would not cover all the delay that is required b the delay in the submission of the Constitutio to the people.

Mr. ANDREWS—I do not think it should b less than I have stated.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I am sure that the people o the State have had their experience under th elective system. I do not say now whether has been a fortunate or an unfortunate experienc
I express no opinion upon that point, but fo twenty years past we have lived under the elec tive judiciary system, and I think if we make provision to take the sense of the people on thi question at all at a general election, the sooner i can be done, the better. It may be that 1870 i a little too soon, for the Constitution may not b adopted at as early a day as was anticipated whe that year was mentioned. If the gentlema would say 1871 or 1872 I would be glad to co cur with him in his amendment.

Mr. EVARTS—1872 is presidential election year.

Mr. ANDREWS—I will accept the suggestion to make it 1872.

Mr COMSTOCK—1871 would be at least a year after the adoption of the Constitution, and at least a year after this judiciary system was in full force and operation. I will move, if it is in order, that the time be 1871.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair cannot entertain a motion for another amendment where the question has already been put on the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews], and it only remains to announce the vote.

The amendment of Mr. Andrews was declared carried.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to amend in the seventh line by inserting after the word "vote" the words "on such question," so as to avoid the difference of opinion that has occurred in another case, owing to the same phraseology.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

Mr. E. BROOKS—In order that a quorum may vote upon the time named in the first line of this section, and that we may have the sense of the committee—because I think the amendment moved by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews] is an eminently proper one—I move to reconsider the vote substituting 1873 for 1870.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. E. Brooks, to reconsider, and it was declared lost.

Mr. TAPPEN—I move to strike out the word "appointment," in the sixth line, and insert the word "election," so that the electors of that time, the affirmative generally having the majority, may determine that the vacancies shall thereafter be filled by election.

Mr. FOLGER—If I remember rightly, the course of debate in this Convention, the gentleman from Westchester [Mr. Tappen] has asserted that, on one question which is to be submitted to the people, the affirmative will not have the majority; and it is quite certain that three or four times when that question has been put to the people, the affirmative has not had the majority. I do not see that it follows that a question is to be answered always in the affirmative. Some gentlemen have had the experience of having negative answers given to their question. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. EVARTS—It will be seen that this would be rather an impertinent question to put to the people, because the Constitution, as they will have passed it, provides for filling these places by election, and the mere negative answer of the people that they do not want them filled by election would not indicate how they did desire them filled. This is putting to them the direct question: You have an elective system for your judiciary; do you now prefer that these judges should be appointed?

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Tappen, and it was declared lost.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move to strike out the section entirely. This seems to me a very unusual provision to put into a Constitution which is to provide for a judiciary elected by the people. We provide for an elective judiciary, and then provide that three years after the Constitution goes into effect the voters shall say whether they will elect their judges or not. The Constitution itself, when framed and perfected, will undoubtedly contain a provision for its own amendment; and if experience shall demonstrate that an amendment in this particular is desirable or necessary it can be made in the usual way, and I do not see any necessity for our providing for the expense or trouble of this election, unless there should be some call on the part of the people at that time for such an amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I hope the motion of the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown] will prevail. I do not want to see a question of this importance submitted to the people at an ordinary general election. Let it take the form of an amendment to the Constitution, as the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown] has suggested, if the people wish to make such an amendment.

Mr. COOKE—It seems to me a little singular that it should be proposed to submit the matter to the people in this form. It amounts simply to a separate submission of the question of appointing judges. Now this Convention have already, so far as they could do it in Committee of the Whole, adopted a provision for filling these vacancies by election. In our wisdom we have come to the conclusion that that is the true way of choosing these officers and filling these vacancies, and I think that when we have arrived at that conclusion we have done all that we have any business to do in the matter. We might arrange it so as to submit the question in some way as to the propriety of filling the vacancies by appointment, but it is a little out of order and out of character, it seems to me, to do that after we have once determined that it is wise to choose the judges and fill the vacancies by election. As I have just said, it only amounts to a separate submission of a question that we have once decided. I think it would be more harmonious, more symmetrical, to strike out the section altogether and submit the Constitution without it.

Mr. RATHBUN—My opinion has been, from the first, that the best way to select the judges would be by appointment. There are others upon this floor who agree with me in regard to that—quite a number—but we have been voted down on that question, and it has been decided by the Convention that the judges shall all be elected at the outset. Now, I regard this section as, in some measure, a concession to those members of the Convention who entertain an opinion on this subject contrary to that of the majority of the Convention; that, while by the provision contained in the article which we submit, that all of the judges shall be elected in the outset, yet the question shall be afterward submitted to the people for them to decide for themselves whether the vacancies occurring in the judicial offices, when we are fairly under way under the new system, shall be supplied by election or by appointment. The proposition is to submit the question distinctly to the people. It is a plain, simple proposition, and I would certainly like to hear the people's answer upon that subject. I think gentlemen are mistaken when they say that the people are very tenacious about holding on to the principle of the election of the judges, and I want to see this question submitted to the people within a reasonable time, and then we shall see who is right about it.

Mr. COOKE—Have we any right to submit to the people, in the Constitution, any provisions that we do not adopt here? Is it not our business to submit to the people what we adopt and not what we reject?

Mr. RATHBUN—The answer to that is that, we have adopted a proposition in the Constitution which is now settled. I suppose that all the judges, in the outset, shall be elected by the people. Now, the question is, have we a right to submit, through the Legislature, at some future time, another question, namely, shall the selection of the judges be retained in the hands of the people or shall the vacancies be filled by appointment? If the gentleman wants to know whether I think it is right to submit that question, I say yes, I do think it is right, and, therefore, I am in favor of it. I desire that the people should pass upon that question distinctly, directly and alone, and let them decide it as they have a right to do. It is the people's business, whether they prefer to retain the principle of election to fill vacancies or whether they prefer that the power to fill vacancies should be exercised by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I hope that this section will be stricken out. I am entirely opposed to the whole system of making the law partners, or the sons-in-law of the Executive of the State, the judges of the State; the appointing system, whether it be applied to the judges or to any other officers, is simply taking away from the people of the State the selection of their own servants, and putting it into the hands of whoever may have the central chair at that time and leaving it to him to appoint his friends and proteges, whoever they may be. I am utterly opposed to the section, and I hope it will be stricken out.

Mr. FOLGER—I believe that no gentleman on the floor of this Convention has uttered more words during the time that we have been in session in favor of disposing of every question and deciding every thing in accordance with the will of the people, than the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. M. I. Townsend]; but now I understand that he wants to set up his will against the will of the people, if their will differs from his. This is not a question of whether the Executive shall appoint to the office of judge his friend or his son-in-law, but it is a question whether the people shall be permitted to decide for themselves what is the best system of filling the vacancies which may occur in the judicial office. This section proposes to go to the people and to ask them this question and to get their answer: "Do you wish to have your judiciary an appointive judiciary?" The very will of the people is to be reached. Yet there stands the advocate of the people, who is in favor of submitting every thing to the people and of being in all respects governed by their opinion, their will, and their wish, and yet it seems he will set up his "I" against them and their wish, if they do not agree with him.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I am proud of the compliment which the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] has just paid me. I do not propose at this late day in the session of the Convention, to take any part in trying to find some device or indirection by which the people can be cheated out of their will in this matter.

Mr. YOUNG—I have observed that where offices are filled by appointment, the appointees are generally those old political hacks who have been disappointed in being elected by the people, and who are consoled and rewarded by appointments from the Governor. Now, I think that when the people pass their condemnation upon a man he should be silent. I am opposed to the Governor's taking him up and setting him on his feet again over the will of the people, and therefore I am opposed to every proposition of this kind.

Mr. RATHBUN—I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether he is so much opposed to appointment of judges by the Governor that he is not willing to let the people decide for themselves whether such appointments should be made?

The question was put upon the motion of Mr. E. A. Brown, to strike out the section, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 42 to 43.

Mr. SPENCER—I move a reconsidertion of the vote by which the motion to strike out has just been defeated.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Spencer to reconsider, and it was declared lost by a vote of 40 to 47.

Mr. KRUM—Is an amendment to the eleventh section in order?

The CHAIRMAN—It is.

Mr. KRUM—I move to strike out the word "and" in the fifth line between the figures 6 and 15, and to insert after the word "15," "and 18," so that the section will then read "shall vacancies as they occur in the office of the judges and justices mentioned in sections 2, 6, 15 and 18 be filled by appointment?" My object is that this section shall also include the office of county judge, and if it shall be deemed best by the people to elect their judges, for the reason that by so doing they get better judges, I presume that the same rule that applies to the judges of the court of appeals and justices of the supreme court, will apply to county judges. I think there are better reasons why county judges should be appointed than why judges of the court of appeals and justices of the supreme court should be appointed. If any influence is exercised upon the mind of the judge, by reason of his being elected, it most assuredly acts upon the county judge more certainly than it does upon any other. I move to include county judges with the rest.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Krum, and it was declared carried.

Mr. WALES—I move to include district attorneys.

Mr. BAKER—I move to include justices of the peace. It seems to me that if there is any class of judicial officers liable to be biased by local influences, it is the justices of the peace; and if we want to remove our judicial officers beyond the reach of that bias which may be supposed to result from their being elective, it seems to me that the rule can be applied to justices of the peace with peculiar propriety. The judge of the court of appeals is not liable to be influenced by the excitements of any particular locality or neighborhood. It is only upon great political questions that that court is at all liable to be influenced improperly; whereas, our local magistrates are very liable to be influenced by local questions and excitements. I therefore hope that, if it is the intention to submit this question to the people, of how the higher judicial offices shall be filled, they will also submit the question whether the Executive of the State shall not have the power to appoint all magistrates. It seems to me that it is full as important to the people, to place their popular judicial officers beyond the possibility of being biased by local influences, as it is to protect the higher courts and judges from being biased improperly; and if this question is to be submitted to the people at all, I move an amendment to this effect.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I do not think it wise to include too much in this proposition, because if we do so, it will defeat its own object. I have regarded this provision, brought forward by the Judicary Committee, as one of the wisest in the Constitution. Now, it may be very true that the people will vote that the judges of their high courts shall be appointive instead of elective, when they may not be prepared to confirm the same propositon in regard to the district attorneys or to justices of the peace. I therefore think that these officers had better not be grouped in this proposition, but that the people should be allowed to give their vote substantially upon this single question.

Mr. WALES—I withdraw my amendment.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Baker, and it was declared lost.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the PRESIDENT resumed the chair, and the Convention took a recess until seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock, again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole and resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, of Cayuga, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the adoption of section 11.

Mr. COOKE—I want to suggest to the gentleman from Schoharie [Mr. Krum] that, in order to make his amendment effectual, he should insert the word "county" after "Buffalo."

Mr. KRUM—The amendment is proper, I think, in order to give to the section the effect I intended.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Cooke, and it was declared carried.

There being no further amendments, the SECRETARY read the thirteenth section as follows:

SEC. 13. The times and places of holding the terms of the court of appeals and of the general and special terms of the supreme court within the several departments and districts, and the circuit courts and courts of oyer and terminer within the several counties, shall be provided for by law. But provision shall be made for holding general terms of the supreme court at convenient places in each of said districts.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move to strike out, in the last line, the words "convenient places," so that it will read, "but provision shall be made for holding general terms of the supreme court in each of said districts." I will explain to the committee the reason of my amendment. The section, as it now reads, is certainly open to the construction that there must be more than one place of holding the general term. It reads "the times and places" in each of the districts. Now, in nearly all the judicial districts of the State the general terms are held in but one place. That is the case, I know, in the third district. It is so in the fifth district. I am not sure about the sixth; but in the seventh and in the eighth districts that is also the case. I simply wish to leave it in such shape that it will not be imperative to hold those terms at more than one place in a particular district.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

There being no further amendments, the SECRETARY read the fifteenth section as follows:

SEC. 15. There shall be in the city and county of New York, the superior court of the city of New York, and the court of common pleas of said city and county. And there shall be in the city of Buffalo the superior court of said city. The said courts shall severally have the jurisdiction they now severally possess, and such other original and appellate civil and criminal jurisdiction as may be conferred by law. There shall be five judges of the superior court of the city and county of New York; five judges of the court of common pleas of the said city and county of New York; and three judges of the superior court of the city of Buffalo. The judges of said courts respectively shall designate one of their number as chief justice, who shall act as such as long as he continues in office. Vacancies in said court shall be filled by election by the electors of said cities respectively, at the general election next after the vacancy shall occur, and until such general election in the same manner as vacancies in the office of justice of the supreme court, as is hereinbefore provided.

Mr. COOKE—I have an amendment I propose to offer. Strike out all after the words "there shall be," in the first line, and insert as follows: "such courts of limited jurisdiction in cities as the Legislature shall prescribe." I offer this amendment with a view to hearing gentlemen who have examined that question express their views upon it. I know that it is the opinion of quite a number of the members of this Convention that these courts ought not to be constitutionalized in this way. It is for the purpose of getting at the views of the different delegates that I offer this amendment.

Mr. COMSTOCK—These courts certainly have not the same terrritorial jurisdiction as the supreme court. But in the territory for which they are constituted their jurisdiction is not, and I apprehend ought not, to be limited. I do not know exactly the idea which the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] attaches to the word limited or limitations in his amendment. These are courts of very great importance in that populous and commercial city. And I apprehend that whatever reason we have for fixing our supreme court permanently on the foundation of the Constitution, the same reasons apply, and with equal force, to the courts in the city of New York. They are courts as important to the people of that city as any of the courts in this State are to the people of the State. They have as large a jurisdiction within their territorial limits as the courts of the State. And we all know that the controversies that are brought into those courts and determined by them are generally, in amount and importance, much greater than those which occur in the courts of original and general jurisdiction throughout the State. I cannot think of any good reason, and I have heard none suggested on this floor, although there may be such, why those courts should not receive a recognition in the Constitution of the State. Of course by constitutionalizing the courts we do not by any means constitutionalize the judges who sit in the courts. We do not recognize persons, we simply recognize the constitution of these courts. I wait to hear some reason why it should not be done.

Mr. COOKE—Heretofore the Legislature has been left free to organize such courts for cities as they deemed best in view of the necessities that existed. There has been, up to this time, no provision in the Constitution organizing any of those courts. And I am not aware that the public interests have suffered from the omissions of the Constitution of 1846, or any prior Constitution in this respect. I had rather hoped to hear some good reason for inserting this provision in the Constitution now. If this matter is left to the Legislature and the courts prove inadequate, any omission can be supplied. They can be created, enlarged and made more comprehensive, and better enabled to transact their business. The rule we act upon in most of these matters is, unless we want to restrain the Legislature in some way, to leave them free to organize courts or do other legislative business in a way which shall seem to them best. Is it important, is it necessary for this Convention to restrain the Legislature in respect to the organization of any courts in the city and county of New York? The gentleman [Mr. Comstock] wants to know what is meant by limited jurisdiction. I mean by it, in this amendment, a jurisdiction that is limited territorially to the cities. It may be necessary to limit them in regard to the subject-matter of the controversy. When one or both of the parties are required to reside in the city to give the court jurisdiction, I believe it is perfectly proper to describe it as a court of limited jurisdiction.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Cooke, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move so to amend the section so that the number of judges of the superior court and the court of common pleas shall be six instead of five. I am told that there are reasons of importance why the number should be six instead of five.

Mr. SPENCER—I offer the following substitut by way of amendment; inserting after the wor Buffalo, in line eleven, the following: "the num ber of judges of either of said courts may be i creased as the Legislature shall by law direct.

Mr. COMSTOCK — Does the gentleman offe that as an amendment to my amendment or t the section?

Mr. SPENCER — As an amendment to th amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [M Comstock].

Mr. COMSTOCK — I think the amendmen would be very useful, although I think the one offered should be adopted also. I offered m amendment for the reason that the court shoul not be reduced by this Constitution. The proposition is to reduce the number of the court but no good reason has yet been given for it tha I know of, and very good reasons exist wh it should not be done.

Mr. SPENCER—If the gentleman will allo me; I suppose that the section provided for th Constitution of those courts as they now exis I will withdraw my amendment for the presen

Mr. KRUM—I would like to inquire of th gentleman from New York [Mr. Garvin] ho many judges are now in the court of commo pleas.

Mr. GARVIN—There are three.

Mr. KRUM—Does the gentleman propose t increase the number to six.

Mr. GARVIN—This section makes the numbe five; but for the purpose of making the cour effective I propose to the gentleman from Onon daga that he increase the number to six.

Mr. ROBERTSON—Some doubts have been ex pressed as to the propriety of having courts in troduced into the Constitution which are not part of the general system, as it is termed, for th administration of justice in the State. It woul be improper undoubtedly to have any thing intro duced but a uniform administration of justic throughout the State, were it not that we hav in two extremes of the State, in two localities a dense population having interests in the com merce of the State, in such manner as to hav numerous and important controversies arise ou of the common transactions of life, for th disposition of which three local courts hav been established. These three institutions hav been tried and their success has been the result of experience. They have stood the test of time two of them for more than twenty years, and th last for a considerable number of years past, an they have all of them met with the approbation o the portions of the State in which they have ad ministered justice. It will be difficult to conceive therefore, why we should not include in th judicial system of the State these three tenders t the great judicial machines by which justice i administered in the way in which it has been pro posed by the committee. The expense of main taining these additional and subordinate branche of the judiciary system is to be borne by the in habitants of the localities for whose benefit the are created. If we provide that the judiciary forc of the State of New York shall consist only of uniform system of supreme court judges, ther would necessarily be a tax upon the State for th salary of those judges, and the other parts of the machinery connected with the working of that system. It would be a relief to the city and county of New York and the city of Buffalo to have these additional courts, and their support would inflict no burden upon the rest of the people of the State. As these courts are now constituted, their salaries and expenses are borne by those persons who particularly feel the benefit. Whereas, the judiciary system in regard to the administration of justice by this great State court, the supreme court, is borne by the State at large. Thus pro tanto the State of New York is relieved from the burden of supporting that out-branch of the judiciary system for the administration of justice, in the city of New York, by the two courts of that city, and the citizens of the county of Erie, by the superior court of the city of Buffalo. We, therefore, take from the residue of the State a burden of a peculiar character. I therefore maintain that, in regard to the cases disposed of by those courts, the rest of the people of the State ought to be perfectly willing and anxious that these institutions should be sustained, because it relieves them from the burden, and because the people who are to be benefited by them, and for whom they are peculiarly created, are those who best understand what costs should be borne for the purpose of maintaining them. In regard to the number of judges, I am satisfied that six is the most beneficial number we can possibly adopt for the purpose of carrying on the business. We then have the smallest odd number of judges, three, for a general term, and revising any mistake that may be made in decisions by single judges. We have two judges engaged in the trial of cases. We have another judge engaged in carrying on that branch of the administration of justice which consists of motions at chambers, equity cases, and other business pertaining to special terms. In that way, the whole machinery is moving, in clearing off the calendar of those cases which relate only to the business of the city of New York. I therefore would humbly suggest, unless the committee find some cogent reason for continuing the number five as reported by the Judiciary Committee, that the number should be six in both courts, subject to a change by an addition to the number by the Legislature, if hereafter the multiplicity of business should require an increase of judges; and the flexibility should be provided for this section which is proposed by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer].

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York what proportion of the business of the superior court arises purely from the commercial transactions of the city, and whether or not a considerable portion of the business does not properly belong to other counties of the State?

Mr. ROBERTSON—The jurisdiction of the superior court of the city of New York and of the common pleas also, refers entirely to cases in which the defendants are residents of the city and county of New York, or may be served with process therein. By far the greatest part of the business is that which relates to transactions either between parties residing in the city and county of New York, or suits by residents there from whom goods may have been purchased, or with whom commercial contracts have been made by parties residing elsewhere, but who are found in the city and upon whom processes may be served there. Very rarely do any cases come into those courts which grow out of transactions in other portions of the State.

Mr. FOLGER—What is the condition of the calendar in those courts?

Mr. ROBERTSON—Document 33, which is the report of the clerk of the superior court, in answer to a resolution of this body asking for information in regard to that matter, reports the number of cases on the calendar in 1866. The whole number of the cases on the calendar on January 1st, 1866, at general term, was forty The number of cases during the whole year, three hundred and eleven; the number of appeals argued, one hundred and forty-six. I may add that at every general term in that court the whole calendar is called, and all the cases could be heard if the counsel were not engaged in cases elsewhere which prevent their being ready to argue. In January, 1866, the number of cases on the special term calendar was thirty-nine; motions heard and decided at chambers in that month were three hundred and forty-seven. We may take this as a specimen. Every one of these cases were called on that calendar. The recapitulation gives the number of motions heard and decided at 3,808; the number of cases on the calendar 392, and the number of cases tried at special term 102. In the trial terms the whole number of cases on the calendar, January 1st, 1866, was 2,351. The number of cases are all specified as well as the number of cases tried and the number of cases added to the calendar during that year. So also the naturalization business at times occupies greatly the attention of all the judges of the court. The number of naturalizations for 1866 was 5,501.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I regret there is no one of the representatives from the city of New York on the floor to raise the question that I am about to. That is, why should the city of New York be compelled to support and contribute to the entire expenses of the judiciary of her own city and county, as well as that of other counties of the State? I see it stated that the expenses of the jurisprudence of the city of New York, chargeable upon the county taxation, amount to about half a million of dollars per year. As a matter of principle, I submit that all the litigation, with the exception perhaps of the peculiar class that has been mentioned by my honorable friend, should be charged equally to the State at large. I think there is an anomaly here. In the first place, the creating of the two courts, with powers co-equal to that of the supreme court, is an exception to our general system. There are some twenty odd representatives from that city who ought to be here to prevent this apparent injustice to the tax payers, or at least the county of New York, and I feel some diffidence in pressing these views. But it seems to me that here is a marked anomaly, and the question presents itself to my mind, whether we should constitutionalize it. I think not

Mr. C. E. PARKER—I would like to inquire from some gentleman who has experience whether there is any necessity for doubling the present number of judges in the common pleas court. I understand there are but three now. I have but very little experience myself in the matter. I would like to inquire what the necessity is.

Mr. DALY—I suppose whatever reasons justify the present number of judges of the superior court, justify also the same number for the court of common pleas. The reasons are plain. The court of common pleas, from the limited number of its judges, is the most heavily worked court in the city of New York. Its present force is quite inadequate to its labors. Its ordinary business is as great as that of the superior court, and it is, in addition, the appellate court of all the inferior tribunals in the city. I am constrained to say this, although one of the judges of the court, that there is, perhaps, no tribunal in this State, the labor of which, in proportion to its numerical force, is as great as the court of common pleas. The business of both these courts is very heavy, and I can only say in reply to the gentleman from Tioga [Mr. C. E. Parker], whatever number is necessary to carry on the buiness of the superior court is equally required in the court of common pleas.

Mr. PIERREPONT—I believe it will be found to be the universal sentiment of every lawyer of the city of New York, that it is very desirable to increase the number of judges in the court of common pleas. I do not know that there is any difference in the opinion of lawyers upon this question.

Mr. SMITH—I do not think that those who live in the country should complain of an increase of the judicial force in the city of New York. The supreme court judges are supplied by the State and paid out of the State treasury; but of course they are wholly unable to perform the large amount of business in the city of New York. If that city needs a larger judicial force, and the people there are willing to pay for it, certainly those who live in the country ought not to complain. I take this occasion to speak of the reports of the superior court and the court of common pleas of the city of New York, inasmuch as on two or three occasions I have commented with some degree of severity upon the character of our supreme court reports. I regard the reports of the superior court and of the court of common pleas of the city of New York, as very valuable, and as indispensable to a lawyer who desires to keep himself thoroughly posted upon the law. The reports of the common pleas are especially valuable to lawyers in the country, because they embrace a class of cases that are of frequent occurrence in the country. I refer to appeals from justices' courts. I wish to say this, because I would not do injustice to the reports of any court in the State.

Mr. COOKE—I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith], where he finds any distinction between the supreme court and these local courts with respect to their being paid by the State? If I understand section 17, it puts them all on the same footing—the State has to pay the salaries of those judges; the superior court and the court of common pleas, as well as of the supreme court.

Mr. FOLGER—I would like to ask the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] where he finds in section 17 any thing requiring the State treasury to pay them? The bare fact of putting these courts in the Constitution does not make them a State expense, any more than putting a county court into the Constitution.

Mr. COOKE—I was alluding to the distinction made by the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] I take it that the provision in section 17 guarantees to these judges their salaries, and I presume they would have to be paid by the State.

Mr. SMITH—I named the distinction upon the authority of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson]. I supposed that the distinction existed, and believe still that it does, although I am not, at the moment, aware of the provision of law upon which the gentleman based his statement. He will be able to explain it doubtless.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I am quite sure it is not the construction of section 17, that these courts shall be paid out of the treasury of the State. It merely requires that they shall have a compensation to be fixed by law, not that that compensation shall be paid by the State. Those courts are now paid by the State.

Mr. DALY—Under the existing organization of those courts, in the special act which exists, there is a provision that compensation shall be fixed by law. That compensation is fixed by the board of supervisors in the city of New York. The courts have never been a charge upon the State from the time of their organization to the present day. There is nothing in the Constitution which makes them a charge upon the State.

Mr. HALE—I would suggest that if there is any doubt as to the effect of this section 17, a very slight modification would remove the doubt, inasmuch as all gentlemen are quite agreed that those courts should be supported by the city of New York. I suppose there will be no objection to such a modification.

Mr. BECKWITH—If gentlemen will look at the provisions of this report, they will find that in the next section provision is made for a county court. It provides that the supervisors shall furnish means to pay for their services. It leaves, therefore, the superior court and the court of common pleas, of the city of New York, on the same footing as the supreme court. It provides that they shall be paid, without saying who shall pay them. When it comes to the county court it provides that the supervisors shall pay the salaries of these judges. So, it seems to me, to raise the question and answer it, that they are to be paid by the State, excepting the county courts, for which provision is to be made by the board of supervisors.

Mr. DALY—It is a very easy matter, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Essex [Mr Hale], to remove our difficulty by amendment But I see no occasion for it. There is an existing statute which declares how they shall be paid. This statute is not abolished by this provision of the Constitution. It still remains in force.

Mr. COOKE—I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], whether he thinks that be so? Here the Constitution for the first time provides, that there shall be certain constitutional courts, in the city of New York, a superior court and common pleas, and the superior court of Buffalo, and that the Legislature shall fix the pay of the judges. Now, is there not danger of a different construction; that this provision may be considered as abrogating that statute, or is it not a fact, that the Legislature could repeal that act?

Mr. DALY—I will suggest that the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] is probably preparing an amendment which will remove all difficulty.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I suppose there will be no difficulty until we come to section 17. There is no provision for the payment of any thing to any of the judges of the State. It is a matter entirely of convenience or expediency on the part of the Legislature, whether they choose to pay any salary to the justices of the supreme court or not. The probability is no one would be willing to enter on those onerous duties without the payment of some compensation. Therefore it is not until we come to section 17 that we can at all fix by whom these salaries are to be paid. I can see no difficulty in providing for their compensation to be fixed by law, and this will solve all the difficulty.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

Mr. EVARTS—I beg leave to offer this amendment to come in at the close of section 15 as it now reads:

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

Add to section 15: "It shall be competent for the Legislature to provide by law for the detailing of one or more judges of the superior court or of the court of common pleas of the city of New York to hold circuits or special terms of the supreme court in the city and county of New York from time to time, as the exigencies of judicial business in that city and county may require."

Mr. EVARTS—This matter was talked of somewhat in the Judiciary Committee, and we discussed what was familiar to us and familiar to the gentlemen of the profession in the Convention, the habit which prevailed in England, and which has been found very useful when an accumulation of business should arise in any circuit, by authorizing, by special commission from the crown, a barrister to discharge particular functions, for a limited period, for the relief of that particular circuit. Now, we all appreciate the expected growth of the city of New York, in its population and in its wealth, in its business and in its litigation, and it should have as much provision for the accommodation of its business as is possible under our Constitution. It has occurred to me that this amendment which I propose, without adding in the least to the permanent judicial force of the State, or of the city, or of the county, or to the expenses of the same, might be such as would be found practically useful, and thus the public would be benefited without injury or marring of the judicial machinery of the State. I have conferred with various members of the Judiciary Committee, and with the justices of these two courts who have seats in this Convention, and I do not find that any objection presents itself to their minds. I therefore propose the amendment, and conceive that no harm can arise from its adoption.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Evarts, and it was declared carried.

Mr. HALE—I move to amend the section by adding thereto the following:

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

The judges of the courts mentioned in this section shall be paid, and the expenses of said courts defrayed in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. EVARTS—Why is it necessary to confine the power of the Legislature to the methods now provided by law?

Mr. BECKWITH—I would suggest to the gentleman, that he insert his amendment after the words "county judge."

Mr. HALE—I think we would remove all difficulty by striking out the word "now," and leaving it to the Legislature. It is more convenient to put the amendment here because all these courts are mentioned in this section, and it will not be necessary to repeat their names.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Hale, and it was declared carried.

There being no further amendment, the SECRETARY read the sixteenth section as follows:

SEC. 16. Justices of the supreme court shall be elected by the electors of their respective departments: judges of the superior court of the city and county of New York, and the court of common pleas of the city and county of New York, by the electors of that city and county; and judges of the superior court of the city of Buffalo, by the electors of that city. The said justices and judges shall hold their offices during good behavior until they respectively attain the age of seventy years.

Mr. CHURCH—I offer the following amendment, to come in after the word "city" in the sixth line of the sixteenth section.

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

"At the first election of justices of the supreme court under this Constitution no elector shall vote for more than six justices in the department in which ten are to be elected, nor more than five in a department in which eight justices are to be elected, and at the first election of judges of the superior court of the city of New York, and of the court of common pleas of the said city and county of New York, no elector shall vote for more than four of said judges, and at the first election of judges of the superior court of the city of Buffalo, no elector shall vote for more than two of said judges."

Mr. SPENCER—I offer the following by way of substitute.

The SECRETARY read the substitute as follows:

"The justices and judges of the present supreme and superior courts and courts of common pleas shall be justices and judges of the said courts hereby established during the terms for which they were respectively elected."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Spencer, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 40 to 40.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Church.

Mr. RATHBUN—I wish to ask the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church], whether he provides for the election of the judges of the superior court and the court of common pleas of New York as for the other courts?

Mr. CHURCH—My amendment provides for the same manner of election, so far as the minority principle is concerned.

Mr. RATHBUN—That is what I mean.

Mr. ALVORD—I would ask the gentleman from New York, and the other members of this committee, in the light of the result of the election in that city last year and the year before, there being no minority body to be represented, even by this system, whether the turkey is not all on one side? [Laughter.] It gives those gentlemen who represent the dominant party in that portion of the State the power of electing the whole of the judges, under this system, of their own special kind and character, and it compels us in the country to elect their men. Now, outside of this plan, I am opposed to just exactly what has happened in this case. I am opposed to the principle as utterly inconsistent with our democratic form of government, that a minority should have a right to select any of those men. The majority in all cases should speak in these matters. It would be undertaking to say: You shall elect six men and only vote for four—which is, in my opinion, a mistake of terms; it is no election. It permits the minority of the people to say that they will have such as they please for their judges, although they may be obnoxious to the majority of the people in other respects, in reference to their political character. I hope, therefore, that we shall stop now, and that we shall take back what we have done, so far as this report is concerned, in reference to the election of the judges of the court of appeals.

Mr. YOUNG—I think the gentleman's [Mr. Alvord's] party gets a very large slice of the turkey in the division of the State into four judicial departments. It is perfectly evident that the first and second judicial districts, as they are now constituted, must be the first department. That the third district which is and has been for a long time democratic, must be united with the fourth district to make the second department, which will make a republican department, and the result will be that there will be one democratic department in the State and three republican departments. And I think if there is any fault to be found about this division of the spoils between the parties in the State, we justly have occasion to make our share of the complaints. I was in favor of the minority representation recommended here, but the party in the majority has defeated the plan and taken from us one judicial district.

Mr. KRUM—I have been in favor of the representation of minorities, and upon the floor of this Convention voted in favor of representing minorities in the Legislature. In that I was overruled by the vote of the maiority of the delegates of this Convention. I would be in favor of the representation of minorities in the election of judges, but I desire such a representation of minorities as shall truly represent minorities and not majorities. Let us look at this question. The city of New York has six judges of the superior court, six judges of the court of common pleas, and ten judges of the supreme court, making twenty-two, and the city of Buffalo has three judges of the superior court—in all twenty-five—more than half of the judges of the State of New York. In addition to that, by this minority principle, they propose to take one-third of all the other judges of the State of New York. Now, I submit that such a represention of minorities is merely a representation in name and not a representation in fact. Therefore I agree with the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] and hope that this amendment will be voted down and also that we shall return and correct the same principle established with reference to the court of appeals.

Mr. EVARTS—I am not disposed to be wholly inattentive to the considerations of political fairness or of political calculation that may present themselves upon the arrangements that we are making in this regard. The gentleman from Schoharie [Mr. Krum] was a little wrong in his arithmetic in putting down ten judges for the supreme court in the city of New York. There are but five. There are ten in the department, which includes the second district as well as the first. But in regard to the present condition of the suffrage of the city and county of New York, referred to by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], it can hardly be regarded as a permanent condition of the suffrage. [Laughter.] Whenever the party now there so much in the minority loses still further its hold upon the suffrage, then the party which will then include, substantially, all the votes of that city must divide itself on some new issues of politics. It is impossible that one party, the republican party, should remain in the condition that it now is; it must either increase or diminish, and either way this disparity will be removed. But we certainly must see all these judgeships in the hands of this political majority upon the ordinary method of election. We lose nothing, therefore, in that respect there. We, the minority, I have no doubt, will get on the bench there under this arrangement, four judges of our own party; but if we do not we shall at least hold a most important power as a minority in choosing between the different candidates of the same party that will be presented to the suffrage of the people. And if we cannot obtain judges, as we should be glad to do, that would represent us as the minority in politics, we may yet exercise an important and useful control in the public interests in the selection of candidates from the two tickets of the other party. But I think it will be found that the present condition of the politics of the State, even as they are the subject of calculation in parties as they now exist, is as favorable as any other to adopt what is a good and useful method if it be a good and useful method, for nobody can tell exactly how it will play its part in any coming election. I think we all agree, that re are on the eve of new arrangements of politics; that the divisions as they now exist, are too much traditionary and historical, upon the great issues that have really been settled before the people, and that new matters of political division are to arise in this State, as in all the other States of the Union. Now, having thus got rid of the political considerations, which do not much disturb me, I am only anxious to know whether the method itself is a wise one. I am wholly opposed to minority representation in political offices. I have throughout, in this Convention opposed any attempt to introduce the power of the minority in political bodies. It is not proposed by this amendment that the method of minority representation in the suffrage for judges shall be permanently fixed on our system. We are now to adopt a method whereby the judicial force of the State is, at once, to be filled anew, to the number of some forty or fifty judges, including the court of appeals, the courts of the cities, and the supreme court. In two particulars it is very undesirable that these courts should not be filled from one political party. First, in respect to the confidence in the bench thus to be constituted, in regard to political feeling and the attitude of the people toward them. And second, it is very desirable that when so great a number of judges are to be selected, the choice should not be limited to the bar of one party, that is half the bar of the State, but that its selection should include all fit men in the bar of both parties—the profession of the whole State. That being so, there is no better method—there is no better chance of an equal distribution through the bar of the State, so far as may be, of these judicial offices, than that which is proposed by this amendment of the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church]. By the disparity between the two classes to be voted for, making one so much larger than the other, and thus making the majority, the master, and the competition between the parties a serious and not a formal one, we secure all that proper activity of the two parties to put in nomination their best men in competition with the other party, and at the same time give the assurance that the entire new bench is not to be made up, exclusively, of any particular party, nor the selection confined to one-half the bar of the State.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I have never made any partisan allusion upon the floor of this Convention, and I never intended to do so. But the argument in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church], the argument made by my colleague from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], is placed in a partisan aspect; and as I am very anxious that this amendment should prevail, and as I know that those who are opposed to me in party politics have a majority on this floor, I feel myself excused from alluding to the subject, for a moment, in the aspect in which it is put. One of the political parties of the State at this present moment seems to be numerically largely in the ascendent. I do not pretend to say how long that will last, but such seems to be the fact at the moment we are discussing this question. In answer to the argument of my colleague from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] may I not say that a party in that condition should not be charged with selfishness, with an interested motive, with a want of magnanimity, when it concedes the minority principle in the choice of judges. Let us look at it a little further. In the arrangement of these departments in the supreme court, looking at the present political condition of the State, it is entirely certain that two of them will belong to one of the parties and two of them to the other. In a partisan election, therefore, if the question related only to the election of judges of the supreme court by departments, it is difficult to perceive which of the parties would gain and which of the parties would lose. Let us look still a little further. There are three important local courts involved in the proposition—the superior court of the city of New York, the court of common pleas of the city of New York, and the superior court of the city of Buffalo. Those courts are all to be elected by constituencies in which the party to which I have referred has a commanding majority. I, therefore, call the attention of the gentleman [Mr. Alvord] again, and of this committee again, to the fact that the party in the majority again concedes the minority principle. I submit, then, that, if the argument he put in this aspect before the Convention be right, my colleague [Mr. Alvord], ought to withdraw his opposition to this amendment. It is said, however, that political majorities in a certain portion of the State—I refer to the city of New York—are so intensified that the minority principle cannot have a practical operation. I differ in regard to that proposition, and I confess that one of my anxieties to have this amendment prevail is to see some of the minority of the bar in that very city, some of the eminent men belonging to that minority—men who adorn the bar, and who have a reputation commensurate with this whole nation, placed upon the bench in that city. I am anxious to see that done, and I believe it ought to be done. It is not to be conceived that a party which has even two to one could arrange its vote with such mathematical precision that it would defeat the operation of this principle. I think that the judicial elections will be controlled by the intelligence, the virtue and the good sense of that city. If my calculation in this regard is wrong, there is still the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] has alluded to, that the minority may so control the selection of judges by the majority as to see to it that the best men are placed on the bench. I say it is entirely inconceivable that there shall be but one ticket for judges in the city of New York; and even if a political majority in that city can control, it will have at least two, and probably more than two tickets, and the power of the minority will be felt in those elections. It was to be expected when this principle was brought forward, it would encounter sectional opposition—encounter an opposition in one quarter of the State where one party is largely in the ascendent, and in another part of the State where another party is largely in the ascendent. But if it shall encounter opposition of that kind, I say, let us go to the people of the State with this principle, and appeal to their virtue and their intelligence to do what is right.

Mr. ALVORD—I would say in answer to my colleague [Mr. Comstock] so far as regards the first part of his remarks, unless I am very much mistaken in the signs of the times, the majority which apparently was had in this State a few days since is fast passing away, and will become, I trust and believe, a beautiful minority before another election rolls round. But, in reference to this question, it seems to be wise upon the part of this Convention, if they really desire that their work here shall be effective and adopted by the people, to look at the matter in a broader view than simply our own ideas. For this is a question most certainly in which there is no very great amount of principle on either side, and therefore those who are in favor of this proposition can look upon it as I look upon it, as a question of expediency. We go down to the city of New York where there is an overwhelming political majority on the one side and offer them this proposition. If they have the least idea that they are going to lose political power in consequence of the fact that you have given the minority a chance to elect some of the judges, they will vote solid against your Constitution. Go into other portions of the State where the opposite is the truth—where the majority is very largely in the ascendancy upon the other side—and they will look at it simply in the idea of ascendency, so far as regards its political aspect, and they will say they will not give up, at the dictation of this Convention, a political power which resides in their hands to elect all their officers. So if you choose to put that in your Constitution and make it a dead weight, a millstone around its neck, simply for the purpose of carrying out an idea in which there is no principle, go on and do it.

Mr. SPENCER—At the best this is but a new and untried experiment that is proposed by the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church]. We have already adopted it in regard to the court of appeals, and it seems to me that this will be sufficient, and that it will be time to try it in regard to the other officers which are to be elected, either in localities or in the State, when that shall be found to have operated satisfactory. But I have another objection which is that the necessary result will be to constitutionalize out of office the present judges of the supreme court and of the several local courts. I move now, if it is in order, to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by me, by way of substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church] was lost.

Mr. HALE—I trust the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] will postpone the motion to reconsider until after the vote is taken upon this question, for the reason that if we do not adopt this system, I apprehend a good many who are in favor of it will vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer]. If we are to go back, in substance, to the old plan of electing judges, I presume that many of the gentlemen upon this floor in favor of the minority principle will prefer to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], who would not be prepared to vote for it now. I do not propose to say much upon this question. I reside in a district and department in which the political party to which I belong is in a large majority. I, nevertheless, am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church]. And I am in favor of it, not upon political grounds. I think the great evil of this elective system—the great evil of the judiciary at the present day in this State is, that we consider it upon political rather than personal grounds. I regret to see, in this Convention, gentlemen get up here, and on a question like this, which involves the selection of judges, in which, regard should be paid, I was about to say exclusively—perhaps that would be too strong, but mainly, to the personal qualifications and character of the judges—attach so much weight to political considerations. I do not believe that it is necessary for me, or for any gentleman here, as a party man, to oppose or to approve of any system that is proposed here, according as he may think it will give to his party more or less of the judges. In my view of the matter, the question for us to consider is, how can we get the best court. Will the system that is proposed by the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church] give us a better court than to elect in the ordinary way, by which the majority elect the whole bench? But if we are to regard party considerations I would say that as I compute the number of judges that will be gained by each party, leaving out the court of appeals as a matter entirely in doubt, it will be precisely equal under this system. I do not believe but that if the republicans of the city of New York will nominate such men as they ought to nominate there, they will, under this system, always secure a representation in the local courts of that city. They will also elect one judge in the superior court of the city of Buffalo. You will find, therefore, if this plan of electing by departments prevails, laying out of view the court of appeals, by this system the republicans will gain nine judges and the democrats will gain nine judges. But the proper question for us is, will this system tend to secure better men as judges? I am very strongly of the opinion that it will. We know that in the history of the city of New York men have sometimes been nominated by the dominant party there for high judicial stations who were not believed by the community to be eminently fitted for that station. Whether that was mere prejudice, or whether the public opinion against the men nominated was well founded, I do not propose to discuss. But nominations of that kind have been made, and whenever this has occurred the majority by which they have been elected has been so much reduced as to make it apparent that under a system like this those men must have been defeated. If they had been put upon a ticket with other judges—upon a ticket where it was possible by this rule to defeat one or more of the number—you would find that those men who were objectionable to the bar of New York, and who were not believed for some reason to be fit for the stations for which they were nominated, would have been defeated; and I refer gentlemen to the record of the votes as proof of what I assert. The result will be this, that no party which believes itself to be in the majority will dare to nominate for judicial station men who are known to the profession to be unfit for it, or who are not believed by the profession to be proper candidates. The result will be, and it seems to me it is the only result that will save us from great harm under this elective system, that each party will always nominate its best men. Now, in a department where either party is in a large majority, it is of very little use for men in different localities who may know that the candidate is not a worthy one, to oppose his nomination and support a separate ticket. Even if the minority nominate unfit men under the proposed system, if the respectable, the responsible men of the party will nominate an independent candidate, the chances are that the independent candidates will get more votes than the regulars, and that they will come in second best and be the successful minority candidates. The objection that was raised when the principle of minority representations was urged in legislative assemblies, if it applies here, is an argument in favor of this system. The objection was this: It was said that the principle of minority representation would tend to break up parties. Now, I am free to say that, upon the election of judges, I desire above all things that parties should be broken up. I desire that men who belong to my party, if the opposite party nominates a better man for the office of judge than my party does, shall support him — that they shall not be bound by party ties. I believe that is a rule which ought to be impressed upon the electors of this State by every lawyer, and by every man who desires to see a pure and good judiciary, that a judicial election is not a party question. It is a question of men. And I shall support this plan because I believe it will, above all other plans, secure the putting into judicial stations of men who are fitted for such stations.

Mr. SPENCER—I should have been inclined to adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], but for the consideration that whatever disposition may be made of the amendment of the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church] the reconsideration of the vote on the amendment proposed by me would be improper or inapplicable. In case the amendment of the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church] should be adopted, it would be inconsistent with that proposed by me; and in case it should be rejected, there would be nothing for which my proposition would be a substitute.

Mr. WAKEMAN—Is the question now on reconsideration?

The CHAIRMAN—It is.

Mr. WAKEMAN—Is that in order while the other is pending?

The CHAIRMAN—It is.

Mr. WAKEMAN—I desired to say a few words on the other proposition.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I hope that the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] will himself reconsider his determination and postpone his motion to reconsider until after the vote is taken.

Mr. SPENCER—I have already stated my objection to doing that as it would then be inapplicable.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Not at all. It depends on the result of the vote.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Spencer to reconsider, and, on a division, it was found that no quorum had voted, there being 41 ayes and 31 noes.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair is of opinion that there is a quorum present.

The vote was retaken, and the motion was declared carried by a vote of 48 to 36.

The question recurred upon the amendment proposed by Mr. Spencer, which was read by the SECRETARY as follows:

"The justices and judges of the present supreme and superior courts, and court of common pleas shall be justices and judges of the said courts hereby established, during the terms for which they were respectively elected."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Spencer, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. Church.

Mr. FOLGER—That amendment of course will not be practicable now.

The CHAIRMAN—It still remains before the committee.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Church, and it was declared lost.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move to amend section 16 by striking out the word "departments" in the second line, and inserting the word "districts." Also to strike out all after the word "city" in the sixth line and insert the following:

"The justices of the supreme court elected under this Constitution shall hold their offices for eight years. The judges of the superior court of the city of New York shall hold their offices for six years, and the judges of the court of common pleas elected under this Constitution shall be so classified that with those then in office two shall go out of office at the end of every two years, and after such classification the term of office of said judges shall be six years, and the term of office of the judges of the superior court of the city of Buffalo shall be six years."

Mr. BECKWITH—I ask for a division of the question, to vote first on striking out the word "departments" and inserting "districts." I am in favor of that part of the proposition, for I think that the judges should be elected in their respective districts. I see by section 6 that it provides that the State shall be divided into four departments, and each department into two districts.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—The second part of the amendment is intended to be as far as practicable the precise language of the present Constitution upon the same subject.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I hope this amendment will be adopted. It is a change, I think, which will go further to make this article acceptable than any other that has been made. It enables each district to retain the control of the election of its own judges, thus securing the requisite number. I believe it will cure many of the evils that will grow out of the provisions that have been made here this evening.

Mr. EVARTS—I hope the amendment will not prevail unless this Convention is prepared to reject the system proposed by the majority of the committee for the supreme court, and shall adopt the system of the Constitution as it now is. Several votes have been taken upon this question, and thus far the constitutional provision as proposed by the committee, giving the departments a larger constituency in the election of judges and fewer divisions of the State, has been sustained by the votes of this Convention. This is but one of the test questions, and the Convention in voting upon it must understand that they vote substantially for the system of the Constitution as it now is if they vote for the election by districts and against the effort to give a larger constituency, fewer divisions of the State, and a better arrangement for the selection of judges and communication of judges between the different parts of the State.

Mr. BECKWITH—I hope the proposition —

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Beckwith] is not in order except by unanimous consent, having spoken once upon the question.

Objection was made.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I would say that the amendment as hastily drawn may need some modifications; but not in this part as now pending as between "districts" and "departments."

Mr. BECKWITH—I think that by electing judges —

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair must again remind the gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Beckwith] that he is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BECKWITH—I supposed there was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair heard an objection, and hears it again.

Mr. ANDREWS—I certainly concur with the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] in hoping that this Convention is not to retrace its steps, and to set aside the work which has been done up to this time in respect to this report; because, if this motion shall prevail, it will, in my judgment, lead to the retention of the present system of district courts in the State. I submit that the main advantage of the system, as reported by the Judiciary Committee, is in the change which has been reported providing that there should be a division into departments, instead of districts, as under the existing system; and by providing, also, that those departments should be twice the area of the present districts, in order to give a wider range of selection, in order to establish fewer general terms, and in order to improve, as has been shown it will be likely to do, the character of the court and of the judges in the State. How can we adopt the amendment which is now proposed, without following it by the restoration of the other parts of the system? What propriety is there in dividing the State into departments at all, if judges are to be elected by districts, and not in the departments into which the State is divided? We are to have departments, each department representing a common interest; all the judges in a department representing a common constituency; and it would be a strange incongruity to introduce into that system, to divide the local feeling and interests of the people in the different portions of the department, by providing that in the most important respects they should continue to act as separate districts, and not as parts of one common department. I voted for the minority principle of representation. For one, I desire to secure the best court which it is possible to secure, and I care not one whit whether democrats or republicans in politics are elected judges of the State, provided they are men of ability and learning, fitted for the positions for which they are designated. But now, that the minority principle is voted down, I ask whether gentlemen should then resort to the consideration, how will this election by departments affect the political distribution of the judges who may be elected within the State? I trust that this Convention will have sufficient regard for its own consistency to adhere to the work which we have done up to this time, and to reject this amendment which has been proposed.

Mr. C. E. PARKER—May I inquire of my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews], what advantage is gained by dividing the State into departments instead of into districts?

Mr. ANDREWS—I submitted my views upon that question at some length the other night. Whether those views were satisfactory or not I am unable to say. I can add nothing, however, to the suggestions I then made upon the subject.

Mr. C. E. PARKER—I did not hear the remarks, and therefore cannot say whether they would be satisfactory or not.

Mr. BECKWITH—I desire to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews] says it will be inconsistent with what this committee have already done. I would like to ask the gentleman why the committee provided that the department shall be divided into two districts, and then provide in another portion that one-half of the justices shall reside in the districts in which they were elected, and whether there is any thing inconsistent in those provisions?

Mr. ANDREWS—There is, in my judgment, an inconsistency in separating the constituency for the purpose of elections when the offices to be filled are to be offices of a larger territory than the districts in which they are elected; but in the location of officers within a certain territory it may or it may not be proper to provide for the location and distribution of those offices throughout the department.

Mr. BICKFORD—I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown] will prevail—striking out "departments" and inserting "districts." I will give briefly this reason for it: We cannot close our eyes to the fact that gentlemen residing in the third judicial district, belonging to what is known as the democratic party, consider that the majority is with them in that district; and they think that if put with the fourth district the majority will be republican. We wish to make a Constitution which the people will accept. We must be practical men, and we will certainly, if we do not adopt this amendment, array the democratic party in the third district entirely against the new Constitution. It will appear unwise in the consideration of every man who thinks on the subject, and we cannot be blind to it. In the next place, if we are to elect eight judges in a partment, and require that four of them shall reside in each district, how is that result to be secured unless we elect them by districts? Suppose that five who reside in one district get the highest votes at the election, how are we going to avoid the five being elected? It is impracticable; it is a scheme that cannot be carried out. The only way in which we can arrive at that result, that four shall reside in each district, is by providing that they shall be elected by districts. It cannot be arrived at in any other way. It is impossible. There is, therefore, the utmost propriety in this amendment, and every consideration, it seems to me, goes in favor of its adoption.

Mr. HAND—I want to ask the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews] how he proposes to secure this; suppose all the judges of the department should reside in one district, who shall say which of them shall remove into the other district? How can that matter be arranged so that one-half shall reside there?

Mr. ANDREWS—An amendment is now pending and lying on the table requiring the judges elected to reside in the respective portions of the departments in which they reside at the time of election.

Mr. HAND—Then they might all reside in one district.

Mr. ANDREWS—Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. HAND—Certainly, if they happen to reside there when elected. If you require that they should reside an equal number in each district and when we elect them they all reside in one district in the department, how are they to be changed to the other department so as to reside there through their official term?

Mr. FOLGER—I would remind the gentleman from Broome [Mr. Hand] that while we were on this section the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] offered an amendment to obtain that end, but at that time the gentleman from Orleans [Mr. Church] had proposed an amendment providing for a designation by a minority and the one offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr Comstock] was temporarily withdrawn until that was disposed of; but it will be renewed as I suppose. It requires that at the time of the election and after the election they shall be divided equally between the districts.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I would like to hear the amendment read once more.

The CHAIRMAN—It is to strike out the word "departments," in the second line, and insert the word "districts."

Mr. COMSTOCK—It might be well enough to remind the committee that this question as to the election of a bench of the supreme court is already decided by the vote of the committee, to take the old bench, the whole of it, and out of it to construct a supreme court. It is only the question of how a vacancy shall be filled hereafter, which is before us.

Mr. RATHBUN—Previous to the recess taken at two o'clock, the committee had gone through with and disposed of section 11, and had settled down and adopted provisions in that section providing for the designation of general terms of the supreme court, a point on which there had been great controversy, and in reference to which several amendments had been proposed and rejected by this committee. That section, if I recollect, provides that no judge shall sit upon the bench in review of any decision made by him upon the trial of causes. That left the whole subject still in difficulty. It did not go far enough. It left it so that a judge upon the bench, when a cause was called on that he had tried, would be required to vacate his seat and remain absent during the argument; and the next cause might require another judge to vacate his seat and remain off the bench until that cause had been decided, and the next one might result in the same thing; so that the judges would be continually leaving the bench, first one and then another, during the whole process of the argument of causes at general term, and yet the difficulty complained of would remain precisely the same as though the judges remained upon the bench and heard the arguments. That was one of the difficulties in regard to the report of the committee, and it was one that has been referred to and discussed by a very large number of delegates on this floor. Before leaving section 8 such provisions were added by way of amendment as to obviate the objections upon that subject entirely. It left us a general term so organized and so arranged that they would not be called upon to interfere with the trial of causes in the department wherein they presided as judges of the general term. We have got over that, and we have settled down upon a plan which seemed to me to be one of the best that had been talked about—one of the best suggested—one that obviated the most serious objection to the present organization of our supreme court: and I felt encouraged that the plan to be adopted was to be about the best that had been suggested by any body. My objection to this amendment is that it overturns all that and we go back into the same difficulty. We are surrounded by the same trouble, and we shall have organized a court upon the same ground precisely as the one which we now have, and which has been objected to by every body. I am opposed to it because I do not wish —nor do I believe that any gentleman of this Convention wishes—to go before a supreme court at general term and argue a case tried by the judges of that court.

Mr. SMITH—I wish to ask a question for information. I understand the gentleman to state that the amendment which was offered prohibiting judges from sitting at general term in the district where they presided at circuit, was adopted. My recollection was that that was rejected.

Mr. RATHBUN—I know that was adopted. I ask that the Secretary will read the amendment that was adopted with regard to the judges presiding at general term.

The SECRETARY read section 8, as follows:

Provision shall be made by law for designating from time to time the justices who shall hold the general terms, and also for designating from their number a chief justice of each department, who shall act as such during his continuance. Four judges in each department shall be designated to hold general term, and three of them shall form a quorum. And the justices so designated may sit at general term in any district except as the

Digitized by Google

Legislature may otherwise provide. It shall be competent for any one or more of said judges to hold special terms and circuits, and preside in any of the courts in any county, as the Legislature may by law direct.

Mr. RATHBUN—That is the amendment to which I referred. Now, sir, under that amendment it is competent for the Legislature to give us a general term which cannot be called upon to review any cases decided by them at a circuit. If you go back to the old district system, you must have the same judges at general term as you have to try your causes at circuit, and you abandon the entire guard and protection given by that section in creating a tribunal entirely unconnected with the trial of causes. Now, sir, if that is abandoned—and it must be if this amendment prevails—then I think the sooner we go back and say that the Constitution of 1846, in regard to the supreme court, shall remain unchanged, the better. I see no possible occasion for attempting to tinker with this plan, unless we adhere to the provisions contained in section 8.

Mr. YOUNG—If there has been any reason given to this Convention in support of this department system, it is that it will reduce the number of general terms and thus reduce the number of conflicting decisions. If that is not a reason, then I want to know from this Convention what reason can be assigned, except the political advantage to be gained by one party over the other, by thus dividing the State into four departments. If these judges are to be elected from their respective districts as they are now constructed, I do not see why, after they are elected, a general term cannot be selected from the judges in each department in which the districts are situated just the same as if the judges were elected from each department without any regard to districts. For instance, the third and fourth judicial districts will be united to make the second judicial department of the State. If four judges are elected from the third judicial district, and four from the fourth judicial district, it will make the same number of judges in the department as if the eight judges were selected from that department indiscriminately from the fourteen or sixteen counties that make up the department without any regard to the present judicial districts. I cannot see any earthly difference, and I cannot see why a general term in that department, to review the decisions of the circuit and inferior courts, cannot be formed or organized by an act of the Legislature, or by an arrangement between the judges themselves, just as well as if the judges were elected from those fourteen or sixteen counties which constitute the second department without any regard to districts. But I see an advantage in this amendment: if the judges are elected from the districts they will be more evenly distributed throughout the department, and it will be more convenient for them to hold special terms in almost every county in the department, which every member of the profession will readily admit will be a great convenience, not only to litigants, but to the profession. And the same arrangement can be made for the selection of a certain number of these judges to hear appealed cases only, and for a certain number of these judges to sit at circuit and special term, as could be made if the judges were elected indiscriminately in the whole departments; or the judges in one district may be assigned to hold the general terms in the other district, and vice versa, which will avoid the very grave objection of having judges sit in review of their own decisions. I can see no disadvantage at all from this plan, but I can readily see a political advantage growing out of the division of the State into departments and electing the judges by departments—a political advantage in making three of the departments republican and one democratic, as the State has ordinarily voted, though not, perhaps, as it voted last fall, which seemed to be, although I hope it will not hereafter prove to be, on exceptional occasion. If gentlemen are sincere in their professions against the present system of having judges sit in review of their own decisions no plan can be devised better calculated to remedy the evil.

Mr. KRUM—There seems to be a reason which I have not heard advanced here why this amendment should not prevail. This Convention has divided the State into four judicial departments and eight judicial districts. This Convention has also determined that four of the judges of each department shall reside in each of the districts in that department. By a provision that we have also adopted, the Legislature may undoubtedly determine that four judges in one district may or shall hold the general term in the other district, and so vice versa; so that in all probability the judges of one district will perform the general term duties in the other district. Now, I claim it to be but fair, that the electors of a department where the judges are to perform their duties, should have the right of voting for the judges that are to perform such duties, and therefore I claim that the judges of the various departments should be voted for by the electors in those departments, because it will not do to put four judges appointed in a district to perform the judicial duties of that district at general term, or even at the circuits, without permitting the electors in that district to have a voice in the selection of those judges. For instance, suppose the third district is attached to the fourth, the Legislature may provide by law that the judges of the third shall hold general terms in the fourth district, or that the judges of the fourth shall hold general term in the third. Now, I submit it is but fair that the electors of the third district should have a voice in determining who the judges of the fourth district shall be that are to hold general term in the third district. But this cannot be done by confining the election of the judges to a single district, and it can only be done by electing them over the whole department.

Mr. YOUNG—Is it not now the constant practice of judges from the rural districts to hold courts in the city of New York?

Mr. KRUM—I believe it is.

Mr. YOUNG—There is no provision—

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Young] is not in order.

Mr. KRUM—I will answer the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Young]. It is only as a matter of favor or courtesy that any judge from the

Digitized by Google

...ate goes down to New York city to hold circuits there. There is no law that compels judges to do so, but there is a law that permits them to do so, and it is a mere matter of courtesy on their part. But the Legislature may determine, in the instance I have stated, that the judges of the third district shall perform the judicial duties of the general term of the fourth district, and I claim that the electors of the fourth district have a right to determine, so far as they can, who are to be the judges that shall hold courts in that district.

Mr. BECKWITH—I would ask the gentleman from Schoharie [Mr. Krum] if judges from the general districts do not frequently sit in other districts?

Mr. KRUM—Yes, but it is a mere matter of courtesy.

Mr. BECKWITH—Is there any objection to it; or has there been any objections to it?

Mr. KRUM—There is no objection to it if judges are to sit in review of their own decisions; but, sir, I understand this to be an objection to the present organization of the general term, that judges have to sit in review of their own decisions. Now, if the Legislature determines that the judges of the fourth district shall hold general terms in the third dirstrict, and that the judges of the fourth district shall not hold circuits in the third district, then we most effecually accomplish the purpose designed, to wit: that no judge shall sit in review of his own decisions.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Cayuga [Mr. Rathbun].

Mr. RATHBUN—I have not spoken upon this amendment.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I insist that the objection raised by the gentleman from Cayuga [Mr. Rathbun] does not exist, and that the proposition to elect in districts where you have already provided that the judges shall reside where elected, does not at all interfere with the provision that the judges in one district shall not hold courts in any adjacent district. Now, the gentleman from Schoharie [Mr. Krum] has interposed another objection, as he states a new objection, that it is not proper for the people in the third district to have their cases heard and decided by judges in the fourth district for whom they cannot vote. We have heard a great deal upon this floor from time to time upon the subject of the independence of the judiciary. You have provided for four general terms, and that the eight judges of those general terms shall be divided so that four of them shall be in one district and four of them in another district of the department. You elect them by districts. When those elected in district number four hold court in another district they can be just as independent and honest as they please without any fear of being voted out of office by the electors of that district, and vice versa; an argument decidedly in favor of the independence of the judiciary, for which distinguished gentlemen have been so anxious upon this floor. I think it is an important consideration that the constituencies from which judges are elected should be large enough to allow a considerable range for choice, so that the people may be enabled to select suitable men, but at the same time, not so large but that the electors generally know the ability, character and standing of candidates who come before them for their votes. Judges will be elected by people who know something about them, instead of those who know very little of the candidates, as would often be the case in a greater district.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. E. A. Brown, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment has just been rejected.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Hardenburgh to reconsider, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HALE—I am unable to see that the adoption of this amendment will essentially impair the system as adopted by this committee. The advantage that this system has over the old one is in the reduction of the number of general terms, and, as was remarked by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Young], I do not see that providing that one-half of the judges from each department should be elected by each district, as well as reside there, will affect the system. Now, there are some reasons why I think this amendment ought to prevail. One reason was mentioned by the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford]. We have got to look at this matter practically. It seems to me that the vote of the majority party in the third district will be pretty unanimous against a Constitution which shall contain a provision like this. There is another practical reason which occurs to me from the fact that I formerly resided in the second district for some years. I am sure that as I then felt, and as I should feel now if I resided in that district, I would be very reluctant to have my judges chosen by the electors of the city of New York, although after the commendations I have to-day heard bestowed upon the judges of that city by my friend from New York [Mr. Pierrepont], it would almost seem that we ought all to desire that that city should elect all our judges. Nevertheless, I retain my old impression in regard to this matter so strongly that, I am unwilling to secure in the second district what I think will be a very universal opposition to this Constitution by insisting upon what does not seem to me at all essential.

Mr. PIERREPONT—I understand the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Hale], to state that there are some reasons why he is in favor of this amendment; but, if I understand him, the only reason he has given is that in a district where the democratic party is very strong the tendency would be, if this were adopted, to make those people in that district vote against the Constitution. If I am wrong I wish to be set right.

Mr. HALE—The proposed amendment puts the third district and the fourth together, and the republican majority in the third district, is very much larger than the democratic majority, and therefore I think the democrats in the third district will not be in favor of it.

Mr. KRUM—I would like to ask the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale]—

Digitized by Google

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman [Mr. Hale] has not the floor; the gentleman from New York [Mr. Pierrepont] has the floor.

Mr. PIERREPONT—Now, I imagine that generally, it will be found in the region of the second, third and first districts the sentiments upon this subject of the democrats, to whom the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] refers, will be found very nearly the same. I think from the vote which has just been taken by this Convention, as well as from what I have heard from the democratic press from that part of the State upon this subject, it will be found that the democrats of that part of the State will the more readily vote for this Constitution in the form as it is now proposed, instead of having the voting by districts. Now, it is a great mistake which gentlemen make if they suppose that the people of that region of the State do not wish to get good judges. Those people are as desirous to have good judges as they are anywhere; and it was believed, I think, by nearly all the members of the committee that this greater range for the selection of judges, which the majority of the committee propose, would tend to make a better bench, and would tend therefore to the improvement of the judiciary of the State, particularly of that department to which the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] has alluded. If this be given up, then we have lost nearly all that we thought we had gained; then, as has been well said, we had better return immediately to the system under which we are now living, and adopt it in the new Constitution, instead of making any change. The gentleman from Essex has again alluded to the judges of the city of New York, as though there was some chance to throw a slur upon them, because they had been defended. Now, I do not understand this. I do not understand why gentlemen of this Convention are disposed to make suggestions in reference to the judges of the city of New York. There are many of them here, and I undertake to say, that in proportion to their number, they do as much work as the judges in any other part of the State; that they perform as much labor for as little pay, in proportion to the expense which they are compelled to incur; that they are as upright, that their decisions are as well sustained, and that there is no occasion to find any special fault with them, any more than with the judges in the other parts of the State. Now, I am earnestly anxious that this system, which has been here proposed by this committee, should not be broken in upon, and that the motion to reconsider will not prevail.

Mr. SMITH—It seems to me that there is a misapprehension in the minds of gentlemen in regard to the real issues now pending under this amendment. I do not understand that it is a question between the department system and the district system. For one, I should have no hesitation in deciding in favor of the department system, instead of districts, if that were the issue, because I should be very reluctant to do any thing that would interfere with a reduction of the general terms of the State. I understand that there is already a provision adopted by which four judges in each department must reside in a particular district. If I am mistaken on this point I shall be glad to be set right, because that would alter the case very materially. But as I understand it that provision has already been adopted, so that the general term might be made up from the departments just as well if this amendment of the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown] should prevail. The only question is whether the four judges residing in one district shall be chosen by the electors in that district or in the department. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Pierrepont] says that we are to derive a great advantage from the election by departments because of the wider range for the selection of our judges. If we were at liberty to draw our judges from the departments at large without regard to locality, then there would be force in that suggestion but we are confined, in the selection of our candidates, to a particular district. We are not at liberty to take more than four from each district in the department. What propriety is there in permitting the electors in one district to vote for judges residing in another district? If not permitted to do this how would it interfere with the department system, so far as the organization of general terms is concerned? I confess I do not perceive, but if I am wrong I wish to be set right, because, as I said before, I do not wish to interfere with the department system proposed by the majority of the committee.

Mr. FOLGER—I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the standing Committee on the Judiciary, had made some progress therein, but not having gone through therewith, had directed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on granting leave, and it was declared carried.

Mr. WALES—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put upon the motion of Mr. Wales, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, December 14, 1867.

The Convention met at ten o'clock pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. A. A. FARR.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. GOULD—I ask leave of absence for Mr. Corbett of Onondaga, until Wednesday next.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I beg leave to submit a report from the Committee on the Salt Springs prefacing it with a brief explanation. The committee has been engaged upon two questions: first, whether the existing restraint in the Constitution which prohibits the sale of the salt springs shall ional duty or tax upon salt for the purpose blic revenue. In the report which I am t to submit, that question of revenues and of is considered. My report concludes with a mmendation that the Constitution shall pro-any tax upon salt for a revenue. The report e chairman of the committee contains a remendation that the Constitution shall impose for revenues of three cents per bushel.

e two propositions are directly opposed to other. Neither of them commands the nt of the majority of the committee. The rity of the committee is opposed to imposany additional duty upon salt by constitution-enactment; not concurring, however, in my recommendation that the imposition of duty ld be prohibited by the Constitution.

The SECRETARY read the report as fol-s:

The undersigned, one of the Committee on the lt Springs of this State, submits the following ort:

The attention of the committee has been prinily directed to the question of imposing, by stitutional enactment, a duty on the salt man-factured from said springs for the purpose of enue. This question involves the relations of e State and of individuals to those springs, and variety of other considerations connected with e manufacture of salt and the trade in that arle.

In the first place, the undersigned is of opinion at if any duty for such a purpose ought to be posed, the rate of duty is eminently a question r legislative discretion, and altogether unsuited become the subject of constitutional provision.
In his judgment it is the province of constitutional organic law, besides establishing, and to a cerin extent regulating, the departments and machinery of government, to ordain only those things which depend on fixed facts and principles; in other words, those things only which are suitable at all times and in all circumstances.
The amount of duty, if any, to be levied for revenue purposes on the salt produced in this State cannot be classed among subjects of this description. The question, in its very nature, is one to be affected by circumstances not durable in their character, but, on the contrary, liable to fluctuation and change. The financial situation and wants of the State, the condition of the salt manufacture itself—sometimes prosperous, at other times depressed—the competition with other known sources of supply, the possibility always existing of new and fresh discoveries of brine, or crystalized salt, pouring new and fresh supplies into the markets of the country—all these are circumstances of the character referred to, which seem to mark the subject as belonging to the domain of legislative enactment and wholly out of place in the fixed and organic law of the State.

The undersigned would refer particularly to other existing and prospective sources of supply which necessarily limit and depress, and may hereafter more and more limit and depress, the production and sale of salt from the springs of this State. He believes there is not on the globe or under its surface any natural product necessary for the use of man found in greater abundance and fitted for consumption with greater cheapness than the article of salt. In spite of a tariff intended for protection as well as revenue, about one-half the salt consumed in this country is imported. From the Danish, Dutch, British and French West India Islands, from England, France and other countries, not far from 14,000,000 of bushels are annually brought into the United States. In this country inexhaustible brines and crystalized salts are found in Michigan, Ohio, Virginia, Louisiana and other places. New discoveries are being constantly made, among which may be mentioned a brine of great purity and strength in Canada, upon the shore of Lake Huron. In the southern part of the island of San Domingo exists a salt mountain or elevation of the purest rock salt on the globe, and sufficient in quantity for the supply of all mankind for generations to come. This vast deposit, easily accessible from the southern coast of the island, is now owned by citizens of New York, under favorable grants from the Dominican government, and the initiatory steps have already been taken for its development and for introducing the salt into the markets of the United States.

These general facts are of great significance.
It must be evident to every one that the production of salt in this State has an intimate relation to other sources of supply, both foreign and domestic, and that every additional burden imposed on that production, gives a new and fresh advantage to the competitions which press upon us from every quarter. The facts referred to have a constant although irregular influence upon the production and market value of our own salt. Our own manufacturers cannot, in general, sell for higher prices than those which are asked by rival interests competing in the same markets. At this time and under the tariff imposed by the federal government, they are barely able to maintain a close and doubtful competition on the sea-board with the salt produced abroad at low prices, and imported as ballast or at low freights. A similar struggle is constantly maintained in the Western States. Every bushel of salt we send there meets both a foreign and domestic rival. We are able to control the market only in a limited district of country consuming less than two millions of bushels, and composed of a part of this State and a much smaller portion of Pennsylvania.
The proposed tax is simply an addition of so much to the cost of manufacturers, and every one can see that every such addition tends to expel us from the markets where competition is already close, and to contract more and more and into smaller and smaller dimension the circle into which competition does not enter. There might be wisdom and statesmanship in this policy if it ended in any degree to cheapen the price of one of the necessities of life. But to burden and tax the production of an article is not the way to cheapen its cost and value in the markets. The effect, plain enough to be obvious to every understanding, must be to compel the producer to withdraw from those markets where he has maintained himself with difficulty, and to demand higher prices in those of which he is still able to keep possession.

We have referred to the protection afforded by the duty on imported salt as one of the circumstances affecting the present question. That protection is of vital importance. There is probably no domestic interest more dependent in this respect on the legislation of Congress than the salt manufacture. If this protection were withdrawn the salt of this State would be driven from the markets on the sea-board and tide waters and from all the Western and North-western States lying upon the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. The effect upon our own salt manufacturing interest would be so immediate and so injurious that every one would regard it as the most suicidal folly to impose upon that interest a new and onerous burden to raise revenue for the use of the State. This would be so if the measure were proposed as one of legislation merely. No one, we are sure, would seriously think of proposing such a measure, because its effect would be the utter prostration of the interest to be affected by it. But what are we now asked to do? We have no control over the legislation of Congress. The protection afforded to-day may, without our consent, be withdrawn to-morrow, and yet we are asked, by an irrepealable provision of organic law, to impose on our own salt manufacture a duty which nothing but the highest condition of prosperity would justify or excuse. We have no guaranty whatever against the repeal or essential modification of the tariff on foreign salt. There are many prejudices and there are plausible theories hostile to its continuance. Nothing can more clearly demonstrate the impolicy of a constitutional tax, which we shall find ourselves unable to repeal when the protection we now have may be wholly or partly withdrawn, and when such a tax may be fatal to the prosperity of the salt manufacture in this State.

It is proper to add in this connection that, when the tariff laws were adjusted on their present basis, Congress had under careful consideration the question of levying an internal duty on the manufacture of salt. The salt producing interests of the country were represented before the appropriate committees of both houses, and the subjects both of foreign and domestic duty on that article were thoroughly examined and discussed. The unanimous conclusion was against imposing any duty for internal revenue on domestic salt, and this conclusion was unanimously approved by Congress. Is it wise, then, for the State of New York to impose a serious burden upon one of its own important interests—a burden from which similar and rival interests in the other States are wholly exempt. In no other State of the Union is there any internal tax or duty on salt. In all the markets of the West we meet in close competition with the salts of Michigan, Ohio and Kanawha. Those important interests are entirely free from State exactions, while we in New York deliberate whether our own salt shall not be subjected to new and heavier burdens, which can only benefit our rivals.

There is, however, this difference between the relations of this State to its salt springs, and that of other States to similar interests. The State is the owner of the springs, while everywhere else they are owned by private individuals or companies. On this distinction an argument is sometimes founded in favor of increased exactions upon the salt manufacture for the benefit of the public treasury. This argument is not based upon any real or supposed necessity of raising revenue from salt for the use of the State, and it has no relation to the policy or impolicy of singling out this branch of industry for taxation. It is, on the contrary, an argument founded on the theory that the salt produced from the brines of the State and sold in the market, is the product or result of a business carried on jointly by the State and the manufacturer, that each of the parties contributes capital or labor, or both, to the common enterprise, and therefore that the profits should be shared by the State and the manufacturer, according to some fixed rule of division between them. This view of the subject has been urged in the committee, and it is next to be considered. Proceeding on this theory we put aside all questions of mere revenue, of wise or unwise taxation. We have nothing to do with statesmanship, and we come down to a question simply and purely of equitable jurisprudence in a case of partnership or quasi-partnership between the State and the individual. In this view of the subject what are the existing rights of the parties? Is the State entitled to withdraw from the common concern any annual sum for its own use, and if so, what sum? This question depends upon facts easy to be ascertained and upon principles which have long been settled.

Pursuing the theory of the situation here suggested, it becomes necessary to know the amount of capital contributed by the State, and the manufacturers individually, and the sums received or withdrawn by each from the business, thus carried on in common. On the principles or analogies of a partnership or joint enterprise, there is no other mode of arriving at the existing equities between the parties The contributions of the State, then, are first a sum of money invested by the State in the year 1795, in the purchase of the springs and land around them from the Indians, amounting to about $11,000. That those springs have since become much more valuable is a fact wholly irrelevant to the question under consideration. The assumed partnership between the State and the manufacturers commenced with the original purchase of the property and, on a partnership accounting, the State is entitled to credit for the purchase-money only and the interest thereon. Again, if they have since become very valuable that result is wholly due to the private capital, labor and enterprise of the individuals who constitute the other party in the supposed association. It is enough for any present purpose to say that the increased value of the springs according to the plainest principles of law and equity, is to be regarded as equally for the benefit of both the parties, and gives the State no equity against the individual. It may be said that the State has always had the reserved power and right at fixed periods of time to dissolve the partnership, and take the exclusive possession and control of its property.

But this right can only be exercised on the fundamental condition that the State shall first compensate the individuals for their works and erections built upon the lands of the State, and dependent for their entire value upon the use of the brine from the springs. This condition flows from recognized principles of equity, and from an express provision of law in the nature of a pledge of the public faith. In the fulfillment of this equity and the redemption of this pledge the State would be obliged to pay to private parties and companies a sum much greater than any estimate which has ever been placed upon the value of the salt springs. Unless, therefore, the State shall see fit to sell the salt springs and lands around them it may be safely assumed that the property of the State and of the manufacturers is incapable of being divorced and must remain inseparably connected. The owners of the works and erections cannot dissolve this connection because their erections are incapable of removal from the lands of the State, or of use and enjoyment separate from the springs. The State cannot dissolve it because an exclusive possession cannot be taken except under the conditions already referred to, requiring compensation to be made to private owners, amounting, as will presently appear, to several millions of dollars.

The consideration paid by the State on the original purchase of the salt springs and reservation is not, however, by any means the whole of its expenditure. The superintendent of the springs has furnished to the committee a carefully prepared inventory and statement of all the other property of the State connected with these springs, consisting of salt wells, pumps, pump-houses, machinery, reservoirs, aqueducts, etc., the whole of which he has valued or estimated at $311,710. The original cost of these works, erections and fixtures does not precisely appear, and perhaps cannot be shown. But it is entirely safe to assume that such cost does not exceed the valuation just mentioned. The total investment made by the State, then, in the springs and salt reservation, and in all works and erections connected therewith, is the original purchase-money, about $11,000 added to this sum of $311,710, making in all $322,710.

We are next to look at the other side of the account in this common enterprise, and we have the data before us furnished by the superintendent. There are upon the salt reservation or upon other lands contiguous to the springs 316 salt blocks erected and owned by private parties, valued in the aggregate at $2,205,500. There are 44,083 solar salt vats and covers owned by individuals and companies valued in the aggregate at $2,381,517, and there are salt mills owned in like manner valued at $138,000. All these valuations amount to $4,725,017. From the evidence before the committee we consider this a high valuation, and very considerably in excess of the original cost. It will not at all affect the present question if we deduct over $2,000,000 and call the original cost of these works $2,700,000, or even $2,500,000. We reach then the following result: The original investment of the State in the springs, lands, and property used in the production of salt is $322,710. The original investment of private individuals and companies is at least $2,500,000, or between seven and eight times greater than that of the State. It can be said with truth that this private property is worthless without the salt springs. And so with equal truth it may be said that the springs would be of little value without the immense development they have reached through private capital and enterprise. The true mode of determining the equities between the parties is to compare the capital sums invested by each, and then to ascertain what has been drawn by each from the common concern.

And it remains, therefore, in order to have a complete view of the subject, to ascertain if possible the profits derived from the production of salt and the distribution of those profits. In the first place it will be found on examination that the expenditures of the State already referred to, incurred from time to time in erections and fixtures, have in all or most cases been reimbursed to the State during the year in which they were incurred out of the annual tax or duty upon salt, so that the capital sum invested by the State as above mentioned, almost wholly or entirely disappears from the account. But it is next to be stated that over and above the sums thus expended and reimbursed, the State has received, by and through the duties it has demanded, a net revenue of between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000. From 1825 to 1846, under the constitutional duty imposed for the purpose of paying the canal debt, the net revenue received by the State over all expenditures was $2,900,616.50. In the year last mentioned the duties were reduced to one cent per bushel, which has yielded to the present time $421,582.55. These sums, amounting in the aggregate to $3,322,199.05, are to be considerably increased by the net revenue received prior to 1825, which cannot be exactly ascertained.

Such, then, is the financial relation of the State to these springs and to the business of producing salt therefrom. But that business has been attended by no such results to the manufacturers. They have had times and seasons of prosperity and of adversity. It is the opinion of those who have had the longest acquaintance with the business, that it has not yielded to the manufacturer a profit in the aggregate equal to the annual interest upon the capital they have invested. The evidence before the committee leads to this conclusion. It appears, therefore, that while the State has been reimbursed its expenditure, and has demanded and received a revenue equal to ten times the capital invested by it, the profit to the manufacturers has returned no part of their capital, and has, in fact, been less than that yielded in most other branches of industry.

This exhibit of the financial relations of the State and the manufacturer to each other and to the subject, is made because and only because a higher rate of duty upon salt has been urged on the ground of a supposed equity between the parties. It is manifest that no such equity exists. On the contrary, according to this mode of treating the subject, some equality in the distribution of profit should be reached before the State can claim any thing beyond the expenses incidental to its care and management of the springs. This principle would postpone the claims of the State for a long period of time.

Plainly, therefore, some other principle must be invoked to justify the proposed imposition of a tax or duty for the purpose of public revenue; and the only other principle which can be invoked is that of taxation upon the product of a particular branch of industry. And on this subject we beg leave to call attention to some other considerations. If it could be shown that salt will bear a special and peculiar rate of taxation without serious and lasting injury to the industrial interest engaged in its production, and if that ability to bear the burden is made the ground for imposing it, the same rule of action would require us to examine into all other industrial pursuits and trades carried on in this State, and to tax them all at specific but varying rates, according to capacity of each to endure the imposition.

If any branch of human industry is found to be in a prosperous condition it must be reduced to the horizontal level of other branches by a special and compulsory contribution to the treasury of the State. This principle of taxation has never been adopted in this State. Taxation in this State is imposed at fixed and uniform rates upon all real and personal estate according to valuations entered upon the assessment rolls, and except the article of salt we have in our State laws and policy no example of specific duties upon property or production. And yet this article, the only one taxed or proposed to be taxed specifically, has, probably, higher claims than any other to total exemption from all taxation. According to the soundest and most approved maxims of statesmanship, articles of universal use and absolute necessity ought to be free from burdens imposed for public revenue, and among these, salt, more than any other product of human industry, is to be ranked. It is as necessary to life and comfort as the air we breathe. As a prime necessity of life in all ranks of society, taxation upon it was once eloquently denounced by a distinguished statesman in the Senate of the United States. He declared it to be a tax upon the entire economy of nature and art, a tax upon man and beast, upon life and health, upon comfort and luxury, upon want and superfluity. He called it a heartless and tyrant tax which no economy could avoid, no poverty could stem, no privation escape, no cunning elude, no force resist, no dexterity avert, no curse repulse, no prayers could deprecate, a tax which invaded the entire domain of human operations.

A rate of duty upon this article higher than the present one existed prior to 1846. When the Erie canal was projected and undertaken it was very justly considered that the development of the salt springs, the production of salt, the extension of the markets and economy in price, would be immensely promoted by the completion of that work. For that special purpose, and that alone, a duty of twelve and a half cents per bushel was imposed. This was a duty which, under an enlightened sense of what their true interests demanded, was self-sought and self-imposed by that portion of the people of the State who were producers and consumers of Onondaga salt. The Constitution of 1821 required this duty to be maintained until the debt contracted in the construction of the Erie canal should be paid. That object having been accomplished the duty had been reduced to a low standard by constitutional amendment and legislative drawbacks before the year 1846, when the whole subject underwent the careful consideration of the Legislature. In the Senate it was referred to a select committee consisting of three gentlemen of eminent ability, Joshua A. Spencer of Oneida, Augustus C. Hand of Essex, and John Porter of Cayuga. That committee, upon the most elaborate examination, came to a unanimous conclusion which may be stated in their own language; they said, "To continue the present tax could only be justified upon the principle that salt is a proper article on which to raise revenue. This is inadmissible as well upon the ground that it is taxing one of the most indispensable articles of consumption and general use, to meet the expenses of government, as that would be levying a tax upon a portion of the citizens of the State for the benefit of the whole State." They accordingly recommended a reduction of duty to a rate which as they thought would simply cover the expense of the State in its supervision of the springs.

These views of the future policy of the State were accepted with great unanimity by the Legislature of 1846, and the duty was accordingly reduced to one cent per bushel, which was the rate fixed upon, not for any purpose of deriving revenue from this source, but with the avowed object of protecting the State from loss in the care and superintendence of the salt springs and reservation. From 1846 to the present time neither the salt duty nor the policy of the State in this respect has undergone any change.

The report of the Senate committee just referred to, condemned the salt duty as a tax upon one portion of the people of the State for the benefit of the whole. This argument deserves a moment's consideration. If sound and accurate it ought to dispose of the question forever. Its soundness cannot be well impeached, but it will have a truer expression to say that such tax is upon one portion of the people, for the benefit not of the whole, but of another portion. Ordinarily, the Onondaga salt is consumed by about one-half the population of the State, residing in the central, northern and western divisions. In the more southern portions, upon the sea-board and tide-waters, foreign salt has been hitherto mainly used. Now, whatever tax is imposed upon salt it is an addition of just so much to the cost, and by an inexorable law of production and trade, this addition must be paid at last by the consumer. Nothing further can or need to be said to prove that what is gained by one portion of our people in the taxation of this article for revenue—that portion which does not consume the salt—is lost by that portion which does con-same the article and pay the tax upon it. This is a condition of the question which must endure and it seems to establish the permanent injustice and impolicy of the tax. There is a still broader aspect of the question. Suppose it were true that the Onondaga salt is now used and will hereafter be used by all the people of this State. This fact would relieve taxation upon it from the injustice of burdening one part of the inhabitants for the benefit of another, but the question would remain whether there would be wisdom or policy in this mode of raising revenue. This question, in the opinion of the undersigned, is not difficult to solve. In the first place, nothing would be gained, because whatever revenue is thus raised for the benefit of the whole people, is paid by the whole people in the increased cost of production and price of the article. This proposition is one of mathematical precision, unless it can be shown that you may levy an internal tax on an article produced by labor and capital without adding to its cost. This surely, no one will pretend. If you tax the article you do not thereby diminish the capital or cost of labor required in its production. The cost of transportation to the consumer remains the same. You must add the tax, and the consumer must pay it. Nothing therefore is gained to the people of the State by levying in this manner a contribution to the public revenue. It may lessen to an inconsiderable degree taxation upon their lands and personal estates, but the same burden is transferred to an article of universal consumption. And in the next place we encounter the objection that without profit or rational motive, a single article of prime necessity is singled out for a specific duty in opposition to all our laws and rules of taxation, and to the most commonly received maxims of statesmanship.

The force of this argument would be in some degree modified if it were true that the increased cost of salt arising from taxation upon the article is now paid and will hereafter be paid by the people of other States who are or may be consumers. In that aspect of the question the tax might have an intelligible although an unjustifiable motive. But the tax is not and never will be paid by consumers in other States. It must and will be paid by the people of our own State who are compelled to use the Onondaga salt. The rule that the consumer pays the increased cost arising from taxation implies that a competing article equally adapted to his use and exempt from the tax is not within his reach. If it is within his reach the producer who is subject to the tax must either not sell at all or must sell at prices which are governed by the exempted competing article. Let us now look at the facts relating to the trade in Onondaga salt which the committee have carefully ascertained; something less than 2,000,000 of bushels of Onondaga salt are annually sold in the northern, central, and western portions of New York, and in the northern counties of Pennsylvania. In all this territory here mentioned, embracing a population of about 2,000,000, our salt meets virtually no competition, and has now for several years been sold at $2.25 per barrel, with cost of transportation added. At the exterior lines of this territory competition with other salts is encountered which requires the Onondaga manufacturer to go no further with his product or else to reduce the price, and the further these exterior lines of his trade are extended the more his prices must be reduced. It is both his policy and his interest to carry his salt further and further, until he reaches points where he cannot sell except at a positive loss, and both policy and interest will often prompt him to encounter temporary loss for the sake of keeping his ground in a close and disputed market. This general statement of the condition of the market, the accuracy of which is abundantly verified by the evidence before the committee, demonstrates that every addition to the cost of salt contracts the circle of exclusive trade, and contracts also the wider circle of territory in which competition can be maintained. Fully three-fourths of all the salt made from the Onondaga springs is sold in that outer circle of trade, where the people of this and other States are supplied from other sources, both foreign and domestic. In New York, and upon our tide-waters, and in those parts of New England which we can reach at all, the foreign article is met in great abundance. Last year the Onondaga manufacturers sold some 700,000 bushels in New York and neighboring markets at less than cost. In the same year nearly 4,000,000 of bushels were carried to the Western and North-western States, and sold with a very slight profit, or none whatever. There are some facts and figures verified before the committee which are very convincing on this subject. The salt manufacture has been carried on for several years past by a single company, organized under the laws of the State, which has conducted the business with vigor and with the greatest possible economy, undoubtedly, as the members of this committee believe, with much greater economy than would be possible under other circumstances. The books of the company have been produced and verified before us, which show that in the year ending in April, 1867, the aggregate profit made by the company was $107,016.58, including in the expenses a fair return in the nature of rent to the individual proprietors of the salt works. In producing this result, a cash capital was necessarily employed throughout the year, averaging at least one and a quarter million of dollars. Now this profit was wholly realized from sales in that limited district of territory already referred to, and lying almost wholly in this State, where the prices demanded were unaffected by competition with other salt. This general fact, in regard to which the slightest doubt does not exist, clearly proves that an increased cost of the article, arising from additional duties, must be drawn from consumers within the restricted market referred to, and therefore drawn from the people of this State. This is plain because the manufacturers could not maintain their ground at all in other and more distant markets without actual and serious loss.

If a more precise demonstration of this result is required, the following facts and figures are stated:

In 1866, the cost of producing a barrel of boiled salt at the works was $1.85; of solar salt, $1.55.

Digitized by Google

The quantity of boiled salt being about 5,000,000 of bushels, and of solar about 2,000,000; the average cost at the works was, therefore, $1.77. The cost of transporting salt during the year to the ports of Lakes Erie, St. Clair and Michigan, and cost of agencies in those ports, in storing, handling and selling salt, was thirty-eight cents per bushel. To this must be added the interest on $1,250,000, cash capital constantly used in the producing and transporting the salt, amounting to six (6) cents per barrel. These items make a total cost of the Onondaga salt in the western markets of $2.21 per barrel. Now, the evidence shows that the average highest price at which Onondaga salt could be sold during the year at Chicago, the greatest of all our western markets, was only $2.25 per barrel, and that in all the markets on Lakes Erie and Michigan, the salt from Saginaw, in the State of Michigan, was selling at from five cents to ten cents per barrel cheaper. It is seen at a glance that no appreciable profit in these markets was left for the Onondaga manufacturer. Against the keen and active competition with the Saginaw salt, on the upper Mississippi it was and generally is a question of selling at these reduced prices or of abandoning the market. So far, however, it has been the settled policy, not less than the interest of the manufacturers, to maintain their ground in these markets as far as possible, because, in the vicissitudes of trade, higher and better prices sometimes occur. During the same year of 1866, the sales in the city of New York, as already stated, resulted in actual loss, it being proved that such sales netted at Syracuse only $1.60 to $1.75 per barrel, which is less than the cost of production at the springs.

The close and active competition disclosed by these statements in what may be called our exterior markets, including the most populous portion of our own State, must always continue. While the salt markets of the West are gradually extending with the increasing population, the salines of that region, and especially those of Saginaw, are annually rising in importance. The importation of cheap salt from foreign countries will always continue. There is no reason, therefore, for supposing that the salt of the Onondaga springs will enjoy in the future any greater advantages over other interests competing in the markets of the country than it now does. It must be evident, moreover, that any addition to the cost which will overcome entirely the narrow margin of profit which the manufacturer can now realize in the contested markets, would compel him either to withdraw from such markets or to charge the increased cost upon the consumers in this State who have no other sources of supply. This inevitable condition of the trade presents, therefore, first, the question, shall the salt of this State be sent as heretofore to buyers and consumers in other States, and the duty upon it imposed for revenue be paid by consumers at home? As this is clearly inadmissible, then, second, shall the production be reduced to one-half or one-third of its present amount? The only other solution rendered possible by the situation is not to impose the tax at all.

And to that conclusion the undersigned comes without hesitation. It is a conclusion fortified by other considerations, upon which there is no time to dwell at large. For example, the tolls upon the canals of this State annually paid by the Onondaga salt are about $100,000, and to this must be added the tolls upon 100,000 to 150,000 tons of coal annually transported upon the canals to the salt works and used for fuel in the manufacture. As almost the entire production of salt, as well as all the coal so used, is moved by the canal, the one from and the other to the works, the more the manufacture is depressed and reduced the more the State suffers in its canal revenues. And there are also important industrial interests involved in the question. A very large capital is invested, and hundreds of men are employed in the production and preparation of fuel. The actual manufacture of salt employs an immense industry. One million four hundred thousand barrels and bags are required as packages, giving employment to great numbers of persons in the manufacture of these articles. The articles of salt and coal furnish to our canals annually nearly 400,000 tons of freight, employing a great number of boats and greater numbers of boatmen. A large amount of shipping upon the lakes on our border is freighted with salt for the Western States. All these interests must be directly and injuriously affected by any policy which depresses and reduces the production and sale of our salt. But as all industrial pursuits have mutual and dependent relations, there are many trades and occupations to be more remotely and indirectly affected by such a policy. The great interest of agriculture is deeply concerned, for that interest demands the article of salt at the cheapest attainable rate. The undersigned is not able even to say with certainty that the direct revenues of the State would be increased by the tax or duty in question. He repeats, you cannot impose a new burden of any amount without increasing the cost and contracting the area of the markets; what is gained in the amount of tax on the bushel may be wholly lost in the diminished number of bushels produced and sold. That the revenues would not be increased is a result of which there can be little doubt when we take into consideration, also, the diminution of canal tolls upon coal and salt, certain to result from the contraction and depression of the salt manufacture. The undersigned, therefore, believing that in all points of view it is impolitic and unwise to look to this source for public revenue, that it never can be politic or wise so to do; believing also that the subject should be at rest from periodical and unwholesome agitation in the Legislature or elsewhere, recommends that the following provision be inserted in the Constitution, viz.: "The Legislature may appropriate moneys for the development of the salt springs of this State, and to pay the expenses of the care and management of said springs, of the property of the State connected therewith, and of the inspection of salt; but all moneys so expended shall be reimbursed to the treasury as soon as practicable, by a duty on salt. No other or further duty on salt shall be imposed."

I concur in the foregoing report as to the impolicy of imposing by constitutional provision an additional tax or duty on salt, believing that the subject belongs to the Legislature. I also concur in the report made by the chairman of the committee so far as the same recommends a removal of the existing restraint upon the sale of the salt springs and reservation.

SOLOMON G. YOUNG.

The report was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That when the Convention adjourns to-day it adjourns until Monday evening at seven o'clock.

The question was put on the resolution offered by Mr. Van Campen, and was declared carried.

Mr. BICKFORD offered the following resolution:

WHEREAS, It is now apparent that this Convention will be unable to complete its labors, according to the plan now pursued, before the meeting of the Legislature; and

WHEREAS, It will be inconvenient, and to many of us objectionable, either to continue our labors in Albany during the session of the Legislature, or to remove to any other place, or to adjourn till after the session of the Legislature; and

WHEREAS, We believe that we may soon complete the article on the judiciary; and

WHEREAS, Reports and subjects not yet acted upon are not of pressing importance, mostly treating of matters outside of the present Constitution; and

WHEREAS, We are anxious to bring the session of this Convention to a close, a desire which we believe is shared by the people; therefore

Resolved, That this Convention will on Monday, December 23, 1867, at 9 o'clock, P. M., take a recess until Thursday, January 2, 1868, at 7 o'clock, P. M., and that the Committee on Revision be instructed to make their final report at the time last named; and that on all subjects on which the Convention shall not then have acted the said committee shall incorporate in their report the provisions of the Constitution of 1846, and that this Convention will adjourn sine die on Tuesday, January 7, 1868, at 11 o'clock, A. M.

Objection being made to the immediate consideration of the resolution of Mr. Bickford, it was laid on the table under the rule.

Mr. HARDENBURGH offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That five hundred extra copies of the report of the select Committee on Bribery and Corruption be printed for the use of the Convention.

Which was referred to the standing Committee on Printing.

Mr. MAGEE—If I am in order, I wish to offer a proposition to the Convention. I was not present when the subject of taxation was discussed. I have examined it with care—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman may offer any resolution he has under the head of resolutions.

Mr. MAGEE—I have an amendment to the fifteenth section of the finance report, which I propose to submit.

The PRESIDENT—The resolution may be received at this stage by unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and read by the SECRETARY, as follows:

"Except that the Legislature may from time to time provide for a specific tax of not more than two per centum per annum, upon all incorporated capital, including the associated capital of all special partnerships enjoying special privileges and immunity from general liability, under the laws of this State, the proceeds of such tax to be paid into the State treasury, for the purposes of the State at large. Such tax may be levied upon and collected from the corporations and partnerships themselves, or, pro rata, upon the shares or interests therein, against the owners and holders thereof, as the Legislature may direct, and in such manner as they shall provide by law. The payment of such tax shall exempt such corporations and partnerships, and the shareholders and persons having interests therein, to be taxed from any other tax thereon, for any purpose whatever. No taxes shall be levied upon any other property than that above defined, for general State purposes, except in case of war and insurrection."

Mr. MAGEE—I move that the resolution be laid upon the table and be printed.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Magee, and it was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT—The Convention will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of the Judiciary.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I should be very willing and glad to go again in Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, if I could see any thing to be gained by it; but I am satisfied we could make no useful progress whatever. No important question can be settled by the number of members present this morning. I therefore renew the motion that the Convention adjourn.

Mr. RATHBUN demanded the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. MAGEE—If permitted, I would like to submit a very few remarks on the amendment I have offered.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will inform the gentleman from Schuyler [Mr. Magee] that remarks on his proposition are not now in order.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Comstock, to adjourn, and it resulted in the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. C. L. Allen, Axtell, Baker, Cassidy, Clarke, Comstock, Corbett, Corning, Ely, Ferry, Fuller, Hale, Hardenburgh, Harris, Houston, Ludington, Magee, Merrill, Merwin, Miller, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, Prindle, Prosser, Rathbun, Rogers, Roy, Spencer, Van Campen —29.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Barker, Beckwith, Bell, Bickford, Bowen, E. A. Brown, Case, Cooke, Endress, Fowler, Francis, Gould, Graves, Hammond, Hand, Hitchcock, Ketcham, Kinney, Krum, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Merritt, Potter, President, Reynolds, Seaver, Smith, S. Townsend, Wakeman, Wales, Williams —34.

The PRESIDENT—It is apparent that there is no quorum present, and in the absence of a call of the Convention the Chair has no alternative but to adjourn the Convention. This Convention stands adjourned until Monday evening next at seven o'clock.

So the Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, December 16, 1867.

The Convention met at seven P. M., pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by Rev. BERNARD McMANUS.

The Journal of Saturday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. GOULD—Mr. Reynolds, of Monroe, has received a telegram announcing the very dangerous illness of his father; and I move that he be granted indefinite leave of absence.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. GOULD—I am cited to attend at the surrogate's court on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week. I therefore ask leave of absence for myself for that purpose.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. HATCH—I have a resolution which I desire to offer; and I will say, in explanation of my offering it at this time, that it is a resolution instructing the Committee on Revision to add the financial section stated in it, which I omitted to present when the Committee of the Whole had the subject-matter of the finances in charge, for the reason that there was a very thin attendance, and also for the excellent reason that, from the manifestations of the disposition of the committee, I was satisfied there was a majority present that would not regard it favorably. I propose now to reach it in this form and to have the resolution lie upon the table so that I can call it up when that order of business is reached, and when there is a fuller attendance. If there ever is a fuller attendance here, I shall call it up and present some considerations why I think it should be adopted by the Convention and placed in the organic law of the State—fixing and declaring a State policy hereafter toward our canal system:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to add the following to the article upon finances:

"After the payment of all the debts for which the canal revenues are now pledged, and after all advances with interest thereon heretofore or hereafter made for canal purposes shall be repaid, no more or greater tolls shall ever thereafter be imposed, charged or levied upon property transported on the canals, than shall be sufficient for ordinary repairs and further necessary improvement."

I will simply add, sir, if there is no objection to it, that this financial section has received the approval of two-thirds of the Finance Committee.

The resolution was laid on the table under the rule.

Mr. ALVORD—It is evident that there is not a quorum here, and I move a call of the roll.

The SECRETARY called the list of delegates, when the following members answered to their names:

Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Axtell, Baker, Barker, Beals, Bell, E. A. Brown, Case, Comstock, Cooke, Corning, Curtis, Daly, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Endress, Farnum, Ferry, Fowler, Fuller, Gould, Graves, Hadley, Hale, Hand, Hardenburgh, Hatch, Hitchcock, Houston, Ketcham, Kinney, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Ludington, Magee, Mattice, Merrill, Merritt, Merwin, Miller, C. E. Parker, Potter, President, Prindle, Rathbun, Seaver, Smith, Spencer, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Van Campen, Wakeman, Wales, Williams, Young—58.

The PRESIDENT—There is no quorum present.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I move that the Convention adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Hardenburgh, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 17, 1867.

The Convention met at ten A. M. pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. BERNARD McMANUS.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. BEADLE presented a remonstrance of the citizens of Elmira against the abolition of the Board of Regents.

Which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I ask for the consideration of the resolution offered by me on Friday.

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

WHEREAS, Any provision which can be adopted by this Convention for the suppression of bribery and corruption in legislative and State offices, if accepted by the people of the State, cannot take effect for a long time yet to come; and

WHEREAS, The offenses referred to are now so frequent as to produce alarm in the minds of all good citizens; and

WHEREAS, Except in rare instances there have been no adequate attempts to ferret out or punish offenders of this character; and

WHEREAS, The punishment of such offenses is a matter in which every portion of the State is equally concerned; therefore

Resolved, That the Legislature be and they are hereby respectfully requested to pass such needful and proper laws as shall provide for the payment by the State of all such necessary expenses as shall be incurred by any county in prosecutions for such offenses, and as shall secure the efficient aid of prosecuting officers in ferreting out and punishing the guilty.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I desire the consideration of this resolution now, without any reference whatever to the measures which the Convention may eventually see fit to adopt for the suppression of the evils to which the resolution relates. The resolution is offered simply for the purpose of covering the time that must necessarily elapse between the present moment and that when any constitutional provision which the Convention may recommend to the people can take effect. For the purpose of determining whether any action upon this subject is proper, I deem it becoming to state, that the recommendation of the resolution is not a new act on the part of this Convention. We have conferred with other bodies and other officers in regard to matters of this character. We have called upon the committee of the Senate engaged in the investigation of canal frauds, and have received communications from them. We have recommended action to the Attorney-General that he should institute legal proceedings for the vacating of contracts which have clearly obtained by fraud; so that the measure which I now propose is entirely consistent with the previous action of this Convention. A more important question, as I deem it, is this: Is there any reasonable prospect that it is practicable under the laws as they now exist, and under the Constitution as it now exists, for the Legislature to set machinery in motion by which this gigantic evil can be checked? And for the purpose of determining this question I propose to review briefly the legislation which has been had upon this subject, and the decisions of the courts in reference to the effect and constitutionality of that legislation. By the Revised Statutes as originally enacted, chapter 1, part 4, article 3, title 4, section 9, all acts of bribery and attempting to bribe the Governor, the State officers, members of the Legislatures, etc., were made penal offenses, and the persons committing these offenses were subjected to imprisonment in the State prison for a period not exceeding ten years, or to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or both, in the discretion of the court. By the tenth section, the accepting of a bribe, on the part of any of these officers, was punished with a like penalty and with a forfeiture of office. By the eleventh section, persons drawn as jurors were liable to punishment for accepting bribes, by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or to the payment of a fine not exceeding a thousand dollars, or to both these penalties, in the discretion of the court; and it was further provided, that any person who attempted to corrupt a juror should be subjected to the same punishment as the juror himself was subjected to when guilty of this offense. But there were found to be difficulties in the enforcement of these provisions of the Revised Statutes, and in 1853 the breadth of our legislation upon this subject was increased; and it is rather to the present condition of the law, as established by the Laws of 1853, that I wish to call the attention of the Convention, than to the original condition in the Revised Statutes. By chapter 539 of the Laws of 1853, page 1011, the original legislation against attempts to bribe, and against those who actually bribe public officers, was somewhat extended, but the penalties were left the same. By the tenth section, the description of the punishment, or rather of the offense of a State officer or member of the Legislature who should accept a bribe, was somewhat more extended, but the offense was punished with the same penalties. The punishment for jurors who were guilty of receiving bribes and of persons who attempt to corrupt jurors was left the same, but there was an additional provision adopted, that any person engaged directly or indirectly in the business of influencing the action of public officers from corrupt motives, should come within the provisions of the statute. In the thirteenth section of that act, it is enacted that "every person who shall knowingly bear or convey any such gift, gratuity or proposal, or shall in any manner negotiate between any other persons for any violation of either of the provisions of the preceding sections of this article shall, upon conviction be punished in the same manner as persons receiving bribes, except the forfeiture of office." So that if the law of 1853 can be enforced, or if an attempt were fairly made to enforce it, this whole business of spending winters at the capital for the purpose of bribing your legislators and State officers to violate their duty and to trifle with and pervert the interests of the people, might be swept away under the statute, as it is, without any additional enactments. For the purpose of making this statute effectual the Legislature added the fourteenth section, which provides that "every person offending against either of the provisions of the preceding sections of this article shall be a competent witness against any other person so offending, and may be compelled to appear and give evidence before any magistrate or grand jury, or in any court in the same manner as other persons; but the testimony so given shall not be used in any prosecution or proceeding, civil or criminal, against the person so testifying." It is further provided in the fifteenth section that a person, who shall refuse to testify, shall be liable to prosecution for such refusal, and shall be liable to be punished by the court as for a contempt of court, and by imprisonment during the pleasure of the court and until he shall consent to testify; and further, that if a person thus liable to testify shall be called upon and brought into court upon the trial of an indictment, and shall refuse to testify upon that trial, the person accused shall not therefore go unwhipt of justice, but that the court shall have the right to withdraw a juror and suffer the trial to go over until the time shall arrive when such person shall consent to testify and relieve himself of imprisonment. Such are the provisions of the law as they stood in 1853, and as they stand upon the statute book to day. But it may well be said that, if these provisions of the law are thus stringent, it is useless to ask the Legislature to take action, provided that the legislation of 1853 is in violation of the Constitution of this State, or in violation of the Constitution of the United States, or so in conflict with the common law of the country that it cannot be enforced. The question of the validity of that legislation is a pertinent one, and if these provisions of the Laws of 1853 cannot be enforced, it would be idle for this Convention to pass the resolution now under consideration, and it would be the duty of the Convention, if it saw any other short road of reaching an evil of this great magnitude, to adopt that road rather than this. But fortunately we are not left to conjecture upon the subject of the constitutionality of this legislation. We have the unanimous decision of our court of appeals, made at the time when the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] was president of the court, and when the opinion of the court was given by that eminent jurist, Judge Denio. It was in the case of The People v. Hackley (24 New York Reports, 74). In 1857 the provisions of this law of 1853, in regard to the bribery of State officers, were extended and made applicable to the authorities of the city of New York, and by the law of that year it was made a similar offense to bribe or attempt to bribe any officer in the city of New York engaged in a public capacity, and the same provision was made in regard to the right to call witnesses, and the same duty and the same penalties were imposed upon recusant witnesses in such cases as in cases of bribery of State officers. The case of Hackley was one of those strange cases in the history of this State where an attempt was made to enforce the laws as they existed against bribery and corruption. Andrew J. Hackley was called before the grand jury in the city of New York and sworn as a witness; and I confess to a little desire that my colleagues in this Convention should do me the personal favor of noticing precisely how this law was interpreted by the courts, because, for reasons that will be understood by the Convention, I am somewhat solicitous that we should all understand precisely the present state of the law. This question was put to Hackley: "What did you do with the pile of bills received from Thomas Hope, and which he told you amounted to fifty thousand dollars?" and the said Andrew J. Hackley, then and there, instead of answering the said interrogatory, stated as follows, to wit: "Any answer which I could give to that question would disgrace me, and would have a tendency to accuse me of a crime. I therefore demur to the question, referring to the ancient common law rule that no man is held to accuse himself, and to the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution of this State." Now, that section of the Constitution is that, "no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," and that is precisely the same form of words that exists in the Constitution of the United States. This man Hackley put himself upon three grounds, first, that it would disgrace him, and that, therefore, he was exempt from answering; second, that it would render him liable to be brought into like peril with the person then accused, and therefore that he was not obliged to answer; and, third, that he was protected under the Constitution of the State. And is there any other reason conceivable, why a witness should refuse to answer a question pertinent to the matter under investigation, and fairly put to him when he was sworn as a witness to tell the whole truth, except these three reasons given by Hackley? And if the court of last resort in this State has decided that it was constitutional to compel a witness to answer, under such circumstances, is there then any constitutional difficulty in the way of enforcing the law as it now exists? This case is found in 24th New York Reports, page 74. Beginning at page 80, Judge Denio says:

"The bribery act of 1853 declares the giving to or receiving money, etc., by any of divers public officers named, including any member of a common council of a city, with a view to influence their action upon any matter which may come officially before them, an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment in a State prison. For the purpose of enabling the public to avail itself of the testimony of a participator in the offense, the fourteenth section provides as follows: 'Every person offending against either of the preceding sections of this article shall be a competent witness against any other person so offending, and may be compelled to appear and give evidence before any magistrate or grand jury, or in any court in the the same manner as other persons; but the testimony so given shall not be used in any prosecution or proceeding, civil or criminal, against the person so testifying.' [Ch. 539.] A similar provision is found in an act to amend the charter of the city of New York, passed in 1857. The fifty-second section relates to bribes of the members of the common council and the officers of the corporation, making the giving and the receiving of bribes highly criminal, and concluding with an enactment substantially similar to the fourteenth section of the act of 1853. The design was to enable either party concerned in the commission of an offense against the act, to be examined as a witness by the grand jury or public officer intrusted with the prosecution. The question to be determined is, whether these provisions are consistent with the true sense of the constitutional declaration that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. (Art. 1, § 6). The primary and most obvious sense of the mandate is that a person prosecuted for a crime shall not be compelled to give evidence on behalf of the prosecution against himself in that case. It is argued that no such narrow and verbal construction could have been in the view of the authors of the article, for the reason that no such atrocious procedure as that supposed has been tolerated in civilized countries in modern times. But constitutional provisions are not leveled solely at the evils most current at the times in which they are adopted, but, while embracing these, they look to the history of the abuses of political society in times past, and in other countries, and endeavor to form a system which shall protect the members of the State against those acts of oppression and mis-government which unrestrained political or judicial power are always and everywhere most apt to fall into. (See the observations of Chief Justice Spencer on this subject, reported in 18 Johns., 202.) The history of England in early periods furnishes abundant instances of unjustifiable and cruel methods of extorting confessions, and the practice at this day in the criminal tribunals, in the most polished countries in continental Europe, is to subject an accused person to a course of interrogatories which would be quite revolting to a mind accustomed only to the more humane system of English and American criminal law. It was not, therefore, unreasonable to guard by constitutional sanctions against a repetition of such practices in this State: and it is not at all improbable that the true intention of the provision in question corresponds with the natural construction of the language. But there is great force in the argument that constitutional provisions devised against governmental oppression, and especially against such as may be exercised under pretense of judicial power, ought to be construed with the utmost liberality, and to be extended so as to accomplish the full object which the author apparently had in view, so far as it can be done consistently with any fair interpretation of the language employed. The mandate that an accused person should not be compelled to give evidence against himself would fail to secure the whole object intended if a prosecutor might call an accomplice or confederate in a criminal offense, and afterward use the evidence he might give to procure a conviction on the trial of an indictment against him. If obliged to testify on the trial of the co-offender to matters which would show his own complicity, it might be said, upon a very liberal construction of the language, that he was compelled to give evidence against himself; that is, to give evidence which might be used in a criminal case against himself. It is perfectly well settled that where there is no legal provision to protect the witness against the reading of the testimony on his own trial, he cannot be compelled to answer. (The People v. Mather, 4 Wend., 229, and cases there referred to.) This course of adjudication does not result from any judicial construction of the Constitution, but is a branch of the common law doctrine, which excuses a person from giving testimony which will tend to disgrace him, to charge him with a penalty or forfeiture, or to convict him of a crime. It is, of course, competent for the Legislature to change any doctrine of the common law, but I think they could not compel a witness to testify on the trial of another person to facts which would prove himself guilty of a crime without indemnifying him against the consequences, because, I think, as has been mentioned, that by a legal construction, the Constitution would be found to forbid it. But it is proposed by the appellant's counsel to push the construction of the Constitution a step further. A person is not only not compellable to be a witness against himself in his own cause, or to testify to the truth in a prosecution against another person where the evidence given if used as his admission, might tend to convict himself if he should be afterward prosecuted, but he is still privileged from answering, though he is secured against his answers being repeated to his prejudice on another trial against himself. It is no doubt true that a precise account of the circumstances of a given crime would afford a prosecutor some facilities for fastening the guilt upon the actual offender, though he were not permitted to prove such account upon the trial. The possession of the circumstances might point out to him sources of evidence which he would otherwise be ignorant of, and in this way the witness might be prejudiced. But neither the law nor the Constitution is so sedulous to screen the guilty as the argument supposes. If a man cannot give evidence upon the trial of another person without disclosing circumstances which will make his own guilt apparent, or at least capable of proof, though his account of the transaction should never be used as evidence, it is the misfortune of his condition and not any want of humanity in the law. If a witness objects to a question on the ground that an answer would criminate himself, he must allege, in substance, that his answer, if repeated as his admission on his own trial, would tend to prove him guilty of a criminal offense. If the case is so situated that a repetition of it on a prosecution against him is impossible, as where it is forbidden by a positive statute, I have seen no authority which holds or intimates that the witness is privileged. It is not within any reasonable construction of the language of the constitutional provision."

I need not read further; suffice it to say that, when this man Hackley was required by the grand jury to answer the question as to what he did with the money which it was alleged was to be used to bribe an officer of the city government, and when he refused to answer it, the court committed him for contempt; and when it finally came before the court of appeals, it was decided, with the concurrence of every member of that court, Judge Denio giving the opinion, and Judge Comstock presiding at the hearing, that he was obliged to answer: so that, whatever we may have after the Convention shall have taken such action as it deems proper upon this subject, we have now, in the State of New York, a system of penalties for the punishment of bribery and corruption, both on the part of officers who receive and those who offer or give the bribe, astonishingly minute, and to a great degree adequately severe, so that every creature connected with the commission of this crime against God, man, and society, could be compelled to answer as a witness in any such investigation. Now, will it do for this Convention to say that we will not do what in us lies, to provide for the punishment of such offenses during the period which must intervene between this time and the time when our Constitution shall be adopted by the people and shall take effect? I weighed well the consequences of offering this proposition. I know that so long as we talk here against this corruption, and talk wisely and properly in denunciatory strains, taking no action, the whole foul brood of ill-omened birds, whether in the city or elsewhere, would sit quietly and approve; but I knew, too, sir, that the moment a movement on my part was made, to cause some action to be taken for the prevention and punishment of offenses of this character, it would draw upon me the wrath of that ill-omened and foul brood of unclean birds that annually haunt the halls of this capitol, and pollute with their noisome breath the very atmosphere in which we are now living and moving. I knew that every press that could be brought into the service of the lobby would ring with denunciations of any one who should dare to take any action in this matter calculated to interfere with their foul trade; but you, Mr. President, imposed upon me the duty of sitting upon a committee for ascertaining not only what the laws should be and what the Constitution should be, but also the somewhat unusual duty of finding out what the law is; and I felt that under my oath I could not sit here and refuse to take such action as could be taken for the temporary suppression of this offense until the final action of this Convention (whatever it may be) could be brought to bear for the protection and the well being of the State. Why, sir, what is the state of opinion that exists? The report of the majority of the committee shows that a single institution last winter paid $205,000 in bribes to the Legislature, and enough was ascertained by that committee to show that at least half a million dollars of ready money was disbursed here at that time, and is disbursed here every year in corrupting the servants of the people, sent here by them to legislate for their interests. Is this an evil of moderate magnitude? Why, sir, take another phase of this matter. In view of the law of 1853, what is to prevent the indictment of the treasurer of the New York Central railroad? and if he has sworn to the truth that the president of that road took the money from him and sent it to the Delavan House to be used in corrupting the Legislature, what is to prevent the president of that road from being consigned to a felon's cell for ten years? These, sir, are the practices now common in this State; and these things are practiced by some of the richest, most honored and most eminent persons in the State. But, sir, if the laws were enforced, these persons would be brought to punishment, and every officer of the Central railroad, every messenger engaged in carrying those packages of bills up to the Delavan Hotel for distribution there, with a view of their eventually reaching the Legislature, is liable to ten years' imprisonment in the State prison under the law! Yet nothing is done. Sir, we might talk about this matter till we die; we may study to find striking phrases in which to denounce it until they are turned so finely and beautifully that they would astonish the ancient orators; but our talk will have no effect. We must do something. Now, what is the reason why official corruption has not been punished? Sir, I say, without fear of contradiction, that, it is because it has not been prosecuted. And if it shall not be punished for the time to come, it will be because it will not be prosecuted. I undertake to say that the services of an honest lawyer, if such a man can be found, and of one detective of ordinary intelligence, would secure the discovery and punishment of fifty individuals for bribery committed during the last year; and in this statement I shall be borne out by all gentlemen here who know any thing about criminal proceedings. Now, should we not take some means by which to secure the prosecution of these criminals? See what is coming? Already we begin to see these foul creatures gathering here for the next session of the Legislature. Already the birds are flapping their wings in the breeze, and that is one reason why a great many of our members desire to go away from this city. They are not afraid of the men who are inside of the Legislature, because the great body of the legislators who come here are, when they first come, honest men; but it is well understood that we have a corps of these creatures who have been for the last twenty or thirty years hangers-on about these halls, and who stand here always ready to train young novitiates in the ways of crime. They seize upon a young member from the country, who comes here with his pockets bare, and with nothing but his virtue. They teach him first where to play whist; they teach him where the best whisky can be had; they take him to theatrical entertainments, and then, if he is found to exhibit a taste for it, they take him to where he can see the elephant. [Laughter.] And then, perhaps, they begin to show him the other mysteries of the picture. For one, sir, I confess that I cannot sit still and permit these men to go unwhipped of justice, when our statute books are full of provisions for their detection and punishment, and when the only obstacle in the way is the want of vigorous prosecutions. Many of these men have been presented before the grand jury of Albany. Some of them have been presented before the grand jury of my own county. One man is elected to sit in this hall in the Assembly who was once indicted by the grand jury of my county for the giving of bribes, but the district attorney of that county entered a nolle prosequi and the district attorneys of other counties in which indictments were found have entered a nolle prosequi; although, as I have said, it is an exceedingly rare thing to find these criminals indicted at all. Now, we may say that grand juries should be very virtuous, and that when a case of this character is presented before them, they ought to indict without reference to any other consideration but their oaths. But a grand juror, when he sits in yonder hall in this county, knows that, if he finds a bill of indictment in such a case, it will probably entail an expense of five thousand, ten thousand, or even twenty thousand dollars, which must be paid by the county of Albany, because there is no provision for the payment fo such expenses by the State. A man comes here from some distant county—perhaps, for instance, from Chautauqua [laughter]—and he bribes a State officer, or attempts to bribe some State officer, and is presented therefor before the grand jury of this county for indictment. Each member of that grand jury, being but human, and perhaps not as conscientious as he would be if he sat in a body like this, says to himself, "This is simply a call upon us to incur expenses which I and my children and my neighbors will have to pay for the benefit of the county of Chautauqua. We will not present this; we will wait rather than load down this county with the expense." Now, for myself, I deem it unwise to present the matter in that shape to the grand jurors of the county of Albany. This State can better afford to expend a large sum of money every year for the punishment of offenses of this character than to have them continue. If they are not stopped, sir, where is to be the end? The report of the majority shows that a railway company in the city of New York appropriated a hundred thousand dollars of its stock to be distributed among members of the Legislature if a certain bill should pass. On another occasion, a company appropriated sixty thousand dollars to bribe members of the Legislature, and on another occasion twenty thousand dollars were appropriated for the same purpose; and above all we have the case of the New York Central railroad company, an institution suffering, almost dying and going out of existence from the hardships imposed upon it, expending the sum of two hundred and five thousand dollars within eight months past for the purpose of bribing its schemes through the Legislature. It does seem to me that the Legislature ought to provide for the payment of the expenses of these prosecutions. I have not suggested in this resolution that provision should be made for the payment of district attorneys, but propose to say that there ought to be adopted by the Legislature such provisions as in their wisdom the exigencies of the case demand to compel district attorneys to prosecute these offenses. And allow me to say here, for I deem it due to the subject, that the district attorney must look up these offenses if they are ever to be punished. It is very rare indeed to find a man that will do as the man Willson has done, who stands out as a phœnix—one in a century. A man who will go to the Legislature and do all he can to corrupt them, and then turn around and voluntarily complain of those that he has sought to seduce, is indeed a rara avis. The prosecuting officers of this State must become detective officers and seek out the perpetrators of these crimes. They have got to develop them upon their own motion or they never will be developed or punished at all. But it may be said that the Legislature has already got so corrupt that there is no use in asking them to do any thing. Sir, I do not believe it. I believe that there is an immense amount of corruption practiced by those who are elected to the Assembly and to the Senate, but I do not believe that it has often, if it has ever occurred, that a majority of either of those bodies have knowingly fallen into the hands of the corruptionists. At all events, I hope better things from the Legislature now elected. We have in this body three members of the lower house and three members of the upper house, and we can certainly rely upon a good report from these gentlemen in the next Legislature. If this amendment which I now propose is wise in its scope, I hope the Convention will adopt it without in any respect prejudging what it will be wise or proper for us to do in modeling the Constitution to meet this same evil, when we come to that. I have designed this resolution simply as a temporary measure, and it is drawn so as to commit us to nothing but to a temporary remedy for the state of things now existing until our Constitution can be adopted by the people and can take effect; and I hope that now during this intervening period that something will be done to make us feel that while we sleep in our beds, the property, the safety and the liberties of the people of this State are not being bought and sold by a corrupt brood of lobbyists, or by interested and corrupt corporations.

Mr. OPDYKE—I am opposed to the adoption of this resolution on various grounds, only one of which I will now refer to. The resolution in effect asks this Convention to say to the Legislature, "We regard your body as corrupt, but from a want of means or want of willingness to pay the costs of prosecutions, we have hitherto been unable to convict and punish you; and we therefore petition you to provide the means by which that can be done." Now, sir, I hold that such action as this would place this Convention in a most undignified position, and it would, at the same time, be highly disrespectful to the Legislature. If we do any thing of this kind it should be in the form of a direction to the Legislature. But, sir, I object to the consideration of the resolution at the present time because I regard it as disrespectful to this body. Early in its session, this Convention appointed a committee to consider and report upon the whole subject to which this resolution relates. That committee has considered the subject, and has reported to the Convention. Its report is upon our files, and has been referred to the Committee of the Whole for consideration. I therefore object to this resolution, in the second place, because it is disrespectful to that committee, of which the mover of this resolution is a member. As a member of that committee, the gentleman [Mr. M. I. Townsend] has made a minority report, which is almost identical in purport with the resolution which he now presents. I should move to refer this resolution to the Committee of the Whole, which shall be charged with the consideration of these reports, were it not that it is almost identical in purpose with the minority report presented by the mover of this resolution. It therefore seems unnecessary that it should go to that committee at all, because, in substance, it is already upon our files in that minority report, and in that form will receive consideration at the proper time. I hold it is due to this Convention, and to the committee referred to, that the whole subject shall remain untouched until those reports come up for consideration; and with these views, I move that the resolution lie on the table.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Opdyke, to lay the resolution of Mr. M. I. Townsend on the table, and, on a division, there were ayes 41, noes 25—no quorum voting.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call the ayes and noes were ordered, and the motion to lay the resolution on the table was declared carried by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barto, Beadle, Beals, Bell, Bergen, Bowen, E. A. Brown, Case, Cassidy Chesebro, Cooke, Daly, C. C. Dwight, Eddy, Endress, Ferry, Flagler, Fuller, Garvin, Graves, Gross, Hale, Hardenburgh, Hatch, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Lee, Ludington, Magee, Merrill, Merwin, Miller, Monell, Nelson, Opdyke, Potter, Prosser, Rathbun, Roy, Spencer, Van Campen, Wales, Williams—48.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Alvord, Armstrong, Axtell, Barker, Bickford, Cheritree, Comstock, Ely, Farnum, Field, Folger, Fowler, Francis, Goodrich, Hadley, Hammond, Hand, Harris, Hitchcock, Kinney, A. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Mattice, McDonald, Merritt, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, Pond, President, Prindle, Seaver, Smith, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Wakeman, Young—37.

The Convention again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole upon the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, of Cayuga, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of Mr. E. A. Brown, striking out the word "department" in the second line of the sixteenth section, and inserting "districts" in lieu thereof, was rejected.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I hope this motion will be carried, and that we shall adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown]. The motion which it is proposed to reconsider, proposes that the judges of the supreme court shall hereafter be elected by districts as they are under the present Constitution, subject, of course, to such changes as the Legislature may make. Unless this motion prevails they will be elected by departments, the State being divided into four departments. For myself, I have not favored the idea of dividing the State into departments. The great object proposed to be accomplished by that division was to render the supreme court in its decisions more nearly a unit; in other words to have four general terms of the supreme court instead of eight. Certainly so far as the holding of general terms by departments instead of districts is concerned, some good will be accomplished, but after all it will fall very far short of making the supreme court a unit. It only provides four general terms instead of eight. Under the present system there are eleven general terms, from which appeals are had to the court of appeals; and this reduces the number to seven. I include, of course, in the eleven the superior court of New York and the superior court of Buffalo and the common pleas of New York. It accomplishes perhaps a little good, although I confess I do not appreciate it as highly as many others in this committee. But I am willing to let it stand. It is in the report and it has not been changed. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown], does not provide any change at all; it proposes to organize general terms by departments, and if any thing is to be gained by having a lesser number we shall have the benefit of it; but it proposes to elect all the judges by districts as we do now. Let us look for a moment at that single proposition, for that is all that is proposed by the gentleman from Lewis. It leaves us all the advantages of holding courts by departments, if we choose so to consider it. My objection to this system of electing by departments is that it is partisan in its results—I will not say in its motives. I should be exceedingly unwilling to attribute to any gentleman in this Convention, either of the majority or of the minority, a partisan object in any amendment which is proposed. I do nothing of the kind. But its effect and its result is to operate with a partisan influence and a partisan benefit as regards the first, second and third districts, because in those districts alone as the supreme court is now constituted, can democrats be elected to the bench. Now it oporates against the third district for it necessarily puts it with another district which changes entirely its political character. In regard to the first district, it brings in such outside territory as the Legislature may think proper to select, which will control the whole of the people in the first district. They can no longer elect their own judges as they have done. They must elect in conjunction with such other counties as it may please the Legislature at any future day in the next twenty years to put with them. In regard to the second district, I am told that the plan will meet with the opposition of both political parties; that they prefer to stand by themselves and not be connected with the city of New York or any other territory in the election of their judges. I hope that the plan proposed by the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown] might meet with the cordial support of every delegate in this Convention from the first, second and third districts, and I should hope that it might meet with the support equally cordial from every other gentleman from other parts of the State, though he may belong to the opposite political party, if he desires to see this plan on the judiciary fairly organized. I have been willing myself to change the plan of electing judges from the small to larger departments, provided it could be organized with fairness, which alone would make it acceptable to the people, and should advocate minority representation because that would have operated with equal fairness in every part of this State, but that plan has been voted down as not in accordance with the sense of the Convention. I hope, therefore, for the purpose of making this article acceptable to the people everywhere, for the purpose of being sure there shall be no political feeling on one side or the other in regard to this Constitution, we may continue to elect our judges by districts as heretofore.

The question was put on the motion to reconsider, and, on a division, it was declared carried by a vote of 45 to 10.

A DELEGATE—There is no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN—There was a quorum in Convention a while ago; the gentlemen will please vote.

The question was again put, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 50 to 31.

The question was then put on the first branch of the proposition of Mr. E. A. Brown, to strike out the word "departments," in the second line, and insert the word "districts," and it was declared adopted.

The question recurred on the second branch of the amendment, which was read as follows:

"The justices of the supreme court, elected under this Constitution, shall hold their offices for eight years; the judges of the superior court of the city of New York shall hold their offices for six years; and the judges of the court of common pleas, elected under this Constitution, shall be so classified that, with those then in office, two shall go out of office at the end of every two years, and after such classification the term of office of said judges shall be six years, and the term of office of the judges of the superior court of the city of Buffalo shall be six years."

Mr. SMITH—I offer the following as a substitute for the last clause:

The SECRETARY read the substitute as follows:

"Strike out all after the word 'offices,' in line seven, and substitute therefor the words 'for the term of eight years.'"

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Smith, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the second proposition of the amendment of Mr. E. A. Brown.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I do not see any occasion for classifying the judges in the manner proposed by that amendment—I mean the judges to be elected under the new Constitution. We all know that the terms of the present judges expire at intervals of two years. Every two years one of the existing judges of the supreme court goes out of office, and the vacancy will be filled by a new election under the Constitution we are framing, for such term as we agree upon. It may be eight years, or it may be fourteen years, or it may be sixteen years. When a judge who is now in office leaves his position, I see no objection to electing his successor for whatever term is agreed upon without any classification. If a vacancy shall happen to be filled by a popular election, I see no reason why a popular election of a successor in office shall not be had for a full judicial term as that term may be prescribed by this Constitution. Of course judges will not all come into office and go out of office together; because the judges now in office who are to have their successors elected from time to time, go out at different periods, and there will be no classification necessary. I hope the committee will also consider carefully before we adopt the short term of office. If it is in order, I will move that the term of office be made each fourteen years instead of eight.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—The amendment is doubtless open to the criticism made by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], to a certain extent at any rate. The purpose of my amendment was to fix the term of office first for the justices of the supreme court. I do not know that it is necessary to incorporate here any thing about classification. In regard to the term of office in the court of common pleas of New York, whatever it may be, it seems to me to be necessary to have a classification unless the three additional judges all go out of office at the same time. If I may be allowed I will change my proposition so that it shall say nothing about classification, and have it read that the term of office of the justices of the supreme court and superior court of the city and county of New York, and the court of common pleas of the city of New York, and the superior court of Buffalo shall be eight years.

Mr. SPENCER—There is no reason that I can see for making a distinction in the terms of office of the judges of the superior court and the court of common pleas of New York, and the justices of the supreme court. I suggest that twelve years will be the multiple of the number of judges in each district of the supreme court, and the term made more uniform by adopting twelve years instead of eight.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I offer my amendment now. I move to strike out after the word judges, the remainder of the section, and insert so that it shall read thus: "said justices and judges elected under this Constitution shall hold their offices for a term of fourteen years."

Mr. GRAVES—I hope this amendment will not succeed. I am clearly of opinion that the people can judge of the qualifications of the persons who are elected to that office by a term of at least eight years. It appears to me to be a very great mistake to lengthen the time for which judges hold their offices. It is simply a question of education so far as it involves the occupation of the office, and the length of time which the incumbent holds it. It is the educating of the public mind to determine his qualifications as a judge. In my opinion it would be unfortunate to have a longer time than eight years. I would even prefer to have it a period of four years, because I think the people can learn the qualifications and capacity of a man in four years, and be able to judge whether he is a fit subject for his position or not. Certainly, if they learn that fact within four years, they should have the power in their own hands of disposing of him, or, in other words, of refusing to re-elect him if he lacks qualifications and capacity. I received, last Saturday, a letter from one of the most eminent lawyers in the western part of the State of New York, informing me that, in his judgment, it would be decidedly against the current of public opinion to fix a long term of office of any one of the judges. Now, sir, I am desirous of having eminent lawyers fill those places, as much so as any delegate here, and my experience shows me, that good and capable men have held those places under our present Constitution. Therefore. I am unwilling that the people should be deprived of the opportunity to judge of the qualifications of their servants, and that this Convention should adopt a rule by which they should determine that the people were better qualified to judge of the capacity of an incumbent at his first election, without knowing any thing about him, than they would be at the end of four years, for that is the effect of it. You give him a nomination for the office of judge of the supreme court He has never held the position, and you know nothing of him except as a lawyer. In that position he has behaved himself exceedingly well, maintained a good moral character, and established his reputation as a good lawyer. He comes before the people as a candidate for judge of the supreme court. We all know that some men are good lawyers who are not fit to be made judges. Men fill the position of judge sometimes much better than they discharge the duty of lawyer. In other words, a man may not be fitted for both positions. One position he can fill with honor to himself; the other only with discredit. Now, while we seek to elect able men and good men to fill these positions, we may be deceived; but if we are deceived then, at the end of four years, the short term, we have the power of choosing better men; but if we are not deceived we can retain the ones we have. I am unwilling to divest the people of the power to judge for themselves. Allow them to retain the right of exercising the knowledge which they have acquired. Is it true, sir, that we are more unqualified to judge of the qualifications of men after we know them than we are when we know nothing of them? Is it true that, after a man has served eight years, and after he has merited re-election and obtained the general approbation of the people, we shall so determine that we will deprive ourselves of the opportunity of re-electing him, or if he is unfit for the position that we shall deny ourselves the privilege of finding and electing a better man as his successor? Let the judgment of the people be exercised as frequently as the public interest demands.

Mr. ALVORD—I hesitate somewhat in entering upon the debate of a matter of this kind; still, it seems to me to be proper that I should express my views in reference to this question at this stage of the discussion. I have listened patiently and have watched carefully the proceedings of this committee from the time it started until the present moment. I have found that, in the first instance, a portion of the gentlemen of the legal profession upon the floor of this house, have carried propositions which have been brought before this committee in a manner very different from what seems to me now to be the disposition on this question. We have, in fact, been working in a circle for the last two weeks upon this question of the judiciary. It strikes me that we should straighten out in some way so that we can possibly, in the course of human events, get through with this subject. I think that I am speaking the truth when I say that the greatest of all matters which called for this Convention at the hands of the people was some reform in the judiciary; that it was found that the system under which we had operated for the last twenty years did not come up to the mark in the estimation of the people and which it was supposed by its original founders it would reach; that there must be a radical reform in this regard. And, sir, I venture to say that I speak understandingly of the people of my own locality when I say they believe that the nearer we approach to a life tenure in this office the further we step in the right direction. Very many of them—I will not undertake to say the majority—are in favor of divesting this matter of the judiciary entirely from any relation, however remote it may be, to politics; they are in favor of placing it in the power where it was originally held under the old Constitution, in the hands of the Governor and the Senate. But I am satisfied, from the tone and temper of this Convention, that that cannot be done. Sir, another step in the same direction has been urged by my constituents, and I think it is urged by the common opinion in that portion of the people who can speak understandingly of this subject, and that is for a longer term—for a term the duration of which, will be as long as in the estimation of this Convention it is proper should be given. Gentlemen get up here and talk a great deal about the people, and that the people desire to have these judges before them as often as possible, in order to correct any evils which may happen. The people who speak upon this question, I venture to say, are but a small portion of the people of the State of New York. The great mass of the people who are called in the vocabulary of gentlemen on this floor "the people," care nothing about this thing, one way or the other, except to have justice administered honestly. It is the men who are engaged in business, in large commercial operations; it is the men who are landholders and land proprietors; it is the bench and the bar, who make up the people who speak in reference to matters of this kind; and they have a right to speak in regard to them, because of their knowledge and their interests connected with this matter. The gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves], who has just taken his seat, has spoken about decreasing the time instead of enlarging it, and that he would prefer four years. I can see very well that some gentlemen would prefer that the term should be four years. Why? Because the lawyers of the State of New York, who number vastly more than the profession requires, desire their turn into the office of judge; and if the term is four years some of them will stand a chance, in the political machinery of the country, of turning into the office of judge and out of the position of lawyer. The result of reducing the term, in my estimation, will be to constantly keep in a perfect whirl your entire judicial system. Instead of re-electing men who have made themselves conspicuous for their uprightness and honesty upon the bench, you will go to work and make a clique in every one of the judicial divisions of the State, and each one of these cliques will put forward its candidate to be the successor of the judge who is about to retire from office. It will tend directly to this: it will bring this question down to a mere political scramble. It will be dangerous to the community. It is with considerable difficulty, in very many places of this State, where, even at the end of eight years of good service, the question is kept free from politics—the question of whether a judge shall or not be renominated by the political party then in power. I believe, so far as regards this matter, it should be as much dissevered from party politics as is possible. But under the elective system this cannot be wholly the case in reference to the nominees. They must represent their political parties. If we put the duration of term at fourteen years, as proposed by my colleague from Onondaga, [Mr. Comstock] and come back to the original proposition of the committee, we shall have done a great deal in that regard. We shall have met the views of the people who desire upon this subject a radical reform. I trust, therefore, we shall now, those of us who are not in the legal profession, yet who speak understandingly of the sentiments of the people in regard to the subject, and knowing that a radical reform is desired, make that reform suggested by the original report of the committee, which has been no less than three times sustained by the majority of this Convention. I venture to say that if this Convention were to-day represented by the same parties and in the same way that it was a few days ago, the result would be as I indicate. But now, after there has been a clear and distinct vote upon the part of the members of the Convention, when we are barely enough to make the majority of any quorum that probably will ever be in attendance here, we seem to be here simply to undo the work, which we ourselves in connection with them, have already done, and compel the return of absentees, at some future period of our, labors to reverse our proceedings.

Mr. AXTELL—When was this section passed upon?

Mr. ALVORD—I have to say this—that upon the very first and second sections of this article, the matter in reference to the duration of the term of office was determined, so far as regards the court of appeals, and it was determined with the understanding, without any question whatever, that the same principles should run through the whole machinery It was discussed as well with regard to the supreme court; and it was decided so far as the vote and voice of this committee was concerned, again and again in that direction to divers and sundry forms by way of amendment, which were offered to get rid of the fourteen years term of office.

Mr. GRAVES—I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Whether he has known, under the Constitution of 1846, of half a dozen men since the establishment of that Constitution, who have not been re-elected, who were good and able judges, except that the change was made by a political party?

Mr. ALVORD—That is the one change to which I object. I have known a great many changes in consequence of political fluctuations.

Mr. GRAVES—Have the people failed to get good judges by that change?

Mr. ALVORD—I think in a deliberative body like this, speaking in reference to an organic law, no party has a right to name or to call names. But I will say this much to the gentleman, and I will say what is not only true in the instance of which I speak, but in very many other instances in the State. A certain judicial district in this State has once, at least, and since the Constitution of 1846 was adopted, changed its political position, and in consequence of that change, has changed its judges. I will not say that the judges who are now in that district are not good judges. But I cannot say, and neither the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] nor any other gentleman who knows the men, can say that the present judges are any better, if, indeed, they are as good; they will say they are are not as good as were those judges who have been ousted from office in consequence of the changed political situation of the locality. Another thing I will say in this regard. If you go to work and make your term of office fourteen years, political parties in the different localities of this State will have sufficient knowledge of the integrity, the uprightness and efficiency of men whom they put before the people for election, to be satisfied in advance that their nomination will make a good judge. They cannot afford to run the risk of getting a judge for four or eight years, for the purpose of trying by experiments whether he is a good officer or not. There may be a vast amount of damage and injury done to the interests of the people of this State, with a four years' experience of an inefficient judge. But if you make a long term of office they will be sure to select an efficient judge for the position which they expect him to occupy. Upon an election of judge for four years there will not be that scrutiny in regard to his capacity that there will be if he is elected for fourteen years. Because the people will say it is an office which returns to us in four years; we can try the experiment, and if he is not a fit man we will get one. But when it comes to electing him for fourteen years, there will be the utmost scrutiny in regard to his capacity and fitness for the position, and we shall have a class of judicial learning upon the bench that may be at least equal to, if not far ahead of that which has hitherto been chosen. Why is it that gentlemen of the legal profession, who are of the highest skill, are not men who in all cases seek for the position of judge? It is because of the short duration of their office; it is because of the vacillation of political life, so that, notwithstanding they may do well—may do admirably—may come up to the fullest expectations of their friends—a political change will, at the end of eight years, place them where they started. But if you give to these men a greater duration of office, I am in favor of striking out the ineligibility clause, because I desire to retain a good judge for a longer time than fourteen years. I do not undertake to say any thing against the present judges in the State of New York. They are high-minded, honorable men; they have done well in the past history of the judiciary of this State, but I do say, without fear of contradiction, that the highest judicial learning of this State is not upon the bench to-day. By the continuance of the course we have pursued in the past, you will keep away from the bench measurably the highest legal ability in the State.

Here the gavel fell, the gentleman's time having expired.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—Assuming it to be true, that this Convention was called mainly for the purpose of reforming the judiciary system of the State, let me ask this committee what the cause of complaint was against the judiciary, and what induced the call of this Convention? Was it that the supreme court of the State was inadequate to discharge the duties devolving upon it, or that the office of judge was filled by incompetent men? Or was it simply and solely because the calendar of the court of appeals was so clogged up that litigation was greatly delayed? The delay occasioned in the court of last resort was a complaint, a just complaint, and an universal complaint, not simply heard from that class referred to by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], who are capable of knowing something about what the judiciary of the State ought to be, but it was a complaint arising from the people generally throughout the whole State; and it was to get rid of this difficulty in the judiciary system of the State, that this Convention was called into being, and that is the cause of our presence here. That being so, we are here to-day to remedy the evils complained of, and secure such an organization of the court of appeals as shall do away with these complaints. But we have disposed of that question. The question of the tenure of office was discussed. But I deny, and right in my neighborhood are others who deny, that it was any part of our understanding in any manner that the tenure of fourteen years, fixed for the court of appeals, was to have any influence whatever in fixing the term of office of the judge of the supreme court. No such thing at all. It was plain that a more permanent organization of the court of appeals was desired, that the judges with a longer term of office should not be interfered with by the judges of the supreme court, who now sit in that court for a single year; and that we might have a constant, uniform, and a permanent court to transact the business in the court of last resort. Now, in regard to the supreme court, I say it has not been a matter of complaint in the State, either that the officers were incompetent to discharge the business, or that the system had failed to furnish the means of transacting the judicial business of the State. It has not been a matter of complaint that the judges of the supreme court have been elected; it has not been complained that they have been elected for a term of eight years. So far as the experiment is concerned, so far as public opinion is concerned (and there are some other people who have understood this subject besides the lawyers and besides the commercial people), the people generally understand the organization and merits of that court, and they are satisfied with it. They all have business in some form or other with the courts. They are all called upon to serve as jurors, to attend court as parties to try their causes, to attend as witnesses, and have thus become familiar with the conduct, ability, and character of the judges, and with the workings of the system, and, as a general proposition, they are satisfied with both. Now, sir, in relation to the oft-repeated argument that we get better judges by a longer term. That is an assumption easily made. As I have said, it has not been a matter of complaint with the supreme court for the last twenty years, in regard to the tenure of office that it was too short. True, political parties have changed; it is also true that even the same party have not, in all cases, renominated judges for re-election. As a general thing re-nominations have been made, and, in cases where they were not made, I do not understand that there is any public complaint as to the judges that have been elected in place of those not re-elected. The gentleman says, in one district, a change of political parties has made a change of judges which has not been an improvement. I respectfully differ with him if he alludes to the district to which I suppose he has reference. I deny that there are any better lawyers in the district than have been placed upon the bench by the people of the district or of the State, either in the supreme court or in the court of appeals. There may be as good lawyers as those elected. When you have selected one lawyer for the bench in a village or a city, I am not prepared to say that you could not, by his side, select another one just as good for the same position, whether for four years, for eight years, or for fourteen years. The public have not complained—they have not called into being this Convention because, in the fifth district or the seventh district, or any other district, the people who had the selection of those judges have failed to select as good men as were to be had. On the contrary, they are satisfied as a general thing. The gentleman says something about politics, as connected with the election of judges. I would like to know when an appplicant goes to the Governor for appointment, if the first question is not what his politics are. I would like to know, when a nomination is sent to the Senate, if the first question asked by senators is not what are the politics of the candidate proposed to be confirmed? It is utterly impossible to wholly divorce the judiciary from politics in this State. How was it under the Constitution of 1821? For fifteen, sixteen or twenty years no man was appointed to the bench of any court in the State by the appointment of the Governor and Senate except such as belonged exclusively to one political party. By the change of the politics of the State there was, I believe, one circuit judge appointed in the city of New York who was of a political party different from that so long in power from and after 1822, and one vice-chancellor in the eighth district who was not of the same political character as those first appointed; but all the other high judicial officers of the State, the judges of common pleas, and masters and examiners in chancery, belonged to one political party. In my judgment, so far as the supreme court is concerned, the election by eight districts has worked satisfactorily and as well as any other system, and with as little political partisanship as any other system, and with as much reliability as any other system. There is no call for a change in that respect.

Mr. DALY—When a gentleman arises on this floor and undertakes to say that the people have not called for a change, in my opinion, he assumes a great deal. He assumes to know what it is very difficult to know, the exact state of the public mind. The value of such a declaration depends altogether upon the opportunity which the gentleman has had for observation, and it can, at best, be but the expression of his opinion. I place myself in the same position, and I take the liberty of saying that there is complaint, and a great complaint in this State of the short tenure for the judiciary, and the value of my opinion on that question, which is the opinion of many other gentlemen in this Convention, may be quite equal to that of the gentleman who has just taken his seat. The gentleman, while admitting that this Convention was chiefly called on account of the judiciary, says that there was only one evil to be remedied, which was the accumulation of business in the court of appeals. Now I put to the gentleman a fact which I stated in my argument the other day, and which I undertake to say cannot be answered, and that is, that, the accumulation in the court of appeals, occurred within ten years after the adoption of the Constitution of 1846. The vote of the people was taken upon two occasions upon plans competent to relieve the court of appeals, and they were rejected by the people on a general vote. It is true, as the gentleman says, that there was no express understanding in this Convention that the tenure of office of the judges of the court of appeals should be controlling in respect to the judges of the supreme court. But was it not most natural that such should be the conclusion? The question discussed was the tenure of the judicial office, whether it was desirable to have a long term or a short term, and it was discussed necessarily with the understanding that, in the Constitution of 1846, there is no difference between the judges of the court of appeals and the judges of the supreme court with regard to the tenure of their office. That question, whether there should be any difference, was considered and discussed in the Convention of 1846, as several of the gentlemen who were members of that Convention, and who are now present, will bear witness. The conclusion was reached, that, the reasons which were applicable to the tenure of the judges of the court of appeals were applicable with equal or greater force to the judges of the supreme court. If there be any weight in the reasons which I have offered, and which other gentlemen have offered, with regard to the effect upon judges elected for a short political tenure, every gentleman must admit they apply with greater force to a judge who is limited to a particular locality, and who is nearer and closer to those influences than the judge of the court of appeals, who sits permanently, or for a long period of time, in the city of Albany. Now, with regard to the duration of the tenure of the judges of the supreme court, I have only one additional remark to make, and that is, that, in the neighboring State of Pennsylvania they elect their judges to the supreme court for fifteen years, and they adopted this provision in their Constitution after we had made our changes in the Constitution of 1846. Great care has been exercised in the selection of the judges for the bench of the supreme court in Pennsylvania, and the bench of that court stands as high as any other elective court in the Union. I merely call attention to the fact that at a very recent period, during a very exciting election, when great political questions were involved, one of the most eminent jurists in the State, and one of the most eminent in this country, Judge Sharswood, was nominated and elected for a period of fifteen years.

Mr. M H. LAWRENCE—As gentlemen arise to give expression to what they look upon as public opinion, I merely wish to say that I sustain the proposition of the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown], because I think the proposition of more importance than much which has yet come under my observation; for I hold, with Dr. Franklin, on the tenure of office, that where annual elections cease tyranny begins. I believe the people of this State had largely in view a reform in respect to the judiciary when this Convention was called. I believe they desire a radical change, or they would not have selected as their representatives to this Convention such a large number of the legal profession. The people are looking anxiously to these gentlemen, in whom they have reposed so much confidence, to re-arrange and remodel the judiciary. We must create something in accordance with the wishes of the public, or we will not meet the approbation of the public. In 1846 this feeling found expression. The people thought the expenses of litigation were distributed unjustly; they believed that those who indulged in the luxury of litigation should pay for it. Fortunately, for the people of the State, a great many of them never go to law; the courts seem to be created for the accommodation of those who desire to go to law. For that reason, and to correct the evil, the Convention of 1846 adopted what was called the court of conciliation. The people of that time anticipated that great good would grow out of that system. In that they were doomed to disappointment. I rose more especially for the purpose of calling the attention of gentlemen of this committee to it, and give some reasons why that system was not carried into effect. If the committee will allow me I will call their attention to the Comptroller's report. We have in it the list of the expenses paid to the judges. There appears to have been but one court of conciliation, although there may have been more, and that one was in the sixth district. There is one thing I find to the credit of that court; that it has not cost the State much. Allow me to read: "expenses of the judge of the court of conciliation, sixth district, for salary, $33.36." That is cheap justice. Although I do not know how much justice was rendered. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOLGER—As much as was paid for, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. M. H. LAWRENCE—Certainly gentlemen cannot complain of the expenses of that court. I have listened, I hope, with some profit to the discussions in this Convention. And I have been almost pained with the fact that, there has been no agreement between the lawyers of this Convention. There are over one hundred of them, and there are nearly as many plans. Why is this? There seems to be something wanting, some sound principle somewhere, or there would be more agreement among the gentlemen comprising the members of the legal profession. I know it is claimed the professional gentlemen of this State comprise, to a large extent, the ability of the State. Now, will they disappoint the expectations of the people? I do not pretend to be conversant with law; I never read law professionally in my life, but I believe there should be some way of settling cases between individuals, in civil cases, in a cheaper and more expeditious manner. I believe that those who go to law should bear the expense in all civil cases—that "those who dance should pay the fiddler," as the homely phrase reads. Now, if it is charged upon the lawyers to make the needed reforms, I think this is a fitting opportunity and a grand occasion for them to get to work and give to the people a judicial system that will amply repay them for the generous confidence reposed in their selection for such an important work; such a result will prove a lasting blessing and glory to our empire State.

Mr. YOUNG—The amendment presented by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] I think is somewhat impracticable, for the reason that, we have just determined to have the judges of the supreme court elected in districts; and as there are thirty-four judges to be elected in the State, in eight districts there are four judges to be elected from each district except the district comprising the territory of the city and county of New York. In that district I presume there will be six judges. Under the present plan of eight years' tenure a judge will be elected at the end of every second year, but under the plan proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] a judge would be elected at the end of every two years until the expiration of eight years from last fall's election, and then it will be eight years before a supreme court judge will be again elected.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Every judge under the Constitution is elected for fourteen years, and when his term expires another will be elected, and that is all there is about it.

Mr. YOUNG—We have just determined that the old judges shall hold until their terms expire. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] stated that the Convention of 1846 designed to have the tenure of office the same in the supreme court as it was in the court of appeals.

Mr. DALY—I said the system established by the Convention of 1846 made no distinction between the judges of the supreme court and the court of appeals. There was the same tenure for both.

Mr. YOUNG—This is different from what I understood it, but it answers the same purpose for my argument. It has been shown here by gentlemen, that, the Convention of 1846 made a very great mistake in the organization of that court. It made a mistake in respect to the tenure of office. It made a mistake in having these "militiamen" coming up from the supreme court every year into the court of appeals there to create discord among the "regulars" so much complained of by gentlemen here, and then disappear at the end of the year just at the time they had begun to get the run of the business in that court; we have remedied that by making the tenure of office in that court fourteen years, and by providing that that court shall consist entirely of "regulars." But there is no analogy between the court of appeals and the supreme court in this respect, because the court of appeals consists of seven judges elected from the State at large, while each district of the supreme court, except the city and county of New York, will have four judges, and as it is now arranged one judge will go out of office every second year. As the politics of the several judicial districts of the State now are, and as they are likely to be, I claim that a good judge who has served eight years and given satisfaction to the profession and to the public, can be re-elected as long as he is competent to discharge the duties of his office or until he arrives at the age of seventy years. There is a majority large enough in each of the judicial districts of this State to re-elect any good man who is put in nomination upon the ticket. But this does not hold good with the judges of the court of appeals, because they are elected by the State at large, and because the State is carried one year by one of the political parties, and another year by the other political party by majorities too large for any one man on the ticket to overcome. But I can mention a number of supreme court judges who have been upon the bench from the organization of the supreme court under the Constitution of 1846, until they were disqualified from acting by age. But as the profession generally make the nominations, or, at any rate, as lawyers are generally selected as delegates to the conventions which nominate judges, it is presumed that such judges as have served for the period of eight years, and given good satisfaction, who have acted with ability and been honest and upright in their judicial decisions, will receive a renomination from those conventions and a re-election from the people—at any rate, as long as their party is in power in their own district. I am opposed to having a supercilious, arrogant old tyrant upon the bench for the period of fourteen years or for life, who is accountable to no one but his God for his insolence and overbearing demeanor, and who cannot be removed except by impeachment. If such a man should get upon the bench, eight years is quite long enough for him to afflict the profession and impose upon the people. If a corrupt or ignorant and incompetent man is elected to that office, eight years is quite as long as he should be continued in the office; but if the judge is a good man, and at the end of eight years has shown himself to be entitled to be continued in office longer, I claim that in every district in this State he can be re-elected. I desire to have a judge upon the supreme court bench feel his dependence upon the people. It is true, in that situation, he should not have his political favorites, or show political favoritism; the minute he does that, there is an intense clamor from the opposite party set up against him; but he can be a learned, upright, and impartial judge and administer the law between man and man impartially and, at the same time, have strong political feelings and advocate his party principles when off the bench with all the vehemence of a modern politician. There has been a great many judges of this character, not only upon the supreme court bench of this State, but upon the bench of the court of appeals. The court of appeals of this State can put the supreme court of the United States (whose judges are appointed for life) to blush in the purity of its judicial decisions from all political considerations. Sir, a judge who metes out even-handed justice to all, who has an upright and honest heart in his breast, and treats all men with the respect due to their situation in life, need not fear his constituents when nominated for re-election; his party will not be so much changed in his district, but that he will be held in grateful remembrance by those who placed him on the bench. I was a delegate at a judicial convention held in this district last fall, which unanimously nominated one of its judges for re-election. So well were the people and the profession satisfied with his judicial labors, that, no man dared to present himself as a candidate against him, either at the nominating convention or at the polls; and yet, I know that that judge has always had strong political feelings and fearlessly maintained them when off the bench; and, sir, I have no doubt that he and other judges who have shown themselves capable and worthy, will be kept in office by the people and appreciated by them as long as they are competent to discharge the duties of a judge. This is the kind of long tenure that I like, and the kind that should be sought for by every judge upon the bench.

Mr. FERRY—I desire to call to the attention of the Convention to some facts bearing upon this question, and to appeal particularly to that class of our members here, who do not belong to the legal profession, and who complain, I suppose as they believe, properly, of the great diversity of sentiment existing among the lawyers in this body. Twenty years ago, previous to the adoption of our last Constitution, we had a judiciary very different from our present one. We had in this State three judges of the supreme court, at general term, doing the entire business of the State; and these judges occupied their offices by the life tenure, as we so term it generally. We then had a court of last resort (our court of errors), consisting of the senate, and we all know how they were elected and for what length of time—acting together with the chancellor and these judges of the supreme court. These three judges not only did the legitimate business of their own court, but they also took part in the decisions of the tribunal of last resort—the court for the correction of errors. All will see at a glance that, this system was very radically different from the present one, and since the last one went into operation, all will agree, and I do not think our lay friends will dispute that fact, that the great cause of complaint with the people, and which led principally to the calling of this Convention, was the supposed imperfections in our judicial system. That leads us to inquire whence came these causes of complaint. The new system being so entirely and radically different from the first, and our complaints having arisen from the last system, have we not reason to believe that they are to be found in the organization of the last court? It is the most evident thing in the world that they do not arise wholly out of the court of appeals, for any person, who will take the pains to consider for a moment the capacity of our present court of appeals to do business and compare it with the Senate and the judges who acted with them, will see that the old court for the correction of errors was a more cumbrous court and not as able to do the amount of business that the present court of appeals may do, however imperfect its organization. Whence, then, arises the trouble? Why is this last court so blocked up? It must inevitably arise out of defects in the supreme court, the court from which appeals arise and are carried into this court. And that is the court whose organization we are now considering. We are inquiring whether something may not be done to better this condition. It seems to me, then, very evident, complaints being made under the present system as contrasted with the old, its organization being entirely different, almost inevitably to follow that we will find the defect in that change, so radical, which was adopted in 1846, between the two courts. Let us inquire, at least, whether it would not be wise in us to retrace our steps somewhat. If we do not readopt precisely the old system about which comparatively not much complaint was made, let us approximate somewhat to it in the changes that we may make. Arguments have been used here, which I will not attempt to repeat, in favor of a long tenure, and a short tenure, but these arguments have been listened to and a repetition of them may not be particularly useful at this time. It perhaps is quite pertinent for members to state here what they believe to be the public sentiment on this subject. I do not believe, however, that the complaint among the people is so much in regard to the tenure of judicial office as of other things. I believe, if this Convention will go on and adopt the life tenure in regard to the courts, the people will be satisfied with it. I, however, do believe that they would prefer much to elect our judges instead of having them appointed. There seems to be a disposition on the part of those who favor the life tenure, to compromise upon this question and fix a reasonable length for the terms of the judges. And now I ask our lay brethren, who complain of great diversity of views among the lawyers, whether we do not, upon those questions, meet almost uniformly with the opposition of our lay friends, and do they not generally vote for the shortest term of official life. There is nothing more evident in the world.

Mr. GRAVES—Will the gentleman allow me a question? Has he read the debates of the Convention of 1846?

Mr. FERRY—I have; some of them.

Mr. GRAVES—In reading those debates does he not find that the old system was more complained of at that time in the discussions than the present system is now?

Mr. FERRY—I do not know how that may be. Every thing was discussed very fully. They discussed the subject a very long time.

Mr. DALY—If my friend will allow me I would say in reply to the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves], that, all that was said in the Convention upon that subject was embraced in two printed pages, and I have read every line of the debate.

Mr. FERRY—I was not prepared to answer from any recollection at the moment in regard to this particular question, and I thank my friend Judge Daly, for his contribution. I was about to make this remark—

Mr. POND—I would like to ask the gentleman from New York—

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] has not the floor.

Mr. POND—Then I would like to ask the gentleman from Otsego [Mr. Ferry], if those two pages were not all on one side?

Mr. FERRY—I could not say. I was about to state, Mr. Chairman, that, to every person here, it is evident that the very best court we could have—provided it was acceptable to the people—would be a continuing court. There cannot be any benefit in any change, simply as a change. Elections are not profitable particularly, unless they be necessary; they are not mere pastimes for the people, and should not be multiplied to their prejudice. Certainly if we have a good judge we cannot gain any thing by a change; and there is always more or less evil to grow out of it. It is very evident, that, if a judge is to be elected for a long period, the people will be more careful in the selection of the man. To show the regard of the people for an able jurist, I might add, what my friend from New York [Mr. Daly] omitted to say, in referring to a case somewhat illustrative, occurring at a recent election in Pennsylvania. There was a judge whose political opinions were obnoxious, I believe, to the mass of the people in Pennsylvania; and yet he was elected. Why? Because of his distinguished ability as a jurist. People, looking at that one question, overlooked the other. I really believe the people will be satisfied, and be better satisfied, with a system which shall give the judges a reasonable length of terms, and it strikes me that fourteen years is short enough; and inasmuch as we have fixed the tenure of office in the court of appeals at fourteen years, I would not propose that we should enlarge it in this case. But I can see no reason why the same arguments which would favor a long term in the court of appeals would not apply with the same force to judges in this court; and for the harmony of our system it would be better that the terms should be alike, as is now the fact under the present Constitution. For these reasons I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], believing that such a course would satisfy my constituents.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I rise to a single question. The gentleman who has just taken his seat would seem to intimate that three judges in the old supreme court transacted all the business that is transacted by the judges of the present supreme court, there being thirty-three in number.

Mr. FERRY—At general term.

Mr. DALY—I beg leave to correct tho gentleman. There were eight circuit judges under that system.

Mr M. I. TOWNSEND—If the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] will allow me, I will make my own statement and allow him to make his. The only judges referred to were the judges of the supreme court, and the gentleman from Otsego [Mr. Ferry] may be fairly understood, by one listening to his remarks, to have intimated that the present judges, thirty-three in number, only transact the business that was previously transacted by three.

Mr. FERRY—At general term.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Now, instead of that being the fact, the old court, with its three judges, were about seven hundred causes behind. But, in addition to the three judges of the old court, that were then transacting business that is now done by thirty-three judges, there were eight circuit judges in the State. There was a chancellor in the State transacting a portion of the same business. There were a chancellor and three independent vice-chancellors in the State transacting business. There was an almost innumerable list of masters in chancery; there was an almost innumerable list of examiners in chancery. This entire corps, all though the State, were engaged in the transaction of the business that thirty-three laborious men are now laboring night and day—yes, night and day, literally—with an amount of labor and diligence such as no thirty-three men have ever surpassed since the world began—trying to transact. It is doing injustice to the members of the court to have it intimated that three men transacted before, the business that thirty-three men transact to-day. There was an army of men in the State transacting the business, and although, by the adoption of a code, we have somewhat simplified the business, yet, the business that was done by three men, and the others I have alluded to, at that time is substantially transacted by thirty-three men to-day. I arose simply for the purpose of setting this matter right before the Convention and before the people of this State, if they shall read the debates of this Convention.

Mr. FERRY—I will now remark, what I have endeavored to say to the gentleman three times, that I confined my remarks in that particular to the general term business; but it seems I was not so understood.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—We have no separation, either in the present provisions of this Constitution, as far as we have adopted them, or in the Constitution of 1846, between the men who transact business at the general term and the men who transact business at the special term and the men that transact business at the circuit. There is an amount of business resting upon the judges of the supreme court of this State that may well weigh them down; and as long as these men are engaged faithfully in the attempt to discharge the duties of their position, it is unfair to present them as having only to transact the business that was previously transacted well by three men.

Mr. CURTIS—I am one, sir, of the small but highly respectable minority on the floor of this Convention who are not lawyers, and if this were a professional question merely, I should, of necessity remain silent. But the pure administration of justice is the highest concern of every citizen, and it were well, if in this Convention we did nothing else, that at the close of its labors, although they should have extended over the whole year, we should be able to say to our constituents, upon returning, "We have at least secured for you an independent judiciary." The professional gentlemen upon this floor have presented every view of the general subject, with all the decoration of historical learning, with all the eloquence and force of thought and experience, and it is useful, it seems to me, that there shall now and then be heard, a voice from one who may be supposed to represent the great body of clients in this State—the great body of men whose interest in the judiciary is simple and single, who are beyond the reach of professional prizes, who are outside the scope and range of professional ambition, who come to the courts asking one thing, and one thing only, namely, that justice may be done, and who are only anxious to know that the administration of justice is founded upon impregnable principles and sustained by the long experience of free political communities everywhere. The question of the tenure of the judges on the bench, Mr. Chairman, is to be viewed in two very simple lights. In the first place we may look at it in the essential nature of the case; in the second in the light of experience. Now, what is the nature of the case? What is the judge? The judge, as has been already said in the debate, is that functionary in society who declares the law. He does not make it. When the honorable gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Goodrich], who favors the short tenure in his speech, so forcible, so eloquent, so appropriate, urged the precedent of the English system, and granted that, where society is divided into classes long tenure and an independent judiciary may be necessary to preserve the balance between those classes, it seems to me he failed to remember that the essential duty of a judge in every form of free government, whether the English or American, is the same. It is not to maintain a balance between classes of society — it is to do justice between man and man. And again, sir, when he told us that the advocates of the long tenure seemed to question the validity of popular elections, it seemed to me that he forgot this other fact, that the law itself in this country represents the popular will. When a great community is divided upon certain questions the conflict takes the form of parties. When the election occurs, the great majority, which is the final judge in our system, determines what view shall prevail. Then the Legislature, representing that view, enacts the law. That being done what is the interest of every man, whether he is in the majority or in the minority? That the law having been defined by the general sense of the community, shall be declared and administered without fear and without favor and with a single eye to the will of that community thus properly expressed. If there be any thing fully settled in political society, and confirmed by philosophical thought, it is that the power declaratory of the law, or the judiciary, shall be absolutely independent of all the conflicts of party or of public sentiment. But how is this to be attained? It can be attained either by appointment during good behavior or, in the method provided by the report, namely, by election for a long term, or for life, or good behavior. Now, sir, I hold with the American publicist who truly described the people—the State—as a moral being. And when the people of this State or of any State say, "knowing ourselves and our subservience to political passion, knowing the danger of our being driven this way and that way in the fury of party elections, we declare that we will have one thing secure, we will lift up our hands and bear aloft in the serenest air the independence of the judiciary, the ark of our political safety," then I say that the State, resolving to secure itself against its own passions, is fulfilling one of its wisest and sublimest functions. And what is the practical experience of this matter? What system is found, in the long experience of society, most surely to protect the judge from the conflict of party passion? If you elect a judge for six months, is he likely to be well defended against the perils that most beset his position? If you elect him for a year is it essentially better? And so you may go up and ask all the way through. And when my friend from New York [Mr. Daly], in his admirable and eloquent discourse the other day, mentioned the remarkable fact, that, for a period of one hundred and sixty-seven years in the administration of English justice, there were only two instances of judges seriously liable to suspicion under the permanent tenure of office, I say that so far as the question of experience was concerned, the whole debate seemed to me to be closed; for such a fact was not only the most brilliant illustration, but it was the most conclusive argument. We are not to disdain the experience of all other nations in this matter, nor are we to reject the wisdom of our fathers. For a long time, in the colonial history of this country, judges were appointed by the king and held office during the royal pleasure, as the same gentleman [Mr. Daly] stated. At last came the settlement of the grievances against the crown, and among the chief was this: that the judges held office at the royal pleasure, and John Jay—a man whose name will never be mentioned in the State of New York without receiving that meed of respect which high political genius, combined with the most spotless fidelity to public service, will always command among us—John Jay, himself, conspicuous as one of the early patriots, and knowing by experience the perils of this system, was the man who, in the earlier Constitutions of this State, inserted the tenure of good behavior. Those men had had experience. They knew of what they spoke and what they meant. And what is our duty? In my judgment, our duty is to act in the spirit of those wise men. It is to defend the independence of the judiciary by those safeguards which reason and experience approve. I should prefer, I confess, the method already presented in the report of the committee, and I shall vote for the method which comes nearest to that. In giving that vote—although I do not agree with my friend from Fulton [Mr. Smith] that that consideration should guide my action—I have no doubt whatever that I am voting in accordance with the intelligent judgment of the great body of the citizens of this State. Mr. Chairman, amid all the changes which are wise and necessary and just, let us hold fast to those simple principles which are not dependent upon party predominance, which have no relation to party discipline or permanence, but which are rooted in human nature itself, and are illustrated by human experience. This is one of them — there are not many. And when, after the experience of twenty years under the Constitution of 1846, the Committee on the Judiciary brought in their report, I saw in it the expression of the professional experience of the State, gathered in its best representatives from every quarter, confirming the instinct of their unprofessional brethren, I have said that I should not be controlled in my vote by what I supposed to be the feeling of the people behind me. It seems to me that my friend from Fulton [Mr. Smith] made an extraordinary statement when he was upon the floor the other day. If I understood him correctly, it was that we are to be governed in our decision upon any proposition, not chiefly by what we think is expedient—I do not say right—but by what we supposed the people behind us might approve. Sir, it was a wise old English poet who said "look in your own heart and write." I say to my friends in this Convention, "look into your own minds and vote." We were sent here by the people to propose to them what, in the light of our experience and observation and mature reflection, we believe to be best for the fundamental law of this State. It is not for us to adopt a Constitution, it is for us to propose it.

Here the gavel fell, the time of the speaker having expired.

The CHAIRMAN—By unanimous consent the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] can proceeded.

Mr. CURTIS—I have but very few words to add. I was saying that, in my judgment, our duty was to look, as it were, into our own hearts—into our minds and our experience, in order that we might wisely recommend a Constitution. I, for one, wish to go to the people of this State and say: "There, that is what I conceive should be the fundamental law." If they choose, they will reject it; but I shall know that I have done my duty as they will do theirs. If this Convention will act upon that principle, if it will only try to discover what sort of a law this State needs—which is comparatively a simple thing—and not labor to discover what every man of seven hundred thousand voters would like or dislike, I think that our term would be materially shortened, and our work a thousand-fold better done. If our work is to fail, let us, at least, have a Constitution that we are not ashamed of, repudiated by the people. If our work is to be accepted, let us be equally sure that it shall be our pride in future years to say "I, too, was one of the men who made that Constitution." Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted one word farther — there was in the course of the debate during the last week, an unfortunate question in regard to the judiciary of the city of New York. It was a question of my honorable friend from Herkimer [Mr. Graves], addressed to the gentleman then addressing the committee [Mr. Daly], which drew from him a very appropriate and conclusive answer so far as his personal knowledge or experience were concerned. It referred to the charges that were made in an article published in a late number of the North American Review. Those charges, I presume, being made in a perfectly responsible publication, were not made flippantly nor without investigation. Whatever may be our opinion, or prejudice, or judgment in the matter, we may at least suppose them to have been satisfactory to the author of the article; nor would the editors of the Review have permitted them to appear unless they had been satisfied of the good faith and discretion of the author. Of the merits of that article, or of its author, I have nothing to say. But with what amazing force did the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], declare that article itself to be an illustration of his argument. That such things can be said, that they can be said with apparent knowledge, that they can be said in a periodical of the highest character, is of itself another argument against the tenure which the committee in their report seeks to supplant. Mr. Chairman, in an assembly of intelligent Americans I shall not undertake to defend against the extraordinary zeal of the honorable gentleman from Kings [Mr. Schumaker], the publication known as the North American Review. It is a monument of American scholarship. There are few eminent authors or scholars in this country during the last half century who have not contributed to its renown. There is no periodical in the world which has ever maintained for a longer time a higher reputation and character than the North American Review. Its editors, in long and brilliant succession, for half a century, have been among the most illustrious American men of letters. Wherever it goes it bears the fame of our literature, and wherever it is read it is acknowledged as one of the most able, learned, and courteous of periodicals. I could only smile when my friend [Mr. Schumaker], in his energetic and reckless manner, denounced the North American Review as a kind of "yellow-covered novel." Sir, I am not surprised by the gentleman's wrath. The Review has taken a new lease of life under the gentlemen who now control it. It has taken a new lease of life, because it has helped to teach the American people the essential relations between morals and politics; because it has ventured to bring all the results of its scholarship, all the wealth of its experience, all the brilliancy and accuracy of its style, to the discussion of those cardinal questions which underlie the welfare of political society everywhere. I welcome it—I welcome it as a co-worker in the great cause in which we are now engaged upon the floor of this Convention. I welcome it as a powerful ally in the effort to search out and correct the corruptions and dangers which now surround the independence of the judiciary in the State of New York; and, sir, if, by any possibility, we could return to the method toward which the article in question tends, and which the committee recommend, the fierce wave of party discord would fall before the bench which would then be erected in this State; and it is my firm belief that, seated in that serene air, justice would recover her ancient tone and maintain her sweet and gracious temper.

Mr. SMITH—I wish, while the matter is fresh, to make a correction of the position assigned to me by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis]. I must have been very unfortunate in expressing myself, because I am quite sure the gentleman would not intentionally misrepresent me. But he has certainly done so in the remarks which he has now made. I did not say that we should be governed in our action here entirely by public opinion and disregard our own views of right. I did not mean to be so understood. But I did say in substance, that in our action here we had no right to ignore public opinion. Upon questions of strict morality—questions which are in themselves right or wrong, or which involve the principles of moral right and wrong, we are not at liberty individually to depart from the strict line of rectitude. But when we come to questions of mere policy—to the framing of organic or administrative law—there we have a right, nay, it is our duty to inquire into the wants and the wishes of the people for whom we are acting. That was my position, and I trust that no one will understand me as saying or believing that we ought entirely to ignore our own views of right, and merely inquire what others may think of our action here. I will not enter into the discussion of the pending question, because other gentlemen desire to occupy the floor. I only desired the privilege of making this explanation while the matter was fresh in the minds of the committee.

Mr. HAND—I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] and I have failed, in the very able discussion of the gentlemen of the profession, to hear an argument that has shaken my confidence in the ability of the people to judge of the qualities, not only of the persons who shall legislate for them and hold the highest executive office in the State, but of all the persons who sit upon the judicial bench, and decide finally upon all questions of life, liberty, property and reputation that come before them for adjudication. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], and I always listen to him with pleasure. I was sorry to hear one word drop him which has come from various gentlemen in this Convention, intimating that certain persons in this Convention were ignorant, that their opportunities for understanding the wishes of the people were inferior to those enjoyed by another class of people. I have heard such intimations principally from the gentlemen living in the same direction, viz: in the city of New York, in discussing financial and various other questions. Now, it is not necessary that a man should observe with his own eyes the events which are passing. We know what the feelings of the people are through their expression by the public press. We all have access to that. The defects of the Constitution of 1846, whatever they may be, the wishes of the people regarding these defects and their opinions regarding them, have found expression through the various publications throughout the State of New York; and I am as well qualified to judge of the opinions of that people as the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], distinguished as he may be upon the bench of a court in the city of New York. My opinion is that the wishes of the people will not be subserved by making the life tenure or the long term the time for the judicial office, especially in the supreme court of the State of New York; that they have not called us here for any such purpose; that you look in vain for any expression of the people through the public press for any such manifestation or for any complaint of the tenure of office of the supreme court as at present existing. The complaint has been principally of the court of appeals, of the manner in which that court is constituted, by which judges pass from the supreme court to the court of appeals, and especially that judges review their own decisions, by the working of which, cases accumulate in the court of appeals and the administration of justice is retarded. In these things the people demand reform, and I hope we may secure such reform. I want to correct one statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], and he certainly ought to know more than I do about this matter. He is highly pleased with the judiciary as it is established in the State of Pennsylvania. He says in the whole civilized world, I think was the expression, such a court could not be found; certainly not in these United States. I have been looking at the amended Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania. Now, I am willing to adopt the judiciary system of the State of Pennsylvania, essentially as it comes to us. It is not constituted as he represented it to be. The highest court of the State of Pennsylvania, corresponding with our court of appeals, is there called the supreme court. The judges hold their offices for fifteen years. The court of the second class, and corresponding with our supreme court, give their judges a tenure of ten years Now, the committee will discover that, these official terms correspond very nearly with the plan I desire to adopt for the State of New York. I would certainly prefer our period of eight years to their longer term of ten years, but the difference is so small that I can hardly understand how the very learned gentleman can eulogize the Pennsylvania system so highly and then seriously oppose the tenure of office we propose with which it corresponds so nearly. Now, if the gentleman and others, acting with him in this matter, are willing to adopt the Pennsylvania judicial terms of office, which he eulogizes so highly, and say no more about a life tenure for the court of appeals, and fourteen years for the supreme court, I for one will agree to it. I like that better than any thing the gentleman proposes.

Mr. DALY—Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I say the supreme court of Pennsylvania is essentially the same as a court of original and appellate jurisdiction, as our supreme court, and is called by the same name. The only difference is that there is not, as in this State, a higher court above it.

Mr. HAND—In the lower courts of the State of Pennsylvania there is a class of judges who hold their office for five years, provided they behave themselves for that length of time. I am willing to adopt that; that our supreme court judges shall hold their term for five or even for ten years. As I have said, I was highly gratified with many features of the speech of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], as it must be very pleasant to every man to listen to the music of his voice, and the poetry of his sentences, beautifully as they are constructed and come floating down across these seats to our ears. They were very beautiful. They were delightful, and we all listened with pleasure. But when he gave expression to his sentiments, distrusting the people, and desiring to take the power away from them, he only said then what any monarch on the throne of any nation of Europe could have said as well. He only said what any aristocrat who holds his privileges for life, and who is equally, with the gentleman, in favor of permanence and stability, and equally, with him, fearful of any popular influence, would have said as well and with as good reason. He only said what the advocates of the law of primogeniture, which, in Great Britain, holds the property of the realm in the elder branch of the family, would have said as well, and the reasoning is of the same class and the same character. Now, I believe in governing by the people, and I believe they are supreme. I believe they should be intrusted with the supremacy everywhere, not only in electing the President of the United States, who holds in his hand many of our important interests; not only in electing members of Congress, who legislate upon national affairs, and whose duties involve control of interests of the very highest order, as regards our citizens, but also of the Governor and the Legislature of this State, and the judiciary of this State as well. No man of ordinary intelligence who attends the sessions of the supreme court or other courts of the State, in this age of the world, when men are educated, when men think for themselves, when men understand all the interests of society — can attend the sessions of a court and listen to the decisions of the judge and his charges to the jury, without being fully qualified to judge of the capacity or incapacity, the partiality or impartiality of that judge. Our intelligent people will take his measure to a fraction. I am willing to trust all this to the people. I am not opposed to the period of eight years, the period for which judges hold office under our present Constitution; but to give them a life tenure, to take away from them that responsibility to which we hold public servants in all other departments of government, is doing violence to a well understood principle of human nature, from the laborer who toils under your care to the highest office in the gift of the people. It is safe to watch your public or private servants, with the power of a speedy removal of the unfaithful. No man will be the worse for that watching. No man will do the worse for that responsibility during his service. I fail to discover, after all the learned speeches on this subject, any difference in the application of this rule between the judiciary and other branches of government. I fail to discover any weight in the objections to this comparatively long tenure. They say men will be political in their decisions. It will be making the office a mere political office. Political parties will sway men on the bench in their judgments. If human nature were perfect I would be willing a judge should hold his office for life. I would have no limit to his power. If he would always do justice between man and man, if he were above the fluctuations to which men are incident in their opinions, if he were above party influence, then I would have no objections to the life tenure. But unfortunately the judge is not removed from political prejudice by being placed upon the bench. He is a man still, subject to human infirmities, subject to human impressions, subject to being swayed by political influence. Place him on the bench for life and he is a politician still. And all these political prejudices sway him as actually when he has the life tenure as though he were elected annually for the same office. We find this by experience. Let experience decide this. I will take the supreme court of the United States. Now, I am not afraid to speak boldly and freely. Any man must have been a poor observer who has not seen that, from the time of Chief Justice Marshall, down to the war of the rebellion, when slavery was swept away forever, in every case in which the subject of slavery was involved, or its interest supposed to be in danger, the decision has been of a political character; a pro-slavery character has been given to the decision. I do not impeach the integrity, honesty and good intentions of those judges, but they have been swayed in those opinions by their subserviency to the slave power, which, happily, is now gone forever. The exigencies of their party have seemed to demand such decisions, and the independence supposed to be secured by this life tenure has utterly failed, as it always will fail, to place judges above the influences that sway common men.

Mr. FOLGER—Has the gentleman ever read the case of Prigg against the Commonwealth?

Mr. HAND—No, sir.

Mr. FOLGER—Then there is one decision which he has not observed. This decision holds that slavery is not of abstract right, but is entirely the creature of municipal regulation. So far, as it seems to me, it does not tend to favor slavery.

Mr. HAND—I have read a good many of these cases. I well remember the case of Passmore Williamson, who was convicted and imprisoned for months in Philadelphia, by a political judge, for a pretended contempt, against all law and reason, so that his own party, for very shame, cried out against him. The gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], says that the people will pay very little attention to this subject, that the whole management is left to the members of the bar, that the people care nothing about it; and, before he gets through with his argument, he tells us, if the judges hold their position for only four or six years, they will be subject to the machinations of political maneuverers. Why should the caucus, the wire-pullers, maneuver a man that that they care nothing about? Why should the people who manage the politics here, attempt to control this matter when they care nothing about it, and pay no attention whatever to it, but leave it to members of the bar? Still, there may be danger from that source—that by political maneuvers we shall get political judges. Perhaps all this is logical, and perhaps it is argument that hangs well together, but I do not see it in that light. The whole of the argument of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] was good aristocratic doctrine, a doctrine that you can find everywhere if you go back in history about one hundred years. The universal doctrine then, like the gentleman's doctrine now, may thus be fairly stated: let every thing be removed from and above the people and let every office be permanent. Let no popular influence endanger any man in his place of power. When the advocates of free institutions in king-ridden and priest-ridden Europe shall attempt reform, and attempt to establish republican institutions, that is the first argument that meets them. Why, the speech of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] would be an excellent speech in opposition to any attempt of this kind. It is the speech that you find in the mouths of the aristocrats everywhere. "We want permanency, we want a king or a queen, what holds office for life, above the reach of popular opinion, entirely above the fluctuations of popular parties." I will not repeat the whole of the gentleman's argument, but I say that it is the argument of those who distrust the people, and who are unwilling to commit the people's interests to the the people's care and keeping. I cannot see the distinction that is talked about here, between the judiciary and other important officers. We elect our Governor for a limited period of time. Now the Governor is a very important officer and has very important interests in his hands. The pardoning power is an immense power. Men who are convicted of crimes, hold their liberties and lives at the will of the Governor. Should he not therefore be permanent, be placed above the fluctuations of party, be elected for life, or better still, should not the office come down by hereditary descent? Let us take a man and put him in that position, and place him entirely beyond the reach of political parties, beyond the reach of the popular opinion of this generation, and if the argument is good for this, why not let the office be hereditary, and let his children and his children's children, sit there in that high executive seat from generation to generation? The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] to be consistent, should argue that the judiciary should not only hold office for life, but that the oldest son should inherit the office, so that the members of that family should go on from generation to generation sitting in the high judicial seat, dressed again in the robes that have been cast off in republican simplicity and as the gentleman should say, in republican folly, and the people should fall down and worship as of old—

Here the gavel fell, the gentleman's time having expired.

Mr. RATHBUN—I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the committee, but there are some things said as we go along that are worthy of a moment's consideration. I have listened to the debate here for a long time, and have followed it around the circle so that we have pretty nearly accomplished the first outline; and the arguments which have been used have been exceedingly various, some of them novel, many that can hardly claim to be called novel, and some that are contradictory. Now, the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] who is not in his seat, has given us, on various occasions, his views in regard to the judiciary, and has told us several times of the impropriety of meddling with the court of appeals. He has also told us, on a number of occasions, that that court was the most intelligent, the most industrious and the most able court under the heavens, that there was no court on earth equal to it, that for a period of twenty years we had gone on electing judges to that court, and he defied any man — and he looked about the house for some one to accept his challenge to deny that the men elected to that court had discharged their duty with entire fidelity and with great industry and ability; and that challenge was not responded to by any body, the silence of the house yielding assent to the declaration of that gentleman in regard to the character of the judges of the court of appeals; yet we find him now using arguments to show that it is hardly democratic to allow a man to be elected for a term of eight years, and not at all democractic to allow him to be elected for any longer term. Now, I believe there has been, under the present Constitution, nineteen judges elected to that court, and no man in this Convention has said a word in complaint of any one of them. They were each elected by the people for a term of eight years — by the people, that it is said we are afraid of, because we propose to let them elect their judges for a longer term. My friend from Broome [Mr. Hand] is very fierce in defense of the rights of the people, and because we propose that the people themselves shall pass upon this question of the length of the judicial tenure of office, and shall retain the right to select their own judges, we are charged with being afraid to trust them. Why, sir, instead of being afraid to trust the people we are willing to trust them for any length of time. Confidence in the people is all on our side, and fear of them appears to be on the other side. And, sir, why should we not be willing to trust the people for any length of time when they have shown, during the last twenty years, by the election of thirty-two judges to the supreme court and of four judges to the court of appeals, that they are capable of choosing competent judges, and when the experience of that period shows that there has been no failure anywhere in the State to find good judges. The gentlemen on the other side are really making an argument which shows that the people can be trusted with entire confidence to do their own business, and that they make few, if any, mistakes. Having found that the people have wisdom enough to elect their judges for terms of eight years each, through a period of twenty years, how can we be unwilling to trust them to elect their judges for a term of six years longer, in order to secure to the State a greater amount of service upon the bench, from these unequaled judges without the disturbance of recurring elections? When you see such men unimpeached and unimpeachable, put by the people upon the judicial bench, why should you wish to see them sent away at the expiration of a short term to be replaced by other men?—or, why wish to create a contest between them and other men for their position? Sir, what I desire is that when the people select good judges they may have the benefit of the learning and experience of those judges for the longest possible time. The people are sovereign and they appoint judges and the judges are not only responsible to the sovereigns as sovereigns, but they are responsible to the law and amenable to it for any misdemeanor. But, it is said that this is an "aristocratic" doctrine, and when gentlemen claim that they desire judges to hold office for long terms in order that the people may derive the greatest amount of benefit from the experience and knowledge of the judges we are asked, why not elect our Governor for a long term so that the exercise of the pardoning power and of his other functions may be permanent? The answer to that question has been repeated here over and over again, and it is this: Upon questions of politics where the State officers ought to be subservient to the line of politics, called for by the majority of the people, such officers as the Governor, the Attorney-General, the heads of departments, members of the Assembly, etc., who should be amenable to the will of the people, as declared at their political elections, the term of office should not be long. A general change in the political sentiments of the majority of the people of the State calls for a change in the executive departments of the State government, and the majority of the people have a right to have their line of policy adopted and carried forward under their own administration, instead of under the administration of the minority. With the change in the predominant political sentiment, and in the executive offices of the State, there is a change in the general policy of the State in the management of the canals, in the policy of taxation, etc. In such matters, change in politics may properly produce change in the executive policy of the State, but should it change the course of the judiciary? Shall the law change because parties change? Do gentlemen want the law to be as changeable as political parties, or do they want stability, firmness and unchangeableness, and the administration of the law? If they do not want the administration of the law to change in this way, then the judiciary should be above and beyond party, and there should be no such thing as frequent election of judges. These gentlemen want the judges held "responsible to the people?" Why the people they talk about are on one side the democratic party, and on the other the republican party, each to elect its judges, and each judge so elected to be responsible to his party, and not to the whole people. If the judge comes on to the bench a democrat he goes off a democrat in ninety-nine times out of one hundred, and if he is eligible to re-election he goes back to the party that put him on the bench, his allegiance is to his party, and by such allegiance he seeks re-election. This doctrine of responsibility to the people, which these gentlemen promulgate so loudly, simply means responsibility to party. Gentlemen had better begin the examination of these questions, and see to whom responsibility and allegiance are due in such cases. They will find that the practical working of the system proposed is the very thing to destroy this responsibility to party, and substitute for it responsibility to the people. A man may be put on the bench as a democrat, but when he enters upon his duties let him feel that he owes his party nothing, and the people every thing. Then you have a judge who is fit to remain upon the bench so long as he is capable of discharging his official duties. I am in favor of a long term for our judges, because I desire to see a bench formed of judges who, when they take their seats, will feel that they have been chosen by the whole people; that they are responsible to the whole people; that they owe no allegiance to their party; and that they have no claim upon any party for re-election; but that they constitute the only stable and unchangeable part of our government, which is above and beyond all party influence or interference. If gentlemen desire a bench of the opposite character, all they have to do is to vote for a short term of office; then they will find the judges subservient to the party by whom they are elected, and always looking back to that party with anxious eyes to see if they are in the right line of policy to secure re-election. But if you want judges that shall be independent of party ties and party obligations, let them be put upon the bench in such a manner that they will feel themselves above and beyond all party lines and party influences.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] is not in order, having already spoken once upon this question.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I do not rise, sir, for the purpose of discussing this question, but to state, with reference to the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. Rathbun], that I have never spoken in this body upon the tenure of the judges of the supreme court; and further, that what I did say upon the tenure of the judges of the court of appeals was that I should submit to the proposition of the committee for the fourteen years' tenure, and I was in favor of the election of judges and of their being eligible to be re-elected. I may say further, in order that I may not be misunderstood, that I would prefer the tenure of eight years to the tenure of fourteen years, although I have not made, and I do not propose to make, any point upon it.

Mr. MAGEE—I desire to state briefly some reasons for the view which I take of this question. I have come here with the fixed opinion, an opinion formed long ago, and which has grown to maturity with me in the course of the past forty years, that the life tenure will give the State a better judiciary than any other system, and that it gave us the best we ever had and the best we ever can have. I remember, sir, with great distinctness, the condition of our State prior to the Constitutional Convention of 1821. I was then in my youth, entering upon the responsible relations of life, and I was somewhat of a politician. I took an active part in the changes that were made at that time, and I know what the causes were that changed our judicial system then. The judges of the supreme court were members of the council of revision. I am not quite sure that they did not constitute the entire council. No act of the Legislature could become a statute without their approbation. They properly and necessarily rejected (as our Governors do now) many local and private bills, and so, while in the honest discharge of their duties, they excited the displeasure of the disappointed party. Again, they were members of the council of appointment. You will recollect, sir, as many gentlemen here will recollect, that prior to 1821, all the judicial, executive, and ministerial officers of the State, except Governor and Lieutenant-Governor, were appointed by that council. Your judges, your sheriffs, your county clerks, your district attorneys, your surrogates, even your justices of the peace, had to pass that ordeal. The result was, as it is under our present system, there were more disappointed men than men whose wishes were gratified. The rejected ones, of course, believing that their merits far transcended those of their opponents, became dissatisfied, and so there arose a cry against the judges as being politicians. It was after the war of 1812, not very long after it, when taxes were burdensome as they are now, and an outcry was raised against the old democratic party, on account of their extravagance. It was then called the "Buck-tail" party by way of derision, as the democratic party is now called the "copperhead" party. The democratic party carried the Constitutional Convention, and they demanded at the hands of that Convention that the heads of the judiciary should be taken off, and the judicial system changed, and the Convention acquiesced. In that action the people of the State of New York committed a great mistake. We have never had as pure a judiciary since that time as we had before. I confess, sir, that I am in part responsible for that error. I participated in that action, and God knows I have been entirely satisfied long since that it was wholly wrong. Now, the Constitution of 1846 committed another error. The judiciary system which they handed down to us was not equal to that handed down by the Convention of 1821 to them. Gentlemen here argue for long terms, and for short terms. Some gentlemen want short terms and near responsibility of the judges to their constituents. Now, sir, I object to that for the reason that the frequency of our elections is one of the greatest evils of our political system. This often recurring excitement at elections, does more to disturb and demoralize the public mind than all other causes combined. I should like to diminish the number of elections for all officers. I have as much confidence in the honesty of the people as my friend from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] or any other person, but I do not believe that the people are always intelligent in regard to the questions they are called upon the decide. What do the people know about the qualifications of a man who is a candidate for the judgeship? What proportion of the people ever go into an investigation to find out what his legal attainments are, or even to ascertain what is his moral character? I venture to say that there is not one in five hundred who knows any thing about these things, and the judge is elected under the direction of a party caucus, democratic or republican. The people pay little or no attention to the nominations, which are uniformly determined by the politicians of one party or the other. First, there is the caucus, then the Convention, then the nomination, and last the election, all managed by politicians. Now, sir, I prefer a life tenure for our judges; but as I do not expect to get that, of course I shall vote for the next best thing, which is the proposition of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock]. We need upon the bench the highest order of legal talent, the highest order of integrity and morality—our very best men in every way. Now, we cannot induce gentlemen of the highest class to leave profitable professional employments and take a seat on the bench at a moderate salary for a tenure of eight years with a chance, in the case of each judge, that if his party is not in power at the end of his term, he will be cast adrift to shift for himself and find a new business. We cannot get the highest class of men for our judges if we elect them for short terms. The longer the term the better the class of men we will get. I do not wish to say any thing to hurt any body's feelings, but we have here, I believe, a hundred lawyers; most of them are young men, and it just strikes me it is possible that some of them are looking ahead with anxious eye to a position on the bench. [Laughter.] Their chances are better, therefore, with short terms. And I do not know but even my friend from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] may be influenced to some extent by that consideration. [Laughter.] For myself, sir, I favor the long term — the longer the better. I have given my reasons very briefly and imperfectly, but if my voice would permit me to express myself as I feel I would like to state them more fully.

Mr. SMITH—I desire to say a word upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN—The impression of the Chair is that the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] has already spoken upon this subject.

Mr. SMITH—I did not speak upon this question. I merely corrected a misstatement.

The CHAIRMAN—The gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] followed the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] in the discussion of this question.

Mr. SMITH—I expressly avoided speaking upon this subject—

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair must decide that the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith] cannot proceed except by unanimous consent. There being no objection, the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. SMITH—This question is, perhaps, the most important one that we shall be called upon to consider in connection with the judiciary. I do not propose to trespass long upon the patience of the committee on this occasion. It is very important that this matter should be decided correctly upon its merits, and I must protest against the assumption of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] that all of the profession upon this floor who have addressed the committee upon this subject have spoken from interested motives.

Mr. CURTIS—Will the gentleman allow me a moment? In what I said upon this question I did not attribute interested motives to lawyers upon this floor. I merely stated that I myself, in company with the great mass of the people of the State, was entirely beyond the influences that might affect the profession. I certainly was very far from saying what the gentleman attributes to me.

Mr. SMITH—I may have misunderstood the gentleman; but I understood him to say in substance, that it was time now that the clients of State were represented here after so long a discussion of this subject by the profession, who might be acting under interested motives. Now, sir, I believe that gentlemen of the profession upon this floor have no desire to adopt a system that shall not subserve the best interests of their clients, the people of this State; and I believe that they are as well able to determine what the interests of their clients demand, as gentlemen who have never had any experience either in the profession or as clients. I must protest, also, against that other doctrine promulgated here by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis], and also by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts], that in our action we are entirely above and beyond the people, and the wishes of the people. It is a very pleasant thing, doubtless, to dwell on the top of the mountain, and feed upon ambrosia and drink pure nectar; but, sir, we are here making a Constitution for the people of the State, for the every-day realities of life We are not here to legislate for the gods, but for men, and we must come down to the atmosphere of this nether planet, and we must adapt ourselves to the wants and wishes of the people. I trust, sir, that I shall never be guilty of the cowardice of departing from the cause of truth and morality because the people may demand it; but, on the other hand, when I am acting in a representative capacity, I trust that I shall ever regard the wishes of the people, and never set up any mere notion or fancy of my own on questions of policy, instead of their will, and adhere to it regardless of consequences. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, and the delegates upon this floor, what would be the result of our labors here, were we to follow the rule suggested by the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] and by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] the other day, and insist upon what best suits our fancy, disregarding what the people demand and what they would accept? Now, sir, I insist that we are bound to adapt ourselves to the circumstances that exist in the State, and to the wants and wishes of the people. I might regard the life tenure as the best, but if I believed that the people did not so regard it, that they would reject any Constitution in which it should be incorporated, ought I to insist upon presenting such a Constitution to the people? Would that be wise statesmanship, or even good common sense? I think not? But I do not think that the elective system and the life tenure belong together. If judges were appointed I would not object to the life tenure, although I think it more properly belongs to the past than to the present. But some people seem to live in the dead past, and utterly ignore the living present. It would be wiser, it seems to me, to recognize the present, and to recognize progress in human affairs. It is said by gentlemen that we may trust the people to elect judges for a long term. Now, sir, I think the people require that, if you permit them to elect their judges, or rather, if you devolve upon them the duty of electing their judges, they shall have the privilege of getting rid of a bad judge in case they should be so unfortunate as to elect one. I repeat, sir, that the elective system and the life tenure do not properly belong together. Gentlemen have talked here about political influences, the caucus system, and the evils of partisan elections. Sir, I know it might happen, under an elective system, that by wire-pulling, by caucus arrangements, or by the use of corrupt means, a man might be foisted upon us as judge who would be unfit for the position, either from incompetency or dishonesty. If we should be so unfortunate as to elect a man of that character for a term of fourteen years, would it not be an intolerable evil? Should we not have the privilege of getting rid of him at the end of a shorter period, and replacing him by a man fitted for the position? I am not strenuously opposed to a term longer than eight years; but I think there is good reason why the judges of the court of appeals should hold their office for a longer term than the judges of the supreme court. I voted for a term of fourteen years for the judges of the court of appeals, but I am opposed to so long a term as that for the judges of the supreme court. I believe, in the first place, under an elective system that is too long a term; and, in the second place, that the people are not willing to adopt so long a term under the elective system. I have taken some pains to ascertain public opinion in the section of the State in which I live, and which I have the honor to represent in part. I have believed it to be my duty to ascertain what the public sentiment was, and have not felt that I was above public opinion, or the wishes of my constituents. I have felt rather that I was but an humble representative. Why, sir, are we the lords and masters of the people, placed here to frame a Constitution which they must adopt nolens volens? I do not so understand our position. In my inquiries among the people I have learned, I think, that they are not willing to adopt a fourteen years tenure if they are to elect their judges. Holding this belief, I shall act upon it, notwithstanding the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] may look down with supreme contempt upon such a rule of action and upon the people. Now, sir, in the court of appeals, where we desire permanency and stability, a court which will act as a regulator of inferior courts, there is a propriety in having a longer term of office. But when we come to the supreme court judges, before whom the bar have to appear every day, there is a propriety in retaining a certain control over them, not to destroy their independence, but to correct their vices if they have any, to check their arrogance if they manifest it, and to secure a courteous and faithful discharge of their duties. Gentlemen say that we want permanency and independence in our courts. I would inform them, that, if we give a long tenure to our judges we give permanency and independence to vice as well as to virtue. If we could be perfectly sure of always getting the right men, then those arguments would apply with force; but when we may possibly get a bad man, I am opposed to giving permanency and independence to his dishonesty or imbecility on the bench. I am opposed to placing over me, with my own hand, a tyrant or an imbecile, and depriving myself of all power to get rid of that tyrant or imbecile for a long term of years. If you give the appointment of the judges to the Governor of the State I will accept whoever he may place over me with as much grace as I can command, and try to be satisfied; but if I am to have a voice in electing the judge, and may be so unfortunate as to make choice of a bad one, then I want the privilege, in the shortest possible time, of putting a suitable man in his place. Now, sir, it has been said, and I repeat it, that if a man is a good judge he can be re-elected. In the district where I practice law every judge has been re-elected and I have voted for their re-election.

Mr. HALE—Does the gentleman mean to state that in the fourth district all the judges have been re-elected?

Mr. SMITH—I so understand it.

Mr. HALE—It is a great mistake. Every one of the judges who were elected under the Constitution of 1846 were not re-elected.

Mr. SMITH—I am speaking of the present judges, those now occupying the bench in the fourth district. I am quite sure that they have all been re-elected. I certainly have voted for every one of them, and with the understanding on my part that I was voting for their re-election

Mr. HALE—I understood the gentleman to speak of all the judges who have occupied seats on the bench under the existing Constitution.

Mr. SMITH—No, sir. I spoke only of the present judges. These, Mr. Chairman, are the reasons, in brief, why I am opposed to a tenure of fourteen years. But I am willing to adopt either eight, ten, or twelve years. If we should adopt either of these terms, I think the people would approve our action; but I do not think a longer term for the supreme court would be acceptable. We should, in my judgment, regard the wishes of the people, and not act as though we supposed that we were the people and that wisdom would die with us.

The CHAIRMAN—The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], on taking out all after the word "judges," in the seventh line of the sixteenth section, and insert: "elected under this Constitution shall hold their offices for a term of fourteen years."

Mr. SPENCER—I would inquire whether that does not strike out the amendment which has just been adopted, continuing in office the present judges of these courts?

Mr. COMSTOCK—Oh, no. There was an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown], making the term of the judges of the supreme court, and the other courts named in this section, eight years. I offer my amendment as an amendment to that, because I prefer fourteen years to eight years, and not because I prefer fourteen years to a life tenure. If my amendment shall prevail over the amendment of the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown], we shall then have a term of fourteen years as an amendment to the term for life or during good behavior; and the question will then be for the committee to decide between the term of good behavior and the term of fourteen years. I take it that the immediate question is whether fourteen years shall be preferred to eight years.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and, on a division, there were ayes 39, noes 36, no quorum voting.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the standing Committee on the Judiciary, had made some progress therein but that having found, on a division, there was no quorum present, they had directed their Chairman to report that fact to the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The Secretary will call the roll of the Convention.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move that when the Convention adjourn it adjourn until seven o'clock this evening.

The PRESIDENT—That is the standing order of the Convention,

Mr. COMSTOCK—I thought that an adjournment now would carry the Convention over till to-morrow. My object in making the motion was to avoid that.

The PRESIDENT—We will first ascertain if there is a quorum present.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll of the Convention when the following delegates responded to their names:

Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Axtell, Baker, Barker, Barto, Beals, Bell, Bickford, Bowen, E. A. Brown, Case, Cassidy, Cheritree, Chesebro, Comstock, Cooke, Curtis, Daly, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Eddy, Ely, Endress, Farnum, Ferry, Field, Flagler, Folger, Fowler, Francis, Fuller, Garvin, Goodrich, Graves, Gross, Hadley, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Hardenburgh, Harris, Hatch, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Kinney, A. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Ludington, Magee, Mattice, Merrill, Merwin, Miller, Monell, Nelson, Opdyke, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, Pond, Potter, President, Prindle, Prosser, Rathbun, Robertson, Roy, Seaver, Smith, Spencer, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Van Campen, Wakeman, Wales, Williams, Young—83.

The PRESIDENT—There is a quorum present, but it being now near the hour for taking a recess, if there be no objection, the Chair will declare a recess until seven o'clock this evening.

There being no objection the Convention took a recess until seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock, and again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, of Cayuga, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN announced the pending question to be on the amendment of Mr. Comstock to the amendment of Mr. E. A. Brown, substituting fourteen years as the tenure of office of the judges of the supreme court instead of eight years.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and, on a division, the vote stood 41 ayes to 20 noes.

A DELEGATE—There is no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair will put this question again, several gentlemen did not vote. Gentlemen will please vote.

The question was again put on the amendment and, on a division, the vote stood 43 ayes to 36 noes.

The CHAIRMAN—There is no quorum voting. The Chair must request gentlemen to vote.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I rise to a question of order—seventy-nine is a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chairman is of opinion that seventy-nine is not a quorum. It requires eighty-one to constitute a quorum.

The question was again put on the amendment and, on a division, it was declared carried by a vote of 49 to 35.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. E. A. Brown, as amended.

Mr. McDONALD—I move to amend the amendment by inserting twelve years instead of fourteen.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. McDonald, and, on a division, the vote stood 37 ayes to 40 noes.

A DELEGATE—There is no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN—Gentlemen will please vote.

The question was again put on the amendment, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 40 to 40.

Mr. BICKFORD—I move to substitute ten instead of fourteen.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Bickford, and it was declared lost by a vote of 35 to 48

Mr. BICKFORD—I move to reconsider the vote by which an amendment offered by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. McDonald] to substitute "twelve" for "fourteen", was lost.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Bickford, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I suppose the question is now upon the term of fourteen years.

The CHAIRMAN—That is the question. The question is on the amendment as amended, substituting fourteen years for the life tenure, as reported by the committee.

Mr. EVARTS—We are now, I suppose, brought—

Mr. AXTELL—I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Jefferson moved a reconsideration of the vote, and called a count. If I understand it, that count was not had.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair has no knowledge of a count being called for. The motion was evidently lost on voices and was so declared.

Mr. EVARTS—The question now proposed for the vote of the committee is, I suppose, the same which was passed upon in reference to the court of appeals, which is the question, whether the committee will prefer to fix the period of fourteen years, or tenure during good behavior up to the age of seventy. The same consideration which led gentlemen to support the tenure during good behavior, for the court of appeals even with greater force, it seems to me, applies to the supreme court judges. I take it that nothing has occurred in this body which has at all disturbed the argument presented in favor of a tenure during good behavior. Undoubtedly those who voted for a court of appeals tenure for a fixed term rather than for good behavior, will feel the same reason for voting for it now. I see no reason why the tenure during good behavior, for those judges should not be supported by at least as full a vote as was given for the tenure of the judges of the court of appeals.

The CHAIRMAN—The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. McDONALD—Do I understand the amendment is accepted?

The CHAIRMAN—There is no necessity for its being accepted; the amendment has been adopted by the committee; the question is now upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. CURTIS—I call for a count.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. E. A. Brown, as amended, and, on a division, the vote stood 52 ayes to 25 noes.

Mr. CHESEBRO—There is no quorum voting. There are gentlemen here who have not voted.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair is quite sure there is a quorum present. Gentlemen in favor of this amendment will please vote.

Mr. YOUNG—I am opposed to both that amendment and the provision in the report. I do not know how I shall vote in that case.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair is not able to inform the gentleman.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The gentleman must take his choice, I suppose. [Laughter.]

The question was again put on the amendment as amended and, on a division, it was declared carried by a vote of 62 to 20.

There being no further amendments the SECRETARY read the eighteenth section as follows:

SEC. 18. There shall be elected in each of the counties of this State, except the city and county of New York, one county judge, who shall hold his office for seven years. He shall hold the county court and perform the duties of the office of surrogate. The county court as at present existing, shall be continued with such original and appellate jurisdiction as shall from time to time be conferred upon it by the Legislature. The county judge with two justices of the peace, to be designated according to law, may hold courts of sessions, with such criminal jurisdiction as the Legislature shall prescribe, and perform such other duties as may be required by law. The county judge shall receive an annual salary to be fixed by the board of supervisors, which shall not be diminished during his continuance in office. The justices of the peace for services in courts of sessions shall be paid a per diem allowance out of the county treasury. In counties having a population exceeding forty thousand, the Legislature may provide for the election of a separate officer to perform the duties of the office of surrogate, whose term of office shall be the same as that of the county judge. Inferior local courts, of civil and criminal jurisdiction, may be established by the Legislature in cities; and such courts, except for the cities of New York, Brooklyn and Buffalo, shall have an uniform organization and jurisdiction in such cities.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I offer the following amendment:

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

"After the word 'continued,' in the fifth line, strike out the residue of the line, and also the sixth line, and to and including the word 'Legislature,' in the seventh line, and insert as follows: 'And shall have original jurisdiction in all actions of slander, libel, malicious prosecution, assault and battery, false imprisonment, seduction, and breach of promise of marriage, and shall also have such other original and such appellate jurisdiction as shall from time to time be conferred upon it by the Legislature. No county judge shall be permitted to practice in any of the courts of this State during the term for which he shall have have been elected.' In the sixteenth line strike out the word 'may,' and insert the word 'shall,' and after the word 'judge,' in the nineteenth line, add 'and all surrogates in office when this Constitution shall take effect shall hold their respective offices until the expiration of the term for which they were respectively elected.'"

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—The amendment, in part, consists of the amendment offered earlier in this debate by Mr. Cooke. In offering this amendment I am not about to inflict a long speech with which to tire the patience of the Convention, but I will endeavor to state, as briefly as I may, the reasons which have induced me to present it for the consideration of the Convention. This amendment is, with a little addition, substantially the proposition heretofore submitted by my friend from Ulster [Mr. Cooke], as found in Document No. 111. It will be recollected, that, early in the session, I introduced a resolution, which was adopted, directing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the expediency and propriety of reporting a section enlarging the powers and duties of the county courts. The resolution was referred to that committee, and though not specifically answered in their report, it no doubt received some consideration at their hands, for they modified the section of the Constitution of 1846, as will be seen by a reference to it. By the fourteenth section of the sixth article of that instrument, it was provided that the county court should have such jurisdiction in cases arising in justices' courts, and in special cases, as the Legislature should prescribe, but should have no original civil jurisdiction except in such special cases. This provision effectually cut off pretty much all jurisdiction in civil proceedings except such as might be denominated or construed to be special cases. This led to a variety of legislative enactments, giving rise to a judicial construction relative to the powers and duties of county courts, and the Legislature gradually enlarged their powers so as to give them jurisdiction in cases of foreclosing mortgages, partitions of real estate, and the sale of infants' estates in cases arising in their respective counties, and a variety of other matters denominated special, not necessary here to enumerate, but all of which tended to increase the responsibility and respectability of those courts. They could not, however, and cannot try causes except in certain cases originating in justices' courts, and brought before them on appeal. The judiciary committee, in the eighteenth section of their report, which it is proposed to amend, provide that the county courts shall be continued with such original appellate jurisdiction as shall, from time to time, be conferred upon them by the Legislature. I propose to go farther and insert the particular sections named in the amendment, and leave other sections to the wisdom and discretion of the Legislature. I would, in fact, give these courts original jurisdiction, in all cases, and if the committee deem it wise, or any member should propose an amendment to that effect, I will cheerfully adopt such suggestion or accept such amendment. My amendment covers a class of actions which may well be intrusted to these courts for trial, and may thus be disposed of to the great relief of the circuit and supreme courts. The county courts, as proposed to be constituted, and indeed as they were constituted by the Constitution of 1846, are to be upon a very different basis, and to be conducted on a very different plan from that which created them under the Constitution of 1821. By that Constitution, the county court was made to consist of five judges, all of whom might be laymen, except it was the first judge, and he, of the degree of counselor of the supreme court, was vested with certain duties at chambers, which were otherwise required to be performed by a justice of the supreme court. One great objection urged by members of the Convention of 1846 against continuing the original jurisdiction of these courts, which they possessed under the Constitution of 1821, was that, the five judges, as the court was then constituted, were too often composed of men entirely unfitted for the station, that they were mere judges in name, without qualification, and that they did not add strength or efficiency to the court. "It is composed," said an eminent member of that Convention, "generally of a judge at the head, and one or two fools on each side of him;" and he gave an instance in one of the counties, where an intelligent and learned man who was the presiding judge in such a court pronounced a decision as the opinion of the court. When he had concluded, one of the side judges arose with great importance and said, "It may be the opinion of the court, but it aint mine by a d—d sight." [Laughter.] This brought up the associate on the other side, who also arose and added with an oath, "Nor is it mine.' The presiding judge then quietly remarked to the bar, "Gentlemen, I am overruled." An alteration in the mode of constituting county courts, as I have already observed, was made by the Convention of 1846. They were made to consist of one judge only, but with circumscribed powers already stated. It was urged as another reason for thus limiting the power of the court, that the supreme court as proposed to be constituted, could and would do all the business that would be imposed upon it, in the trial of all civil actions, and that the county courts were only needed for the hearing of appeals from justices' courts, the disposal of such little special business as might be intrusted to them by the Legislature, and that the transaction of any other business would cast a useless expense upon the several counties. But has this proved to be the case? On the contrary, has not the experience of all of us proved that such a system has been productive of great delays and has added more to the expense of conducting the circuit courts than would have been incurred if county courts had been clothed with original jurisdiction? The time that has been occupied in the trials of this class of cases to which I have referred has frequently prevented the trial of important causes, amounting in many instances, by reason of the delay, to a denial of justice. Petty actions of assault and battery and slander have frequently occupied the whole time allotted for a circuit, while the costs and expenses of those attending upon the trial of more important matters has been enormous. I have known circuit after circuit, where the time of the court has thus been virtually wasted. At the last circuit in Washington county the whole week was taken up with the trial of three actions — two of assault and battery and one of slander. There was one verdict of ten dollars, one of six cents, and in the other a nonsuit was ordered. Now all this may and will be avoided by the course I have proposed in my amendment. Such actions, though perhaps not as frequent as formerly, will still be brought. It has long ceased to be considered by men of high and honorable standing that an action of slander is necessary to protect one's reputation, or secure a continuance of good character. But they will still exist, to a greater or less extent, and if they must be brought, let them be disposed of by the county court, and the penalty to be fixed by the Legislature as formerly, restricting them as to cost, if brought in the supreme court; and in most cases where business is of a local character particularly, parties will prefer to try their causes before their own tribunals. Make it an object, as I remarked, for capable, worthy men to aspire to the office of county judge; provide liberally for compensation, and you cannot fail to have afforded a great relief to the burdens imposed upon the supreme court, and you facilitate and expedite the presentation of the large and accumulating business of your State. On the other hand, it was urged, by distinguished members, that while they did not expect or desire that the county courts should be continued as they were then constituted, and disqualified as many of the judges undoubtedly were, yet, if it was made a respectable court with ample power and jurisdiction, and constituted by the appointment or election of a single judge, who might in every way be qualified for the station, it would then be an important aid in the disposal of the business appertaining to courts of law, and would prove a great saving of time to the superior courts, which would thus be enabled to bestow greater attention to the more important business before them. The courts were organized as proposed, but their powers were restricted. Even with the limited jurisdiction allotted to these courts, they have, I believe, in most instances, been very reputable tribunals. In most cases lawyers of respectable standing in the profession, and held in high estimation as to private character and worth, have been elected to the office of county judge, and they have brought credit and worth upon the courts. How much more could that worth and respectability be increased, if you added power and jurisdiction to the courts, and made the office of judge a much more honorable and important position than it now is? Make it thus an object to be sought after by capable and worthy men, and pay them liberally for their services, and you add, in my judgment, a great aid to the speedy transaction of legal business. I know, from my own experience, that even under the old system of 1821, by a fortunate selection of judges in the county in which I reside, cases were as well and ably tried for years as they were in the supreme court. This was when such men as Judge Willard and Judge McLean and their associates formed our court of common pleas. This may and will be the case now, if proper inducements are held out and the services of capable incumbents secured. As there has been a motion to divide the question on my amendment, I will say nothing more now.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I would suggest that we proceed with so much of the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen], as relates to the jurisdiction which shall be given to the court.

Mr. CHESEBRO—Is an amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN—An amendment is now in order.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I will apologize for the amendment I propose to offer, because it is not in that shape that it should be to be incorporated into the Constitution. Still, it embraces the idea I wish to have in the Constitution, and I will read it with the permission of the Convention. It is to strike out that part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen], which, as it now is, is inconsistent with the amendment I propose. I desire that the county court shall have original jurisdiction in all other cases than those specified by him, where the parties to any action shall reside in the county, in which the damage to be collected shall not exceed one thousand dollars.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—Does the gentleman propose to add that?

Mr. CHESEBRO—This is in addition to the specific jurisdiction conferred.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I desire to add the words "criminal conversation" to come in after "seduction."

There being no objection the amendment of Mr. C. L. Allen was so amended.

Mr. CHESEBRO—Will the gentleman accept the amendment I have offered? It is simply this, that the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] shall give to that court original jurisdiction in all cases where the parties reside in the same county, and where damages are claimed in an action to the amount of one thousand dollars.

The amendment was accepted.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move to amend by adding these words: "subject to such provisions as shall be made by law for the removal of the cases into the Supreme Court." I offer this to the end that there may be a power in the Legislature in the class of cases, the jurisdiction of which is expressly conferred upon the county court, to remove them under wise limitations into the supreme court. I think this jurisdiction of the county court might be intolerable unless qualified in that way. There might be cases of great moment, where the defendant might have excellent reason for asking the removal of the case into the supreme court. I therefore propose that the Legislature shall have power to provide by law for such removal.

Mr. ANDREWS—The pending question is one, doubtless, of much importance, and has attracted the attention and consideration, I doubt not, of most of the members of the Convention. It will be recollected that, under the Constitution of 1846 it was provided that county courts should be organized and should have such jurisdiction in special cases as might be conferred by law. It was supposed that, under this provision, the Legislature could confer upon county courts jurisdiction in specified common law actions as the Legislature might determine; and the Legislature acted upon this assumption by subsequently conferring upon the county court original jurisdiction in certain cases known as cases at common law. But upon the consideration of the constitutionality of that legislation, the court of appeals decided that the phrase "special cases" in the Constitution restricted the power of the Legislature to confer jurisdiction to proceedings known as special proceedings, and excluded the Legislature from the right to confer jurisdiction in ordinary cases. Upon that construction the county courts have since been carried on. The question whether or not those courts should be made courts of original jurisdiction was discussed in the committee which reported this article; and although a variety of ideas was entertained upon this subject, it was, I believe, unanimously considered by the committee, in the end, that it was better and safer to provide in the Constitution that the Legislature might confer upon county courts jurisdiction in common law actions without attempting to here designate them, and without imperatively clothing them with jurisdiction in any specified cases. The precise difference between the section as reported and the section as now proposed to be amended is this: shall we, by the Constitution, determine and affirm the jurisdiction of the county courts in the actions specified, or shall we confer upon the Legislature power to vest this jurisdiction, without assuming ourselves to determine whether it shall be conferred or not? Now, I am strongly of opinion that it is better to leave this subject as the committee have left it, subject to the control of the Legislature. In many States of the Union —Pennsylvania, for instance—the county courts are the principal courts of original jurisdiction in the State. They occupy the place of the supreme court under the organization in this State; and, in that State, it is a very important court and an indispensable part of the judicial system.

Mr. HATCH—I would be very glad if the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews] would explain, if he is familiar with the construction of the courts in Pennsylvania. So far as I am informed, it is much more simple than our courts. I would like him to say whether it is a better system than ours.

Mr. ANDREWS—I am not familiar with the precise details of the system in Pennsylvania. But I undertand that they have a court known as a court of common pleas, and the territorial jurisdiction of that court is not confined to a single county. I understand that it is the only court of original jurisdiction, aside from the inferior courts, in that State.

Mr. HATCH —I am informed, by very high authority, that the appellate jurisdiction of that State is composed of about five judges, and that they dispose of all the cases before it, and keep up the calendar of the court.

Mr. ANDREWS—The reputation of that court no doubt is high. I was proceeding to say that, in my judgment, it would be best to leave this matter as the committee have left it. And for this reason: we must remember that in this State there are many counties with a population ranging from sixty to one hundred and twenty thousand souls. In those counties, I have no doubt, there could be organized an efficient county court, because the amount of litigation in a dense population would be sufficient to give employment to such a court, and the compensation could be such as to attract to the bench men of ability and talent, which would give the court character and influence. On the other hand, there are a number of counties in the State in which the population ranges from eighteen to thirty-five thousand. I think the population of nearly half the counties of the State is within the latter number. And I submit to gentlemen representing small counties, whether there is not now an adequate force in the supreme court, to do the business which arises in those counties, and which renders unnecessary the expense of an organization of a county court for the trial of original actions. If we had no supreme court, county courts would be indispensable. But I submit that the expense of organizing and keeping up these courts in these small counties, is not only unnecessary, but that the result would be that, in such counties, while the jurisdiction would be important, the bench would be weak and inefficient. The counties would not be willing to provide the compensation that would be necessary. Hence, you would have an extremely inefficient judicial organization to do important business. For this reason I am of opinion that it is better for this Convention to leave this subject in the hands of the Legislature, and while removing the restriction of the Constitution of 1846, leave the Legislature to organize these county courts, having regard to localities, and not attempt to confer a uniform and absolute jurisdiction in the cases referred to. I trust, therefore, that the committee, upon the consideration of the whole question, will leave the subject where the Committee on the Judiciary have left it.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I have no desire to consume time in the discussion of this question. My object in offering this amendmemt was twofold. In the first place, I deemed it impracticable to insert in the Constitution, as has been attempted by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen], a class of cases which ought to be submitted to the jurisdiction of the county court. For instance, it is impracticable to designate and name all the cases which really ought to come within the jurisdiction of that court, as has been attempted by him; and that therefore it would be wise to insert, in addition to those cases he mentions, that the jurisdiction of the court should amount to a thousand dollars, or to any other limited amount which the Convention sees fit to adopt—not exclusive jurisdiction but jurisdiction for the trial of that class of cases. Now, sir, I should have been willing as a member of this Convention to have adopted, without any amendment whatever, the report of the Committee on the Judiciary. Although there are features in it which did not meet my approbation, still I should have been willing to have taken that, as a whole, as a good constitutional provision. But inasmuch as this committee have seen fit, as they have in regard to pretty much every other report which has been submitted to them, to overhaul it and to attempt to better that which has been submitted to the minds of eminent gentlemen who are from different sections of the State, I deem it a privilege to attempt also to introduce some amendments and improvements to this article. Now, sir, in regard to this county court, as it is organized under the present Constitution, and as I suppose this report of the Committee on the Judiciary organizes it, I do not know how it may be in different sections of the State, how other localities are affected, but in my own county we have not the highest regard for it. I do not regard it as much more than a justice's court except that, it has an inclosed jurisdiction in the trial of criminal cases. I believe that it is wise and politic, and that it will be convenient for the people, that we should make this court a respectable one, which now it is not. The organization of the court makes it a court of inferior jurisdiction, and it occasions the very difficulty which has been suggested by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews], that it does not call to the bench that class of lawyers who should preside over its deliberations, and that, if this court was a court with the jurisdiction which the amendment proposes to make it, it would call to its bench a man competent to the discharge of its duties. The court, as it is now organized, is simply a criminal court, with no original jurisdiction. It is neither more nor less than an enlarged court, a justice of the peace It is not such a court as should be organized to administer the criminal law of the county. In regard to the enlargement of the jurisdiction in civil cases, there are a great many cases which suitors do not choose to bring before justices of the peace, which should be brought before a court of higher sanctity and more responsibility than a justice's court. This court is intermediate between the justice's and the supreme court, for the trial of such cases, and in my judgment it should be so organized that it shall have original civil jurisdiction in that class of cases, limiting the jurisdiction to an amount, say, of a thousand dollars. Then we should have a court which, in my judgment, will relieve the supreme court from a large class of cases that now come upon its calendar. The gentleman from Onondaga says that counties are not burdened with that class of litigations which the organization of this court will embrace. I submit to him that he is in error in this regard. I do not know how it may be with his county, but in my county I know it is eminently true that the calendar of our circuit court is lumbered up with cases which ought, by constitutional provision, to be limited to the lower court. There is now a large class of cases upon that calendar which cannot be reached or tried for the reason that it is lumbered up with those cases which ought to be disposed of in a court of a more limited jurisdiction than the supreme court. Now, as to the expense of this court, I do not see that any larger cost is to be entailed upon the county by this court, with its enlarged jurisdiction, than we now have, except the simple expense of running the court. Because it has its jury, it has all its attendants, it has in every other respect the same expense precisely that will be incurred by that court with the enlarged jurisdiction, except the time which the court will be obliged to sit to dispose of this class of cases. Take this class of cases, of assault and battery, of crim. con., and the other classes that are designated by the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen], and the class of cases that are limited, where the amount of damages claimed is not over one thousand dollars; I say it is entirely proper to limit those to a court of this kind, for a county, instead of lumbering the supreme court with that class of cases. It is a saving of money. It is economy on the part of the people, and it will elevate this county court to a degree of respectability which it ought to have to try cases of the character which are now committed to it. There are tried in the county court, as it is at present organized, a class of cases, in which men charged with crime may be sent to the State prison for the period of ten years. Will any lawyer in this Convention, or will any gentleman claim that that class of cases should be tried before men of inferior ability?—that they should not be tried before a judge who has all the legal attainments necessary to dispose of a question of that kind in the oyer and terminer? I trust not. And that class of cases must be tried before this court. Let us give this court that jurisdiction which will raise it up to the standard of respectability which it is entitled to, and confer upon it a jurisdiction of this kind, and it will be a respectable and decent court, which I claim it is not now, in certain counties, at all events.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I cannot agree with my friend from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro], or my friend from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] in the amendments that they propose. I believe it is better that we should adhere to the report made by the committee. The committee proposes to leave it to the Legislature to confer such original and appellate jurisdiction upon the county judge as it may think proper. It seems to me that we had better leave it there. At present, certainly, there is no necessity whatever for giving county courts the extensive jurisdiction that is here proposed. The circuit courts are abundantly competent now to try all these causes. Nothing will be gained by the suitors or by the public in organizing another court of equal jurisdiction that may try such causes, and have two courts in each county of concurrent jurisdiction in regard to them. Certain it is, Mr. Chairman, that the judges of the supreme court are abundantly competent now to keep all the calendars of the circuit in the State clear. Indeed, I believe if one supreme court judge was withdrawn from each district, and there were but three left they would be abundantly competent to hold all the circuits and to discharge all the duties at general and special term. I have no doubt of it. I think the labors that are devolved upon them now, with four in a district, a greater number by four in the State than there has been under the present Constitution, where four are constantly serving in the court of appeals—

Mr. CHESEBRO—Will the gentleman allow me one moment? We have an organization of the supreme court in one district consisting of four gentlemen who, I do not think will compare illy with any other four in the State in any other district, and that calendar to-day stands with seventy causes upon it; and after two weeks of work by one of the most diligent judges in that district, we did not reach the number of thirty-five at the last circuit.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I think the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro] will find that that is an exceptional case. If after working two weeks at the circuit they have gone one-half through the calendar, let them stay two weeks more and finish the calendar. There is time enough. There are weeks enough in the year, and there are four judges in the district and but two circuits to be held in each county in the year. Why should jurisdiction be given to the county court? Is it not just as easy for suitors to go to the circuit with a cause and try it there? Have they not more confidence in the supreme court judge that will hold the circuit than they will have in any county judge that will be likely to be chosen? Is it not just as important in these cases enumerated here — seduction, false imprisonment, breach of promise, crim. con., libel and slander — that the law questions involved should have a trial before a judge of the highest capacity as it is that any other cause should be so tried? Are not the parties more likely to be satisfied in those cases with a trial at the circuit than they would be with a trial at the county court? This multiplying of courts of original jurisdiction in a county is a great evil of itself. It is far better that there should be but one court of original jurisdiction in each county to hear all these cases. Let that court be held as often as is necessary to decide them, and let it sit long enough to keep the calendar clear. It is an irritation to the people to call them out so frequently for the sake of attending a double set of courts as jurymen, as witnesses, as parties, or as counsel. No good is accomplished. On the contrary, a great evil comes from it. I do not believe in the necessity at all for any thing of this kind. It destroys the simplicity of the system. It increases expense and trouble. I do not see what is to be gained. And, is it not enough that we leave this to the Legislature, that we give them power to give original jurisdiction to the county court if they find it expedient? If, hereafter, before another Constitutional Convention shall meet, it shall be found that the judges cannot keep the calendar clear, or that any great public benefit is to be attained by giving concurrent jurisdiction to another court, it will be time enough then for the Legislature to consider whether it will be wise to give it to the county judge. I prefer, Mr. Chairman, the report as made by the committee; but I differ with them in one thing. I think that four years, for which we have elected our county judge, is enough; and if such an amendment is offered I shall certainly vote for it in preference to seven years, as provided in this report.

Mr. McDONALD—I am in favor of the amendment offered, for these reasons: In the county in which I reside, instead of there being a calendar of seventy at the last circuit, there was a calendar of about one hundred and thirty, and only twenty-five of the cases were reached. In Monroe county there is a calendar of three or four hundred, and it takes two years to reach a cause. In Steuben county they have now, I believe, four circuits by the new arrangement, and there, I understand, they always have a calendar of one hundred and thirty or one hundred and fifty causes. And the fact that throughout the State the calendar of the supreme court is at most circuits so large that no cause can be reached in the course of two years is too well known by the lawyers of this Convention to require further reference. Take our present system. How is it? We have, by the mode of re-trial, in cases involving not over two hundred dollars, any number of trials in the county court, and by the change thus made by the Legislature, there are frequent civil trials in such cases in the shape of re-trials of cases tried in justices' courts. And no one complains of that. It does seem to me, therefore, that we should relieve the supreme court. I doubt whether there is a lawyer here who is not actually in favor of increasing the jurisdiction of the county courts. The only question is, whether, we shall leave it to the Legislature to do it or do it ourselves. If that be so, I submit as far as we are satisfied it is right, that we should go on and do it ourselves, and where we have any doubt leave it over to the Legislature. Has any one any doubt but that actions of crim. con., or civil actions of assault and battery, or slander, and all such actions which take up so much time, the case should be sent to the county court, or rather that the person shall have the liberty, if he desires it, to bring his action in that court? He has liberty to go to the supreme court. And in answer to the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], I would suggest that the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] relieves all that, because, if one party brings an action in the county court which the other party thinks should go to the supreme court, under the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], if he can show any good reason it will go there, and in that way we will get justice. The mere freak that either party wishes to take it to the supreme court is no reason that it should go there; but if there be any good reason it will go there. It, therefore, seems to me that this amendment should be adopted. I hardly think there is a member of this Convention who does not believe that the administration of justice in this State would be expedited if this were allowed. If a person does not wish to go into the county court he need not go there. He can still go to the supreme court; and if he does wish to go there he can go there. There is another reason that has been stated, and that is that the county court will thereby acquire some respectability with regard to its position. Now, except as to criminal matters, it has no jurisdiction that would even make it respectable; and the result is, that, those men of the best ability, and who have an extensive practice, usually care not to be elected to a county court; but give it an increased jurisdiction, and you will be able to control the best ability there is in the county, and have a much better court. For those reasons, I shall favor the amendment.

Mr. SPENCER—The gentleman from Ontario [Mr. McDonald] has not correctly stated the condition of the legal business in the county of Steuben. I believe it is true, that there has not been a term of the court in that county for the last two or three years in which all of the business has not been disposed of which was ready to be disposed of. I cannot myself see any reason for selecting a certain class of cases for the purpose, in those cases, of conferring original jurisdiction upon the county courts. There is no more reason why the county court should have authority to try a case of assault and battery than a case arising out of a horse trade. Perhaps one may be just as important as the other. But I have a suggestion to make which may perhaps meet the views both of those who desire to retain the section, as it is retained by the committee, and those who desire to attain the object sought for by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen]. The largest portion of the calendars of the State, undoubtedly, are so situated that the supreme court can readily dispose of all the business which arises in those counties at the circuit. There are a few counties, like the county of Ontario, in which they cannot or do not at all times so readily dispose of the business. I propose, therefore, if this amendment shall be voted down, to offer an amendment by which it shall be in the power of the Legislature to confer upon any county court such original jurisdiction as may be desirable, leaving the authority in respect to other counties as it now is; so that, if it is desired in the county of Ontario to have a county court which shall dispose of the business which the supreme court is inadequate to do, the county of Yates, or some other small county which has not the same difficulty, may have all its business done in the supreme court.

Mr. CHESEBRO—May I be allowed to make a suggestion? I know I have already spoken once on this question.

The CHAIRMAN—If there is no objection the gentleman can proceed.

No objection was offered.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I desire simply to make one or two remarks upon the question. The objection I have to the suggestion of my friend from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] is this: I think it is eminently proper for us, in forming a court in the Constitution, that it shall be uniform throughout the State, whether it is a justice's court, a county court, a supreme court or a court of appeals; and the idea of leaving to the Legislature the power of conferring original jurisdiction upon the court of any one county is something which is novel, at all events, if not extraordinary; and I do not think we ought to confer that power upon the Legislature. Our duty is to organize a court; and suitors are not compelled to bring their actions in that court at all. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] as amended by my amendment and by the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] does not compel a suitor to bring an action in the county court at all. He may bring it in the supreme court; or, if it is brought in the county court by the plaintiff, under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] it may be removed, by such process as may be directed by the Legislature, into the supreme court. Therefore there will not necessarily be any lumbering up of the county court, and no compulsion upon the suitor to bring his action in that court. Suitors may bring their actions where they please. I see no necessity whatever for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer]. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] as amended will be adopted.

Mr. COOKE—Is an amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN—It is.

Mr. COOKE—I move to strike out the words "false imprisonment, breach of promise of marriage, seduction and criminal conversation." I had the honor some time before the adjournment, to submit a proposition for extending original jurisdiction to county courts in four actions: assault and battery, malicious prosecution, libel and slander. My object in doing that was this: I had no very great anticipations for the county courts, that we should be able to organize. I presume I have about the same appreciation of those courts as the gentlemen who have preceded me. We have some very fair, respectable courts, and in many counties we have very indifferent ones, and I think it would be entirely unwise to intrust them with a very enlarged jurisdiction. The four actions that I have named generally involved no difficult questions of law. The rules that govern an action of malicious prosecution are very simple, and the same is the case with libel and slander, and simple assault and battery. A justice of the peace, for that matter, might be safely intrusted with the jurisdiction to try that class of cases. The damages generally are not very exorbitant, no very great sum is involved. Before offering my resolution upon this subject, I had considered the other actions that are contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen]. It occurred to me that the action, for instance, of false imprisonment, sometimes involves very grave constitutional questions. I believe it is within the knowledge of every gentleman on this floor, that latterly, within a few years past, the action of false imprisonment has been used to obtain redress for some very serious alleged wrongs; and those actions involve, in many instances, constitutional questions. Now, in regard to actions for breach of promise, seduction and crim. con., those are cases that excite a good deal of feeling, a great deal of passion in localities, and involve reputation, involve the highest interests for which our citizens go to law. It does seem to me, sir, that those actions ought not to be given to county courts. It seems to be eminently proper that those cases should be required to be brought in the supreme court. In many cases a change of venue becomes necessary for the promotion of justice, to prevent a verdict as the result of passion and excitement. The amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], it is true, has to some extent relieved the proposition from that objection; and yet they generally involve a large amount in money; and if these actions are to be specified as proper matters to be submitted to a county court, I do not know where we can stop. I think there is a great deal of force in the remarks of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews], that this matter, after all, had better be left to the Legislature. There are many cases that we cannot anticipate now; new actions are given, as statutes are passed for the enforcement of individual rights, perfectly competent for the Legislature in their wisdom to submit to the jurisdiction of county courts. Those we cannot anticipate. I think it would be better, on the whole, to leave the subject in the hands of the Legislature. Let them confer such jurisdiction as in their wisdom they shall think best from time to time, and having reference to the experience and the fitness of the court. This is the same question that we have had before us from time to time, a question whether we shall petrify our policy in the Constitution, whether we shall take those causes and place them under constitutional protection, or whether we shall leave the Legislature to do with them what they shall think best from time to time, as their wisdom shall dictate.

Mr. BECKWITH—I am in favor of the provision as it stands reported by the majority of the committee. I think it wise to leave this matter to the Legislature; and I have no doubt, from past experience in this State, that the Legislature will confer additional original jurisdiction on the county courts. In regard to the county court in my county, we have had a good court as a general fact; a court as competent to try many of these matters as our supreme court judges. I think it unwise to introduce into the Constitution matters which are purely legislative. Provide for the establishment of a county court and then give to the Legislature power to confer original jurisdiction of many matters now triable in the supreme court. I would like, however, to have a provision introduced into the Constitution that parties may remove a cause in which the county court has original jurisdiction into the supreme court; and I would like to see that provision introduced into the Constitution in regard to the superior court and the court of common pleas of the city of New York. I have known of individuals, living in remote parts of the State, going to the city of New York and there being sued in the superior court when the cause of action originated and the witnesses mostly resided in a remote part of the State, and the venue could not be changed so as to have a trial where the cause of action arose and where the witnesses mainly resided. And I hope such a provision will yet be introduced in regard to those courts. The supreme court will have sufficient judicial force to discharge all the duties necessary to dispose of the litigation in this State. The fourth judicial district, in which I reside, extends from the southern boundaries of Schenectady to the Canada line. It extends from the eastern boundaries of the State to the St. Lawrence river—a territory larger than the State of Vermont. It has a population larger than the population of Vermont, and yet it has only four supreme court judges—a judicial force not equal to that of the State of Vermont. I doubt not that there is as much litigation and as much necessary law business done in that district as in the State of Vermont, and yet we have not the judicial force which that State has. I think myself that it would be well to leave to the Legislature authority to confer on the county courts original jurisdiction, and I have no doubt that the Legislature will exercise that authority judiciously. It will relieve to a very great extent the labors of the supreme court. Many actions now brought in the supreme court would be brought in that court, and if there is power to remove them from that court into the supreme court no injustice can be done. I trust, therefore, that the matter will rest as it is, and I think that gentlemen need have no fear that the Legislature will not provide for conferring original jurisdiction on the county courts, because we know they have attempted to do it in a great many instances since the adoption of the Constitution of 1846, and their action has been decided to be unconstitutional in many instances. I choose to leave it there because I think the Legislature will confer the proper power on the county courts, and I think there is no danger but what they will exercise it.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—My object in offering my amendment is to place it beyond a doubt that county courts shall have jurisdiction in the cases I have enumerated; and I have endeavored to give my reasons. I think it would be a great relief to the circuit courts, and aid the judges in the trial of more important causes, which are now delayed by the vast amount of business required to be done in this State and constantly accumulating before them. This would not be legislating, as my friend from Clinton [Mr. Beckwith], or some other gentleman, has remarked; it would not be legislating in the true sense and meaning of that term, to specify this class of cases over which the county courts should have jurisdiction. I do not propose to legislate in this amendment. I do not propose to detail in what manner these courts should be organized, or how their plans should be regulated, or any thing of that kind. I leave that to the Legislature, in my amendment. That is properly legislative duty and that would be trenching on their duties. What I propose in my amendment is simply to specify the class of cases in which the county courts should have jurisdiction. Is there any more legislation in that than in creating the circuit and supreme court and declaring that they shall have jurisdiction in civil actions? Not a particle. It is only changing from one tribunal to another and declaring that the inferior tribunal shall have jurisdiction in the particular class of cases which I have enumerated. My friend from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] has said that the supreme and circuit courts, as they would be constituted by this Convention, would be capable of doing all the business that would come before them. That was the argument made in the Convention of 1846, that the court as constituted then would be sufficient to do all the business. That experiment has been fully tried. It has been tried since that Constitution went into operation, and it has proved to be almost a total failure. I have already enumerated the time that has been spent in the circuits of my own county and my own district, in the trial of these petty causes, which might as well be tried in the county courts. I know there have been important cases that have gone over circuit after circuit, year after year in the county of Washington alone, and remained untried, because they had to give place to inferior actions, on account of superiority of age or place before them on the calendar. One word in regard to my friend from Ulster [Mr. Cooke]. His amendment provides that some of the classes of cases which I have enumerated shall be stricken from the list. He once proposed himself that four of these classes of cases should be conferred by the Constitution upon the county courts. I added the three others which are contained in my amendment. Now, the gentleman says that those are important actions. There is no doubt but they are. Breach of promise of marriage is generally considered an important action, and yet I have known such cases to be tried in a justice's court. They may as well be tried in a county court as a justice's court, and so with the other actions which the gentleman has enumerated. Therefore there is no impropriety in that, though there may sometimes be an aggravated case, calling upon the jury to award a large sum in damages. A jury is as capable of awarding a large sum in damages in a county court as in a circuit court, or a court of common pleas. With all due deference to my friend from Ulster [Mr. Cooke], I think the addition of these other classes of cases, which I enumerated, would be very proper, and the higher courts would be greatly relieved by the authority conferred upon the county courts. I do not want any delay in this matter. I do not want to leave it to the Legislature. The Legislature may not deem it expedient. The same argument may be used there which my friend from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] has made use of, and in which he has endeavored to show that the circuit courts were competent to do the business. The gentleman said if the judge could not finish the business in one week he might prolong his session into the second or third week until it was done. But my friend did not remember that oftentimes these justices are under the necessity of going elsewhere to hold circuits in other counties; and sometimes they are obliged to go to the general term. Their time is taken up in a variety of ways, and they have not time to prolong their sessions. The reason why Judge Rosekrans could not sit longer in our county than for the trial of three causes at the last circuit was that he was under the necessity of attending on the next Monday a general term in the county of St. Lawrence. They cannot get time enough to finish their calendars in the large counties. I know that to be the case. The causes remain untried, term after term, and I appeal to gentlemen from different parts of the State if this is not their experience in regard to the calendars being overloaded by actions of this kind. I trust, therefore, that the amendment which I have presented will prevail.

Mr. COMSTOCK—In offering the amendment which I proposed, qualifying somewhat the force of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen], I did not intend to be understood as being in favor of the amendment even with the qualification. I offered my proposition in order to make what had been proposed by another more endurable. I will say a word or two upon the general question. I have always considered it one of the greatest defects of the Constitution of 1846 that it took from the Legislature the power of conferring what is called original common law jurisdiction upon the county courts. I doubt whether that error was in the Constitution. I doubt whether it was not a mere judicial error in construing the Constitution. I know very well that the court of last resort in this State, at a somewhat early day, pronounced a decision declaring that the county courts could not take this original common law jurisdiction even under a grant by the legislative power. I never thought it was necessary to make that decision, but it was made, and it has never been overruled. Hence I think the necessity of some change in the Constitution. I am as sensible as any one can be of the importance of raising up the dignity and the functions of the county court. I think they may be very much elevated and improved by the addition of a jurisdiction which they do not now take, and which they cannot now take. It is true that there are jurisdictions conferred upon the justices of the peace, in a variety of cases, which the county courts, certainly far above them in intelligence, cannot take under the Constitution. I certainly agree, therefore, to the necessity of some improvement in the organic law in this respect. But, at the same time, I am conscious of the danger of undertaking to crystalize this jurisdiction by inflexible provisions of the organic law. And the best result to which my reflections upon this subject lead me is, that, it is safe, on the whole, to leave the Legislature to confer this jurisdiction under such wise limitations as it may think proper to impose. I shall therefore vote against the amendment, even in the form in which it now is, and to sustain the report of the committee.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Cooke, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. C. L. Allen.

Mr. CHESEBRO — In order to make the amendment that I have suggested intelligible, it seems to me that that part of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] which provides for jurisdiction beyond the class of cases that he names should be stricken out, because that is covered by the amendment which I propose. Of course there should be left the appellate jurisdiction, which is provided by his amendment. But the conferring of any original jurisdiction is all covered by the amendment proposed by myself.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I do not know but what it is.

Mr. CHESEBRO—The design of the whole thing as amended, is that the county courts shall have original jurisdiction in the classes of cases other than those mentioned by the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen].

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I hope the committee are not about to constitutionalize this matter by an enumeration of these cases to be heard in the county courts. I hope they will content themselves with conferring the power upon the Legislature, as proposed by the majority of the committee, as explained by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], who intended to give the Legislature, by the terms of the section they presented, the right of conferring original jurisdiction upon the county courts, a power which

by some very fine-spun decision, as I understand the gentleman from Onondaga to say, has been denied them, from a vague and improper construction of the existing Constitution. It may be that the language which the committee have adopted is not sufficiently explicit. If not, I would vote for any amendment which would convey the idea better: because a certainty in the original phraseology is better than a hundred constructions, however well intended or expressed such dicta of the courts may be. To my ears, the catalogue of crimes and cases that the proposed amendment embraces would sound much better in a treatise on medical jurisprudence. At least, many of the causes of action enumerated would seem more appropriate in a legislative statute, than in an organic law. I have been regretting that another and more important aspect of this matter was not presented by some gentleman upon this floor, which is, that, perhaps by giving more power and dignity, and stability to the county courts, we may conclude to revise what we have done in relation to our supreme court. We have adopted a supreme court of some thirty-two or more judges. Perhaps by giving sufficient power, and sufficient pay, either by the State or by a board of supervisors, or both, we may be able to draw into this county judicial office a higher class of men, even in the little county of Yates, because there must be men there competent for the situation, if we will give them sufficient inducement to accept the position. The same rule prevails here, undoubtedly, as in regard to coarser commodities than intellect and price, that if you create a demand and give the compensation, the supply will come. So, clearly, it is in the matter of integrity and intellect. If we will give the inducement, the men will not be wanting to fill these courts. I hope that aspect of the question will be taken into consideration by some of the professional gentlemen upon this floor. If we succeed in carrying out the express will and understood desire of the public at large, the electoral population of this State, to bring good law close home to them, are we going to take it over the county lines where they cannot reach it? We might possibly drop the supreme court to the extent in numbers we have known it, and constitute it as an appellate court, for this is really a supreme court under the name of a county court; and if we give these features to the county court, it may reduce largely the number of judges necessary for the supreme court. Perhaps ten or fifteen judges would be able to do all the appellate business that would be brought before them. Another query would arise, whether, with a court of that character, we might not be justified in dropping the court of appeals. Again, sir, we find that by the section here, which is also a section of the Constitution of 1846, the power is dropped of appointing any officer to do the surrogate business where there is a certain amount of population. It seems to me we should provide that these judicial officers in the smaller counties should attend to that duty; and, if we give that additional duty to this court, we may thereby reach a sufficient degree of inducement to give us a competent officer. This section is one of the most important sections in the whole article—although I am aware that has been declared of almost every section. I consider the Committee on the Judiciary as subject to some censure for not having introduced this in the first section of the article. In that respect they have been inartistic. We have been erecting the apex of a pyramid while the substratum has been entirely overlooked. This section provides for the duty of at least five thousand judicial officers of this State; and we have been spending days and weeks upon the subject of courts not employing over fifty officers. Admitting that the most important causes will be tried in the higher courts, such as great questions of constitutional law, involving as well deep principles of equity, we are not to be carried away by the idea that they are the only causes in which justice is to be done. We ought to pay attention to the interests of the masses of the people. It is of more consequence to the people at large to be able to get justice in the county courts than to have a good supreme court judge. There are occasional exceptions, but they only prove the general rule. Where they have good magistrates better order will be kept, and there will be a better state of morality; there will be less litigation and more respect paid to the laws. I have also expected during this discussion that another subject would be considered, allied to the one which is brought before us by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale]. Although the report of the judiciary committee has been before us, as the sentiment of an imposing majority of this committee, their report was the result of compromise. I think all agree upon this. We want a uniformity of decisions in the courts; and the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] has stated that, according to his reading of the debates of 1846, it was the intention of the framers of our present Constitution that it should be required by a law that the judges should intermingle, so to speak. A judge in New York should be familiar with the jurisprudence of Ontario, Oswego, or Kings. By intercommunication, whatever the defects of the old system, there is necessarily a degree of uniformity produced, and some coincidence of ideas; so that there would not be that danger from the conflict of the opinions in eight supreme courts, which we have heard stated. Another point is, and lest it should be overlooked, I consider it my duty to state, that the court of errors, under the old Constitution, partook largely of the lay element. That court was referred to continually, and without contradiction, in the last Convention, as one whose decisions were world-wide known, wherever the English language was spoken. And when the proposition was made that the judges of the supreme court should be confined to those having the degree of counselors at law, the bar upon that floor almost universally said that that would prevent the lay element from entering the court of appeals, that being in an analogy with the court of errors, whose decisions had been so much lauded. But I believe I am not wrong in saying that no layman has been even mentioned as judge at large of the court of appeals, and I do not suppose a man not technically informed could enter advantageously the supreme court at circuit. But the desire of the Convention, as shown in the debate, was that, among the four judges to be selected by the people at large, there should be some Stephen Allen, or Myndert Van Schaick, who, from his position in the Senate, was a member of that court, and whose knowledge of mercantile and business matters in detail, if not of legal questions, gave him a degree of eminence which the bar held in respect. This principle has been lost sight of entirely. It is a query whether it would not be well for us to retrace our steps in this regard. The amendment of the Constitution in 1846 was intended, in the reconstruction of the judicial article, to still provide for and retain this, but the provisions, in that respect, were never carried out, or apparently regarded, in the conventions that controlled our judicial nominations. Had it been so, and the presence of a representative of the lay element thus secured in the organization of our court of appeals, the business curtness of such minds, as I have mentioned, would have rested impatiently under the distressingly prolonged opinions that now lumber up the one hundred and fifty volumes which the libraries of such of the profession whose means permit contain, on their dusty, undisturbed shelves.

Mr. GRAVES—If I rightly understand this amendment, it is to give to the county courts the power to judge of some of the most important cases that are now tried in the circuit court. I am in favor of increasing the jurisdiction of the county courts, but I am not prepared, at this time, to vote in favor of this amendment for this reason: that the county court is to be organized anew under the Constitution which is to be made here, if it shall be adopted; and it is difficult for any of us now to forsee what that organization may be; whether it shall be an able court, whether the people shall take it upon themselves to select efficient men as county judges, or whether they shall regard it, as they now regard it, as of but little moment, and fail, therefore, to select the ablest and best men to fill those places. If, after this Constitution shall be adopted and after these judges shall be elected to fill those several places, the Legislature should then be satisfied that the people felt an interest in these courts, so much so that they selected able men whom they were disposed to clothe with power, it will then be time enough for the Legislature to confer upon them such jurisdiction as, in their judgment, the interests of the people demand. And they must certainly be able men to be competent and qualified to sit in judgment in the cases mentioned in the amendment. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment, because I believe the eighteenth section clothes the Legislature with power sufficient to give all the additional jurisdiction which the exigency of the case may demand.

The question was put on the adoption of the first branch of the amendment of Mr. C. L. Allen, relative to the jurisdiction of the county court, and it was declared lost.

The question was then announced on the second branch of the amendment offered by Mr. C. L. Allen, relative to surrogates.

Mr. SPENCER—I would inquire if the amendment does not already provide for their continuing in office?

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair is of the opinion that it does not.

Mr. SPENCER—I think section 31 provides for the county judges.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I do not know but what the latter part of the amendment does. I merely wish to say in regard to the surrogate, that the report of the committee provides that the court shall accommodate a population of forty thousand. Where the population exceeds forty thousand the Legislature may pass a law creating the office of surrogate, though the article provides in the eighteenth section that the county judge shall perform the duties of surrogate. My idea is that in places where the population exceeds forty thousand the Legislature shall provide for the appointment of a surrogate. The county judge cannot always, and especially in a case of that kind, perform the duties of surrogate and those of county judge. I do not know why this office should be a separate and distinct one. Even now the Legislature is providing for extending the power and jurisdiction of the county courts. Then, in that event, the county judge will have nothing to do but perform the duties imposed upon him by the Legislature. This, I am told by my friends, they will do. If the Legislature will do it then the office of surrogate ought to be an independent office and the duties performed by a separate incumbent. Now, sir, a change in that provision is not called for by the people of this State, so far as I am aware. The surrogates' courts have jurisdiction over some very important matters, and their powers and duties are well understood by the people, and the people do not desire a change. Moreover, we know that most of the incumbents of that office were elected at the last election for the period of four years, and many competent and most deserving men were then re-elected, while some new men have been elected who are also entirely competent to do the duty, and I think it is but just that these incumbents should be continued in office. I will not dwell longer upon this matter at the present time. I have only felt it my duty to express my views, and to give the reasons why I have proposed this amendment in connection with the other.

Mr. C. E. PARKER—I ask to have that proposition divided, so that we may vote upon the first amendment separately.

The CHAIRMAN—That division will be made.

The question was put on the first part of the amendment to substitute the word "shall" for the word "may" in the sixteenth line, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HALE—If the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] will allow me to make a suggestion, I would ask him whether the object of this amendment could not be better attained when we reach section 31, by inserting the word "surrogate" there? It would make the matter a little more symmetrical, and it would be more germane to that section than to this.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen], to withdraw the remainder of the amendment.

Digitized by Google

The question was put on the second part of the amendment, to add after the word "judge" in nineteenth line, the words "and all surrogates in office when this Constitution shall take effect shall hold their respective offices until the expiration of the term for which they were respectively elected."

Mr. FULLER—I offer the following amendment: Strike out the word "it" in line seven, after the word "one or more counties;" so that the section will read: "The county court, in each county, shall be continued with such appellate jurisdiction as shall hereafter be conferred upon it, in any one or more counties."

The object of this amendment, as I stated before, is to give the Legislature power to discriminate in respect to bestowing this jurisdiction, so that in case the supreme court in any county should be burdened with more business than can be expeditiously disposed of, the Legislature may confer upon the county court of that county original jurisdiction in such a class of cases as may tend to relieve the circuit court of the burden upon it.

Mr. FULLER—I would suggest to the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], that the words "one or more counties" would connect themselves with the word "continued."

Mr. SPENCER—I propose that the amendment shall modify the expression which follows it, rather than that which precedes it.

Mr. KETCHAM—I offer the following amendment:

"Strike out all after the word 'judge,' in line seven, to the word 'may,' in line eight. Strike out all after the word 'office,' in line thirteen, to and including the word 'treasury,' in line fifteen."

This amendment does away with the office of justice of the sessions simply. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen] has pretty well illustrated the perfect uselessness of that office. I never knew an instance where those officers were consulted and influenced the decision of the court where they were not wrong. They are mere "figure-heads," and answer no purpose but to sit up there and look wise and draw their pay. [Laughter.] I have chosen to separate these propositions, and this proposition is simply to do away with the justices of the sessions as a useless appendage to the court.

Mr. BERGEN—I hope that amendment will not prevail. The court as organized at present, and as proposed to be organized, is composed chiefly of men who are members of the legal profession, and I am not at all surprised to find gentlemen of that profession anxious to have the court so organized as to give laymen no voice on any subject whatever. They desire to monopolize the whole business. [Laughter.] Now, sir, in my judgment, laymen are necessary upon the bench in criminal courts. At all events, in my life, although not a legal one, I have known instances where the first judge or presiding magistrate of a court was prejudiced, in consequence of which an unjust sentence would have been pronounced upon persons convicted of crime had it not been for the intervention of the laymen, checking the action of the judge in that matter. Cases of that kind do arise, not often but occasionally, and I believe that these assistant justices are necessary in such cases. I recollect one instance in the city of Brooklyn, some years ago, where some persons were tried and convicted of having committed some trivial offense, and the judge being prejudiced, would have sentenced them not only to a fine but to a long imprisonment, had it not been for a layman who sat on the bench beside him. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that for the prevention of injustice of this kind this provision will be retained. It is a time-honored one, and some years ago, instead of having two laymen on the bench, we used to have half a dozen. The provision as it now stands, being a salutary one, I hope it will be preserved.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I hope that this amendment will prevail, for, as I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. Ketcham], it is simply to strike out the provision for associate justices, as contained in the fifth section. Now, sir, so far as the objection that has been raised to this amendment is concerned, the gentleman will remember that the county judge sits with the justices of the supreme court as a constituent member of that court, so that there are two lawyers upon the oyer and terminer bench at all events, and if any difficulty of the kind suggested by the gentleman should arise, it would be settled by two gentleman of that class in whom he has so little confidence that he thinks they are not competent to pronounce a just sentence after the verdict has been given. But I insist that these two associate justices are mere useless appendages of this court, and that they may sometimes exercise a power which is prejudicial to the proper administration of justice; they may overrule the county judge on a question of law which may be of vital importance in the case. Now, if any body in this Convention can point out in what possible way these justices of the peace can be of any use to the county judge in the trial of a case, I would like to have him do so; but I believe they are useless, and that they ought to be abolished.

Mr. BICKFORD—I also hope that this amendment will prevail. I insist that the justices of the sessions are not simply useless, but that they are a positive nuisance. [Laughter.] In many cases they have been known to overrule the county judge, and in some cases even to overrule the circuit judge. Two, comparatively, ignorant justices of the peace from some backwoods town (and they generally select some inferior man for justices of the sessions because they want to pay those who have done the work—perhaps the dirty work of the party) will sometimes overrule the judge of the supreme court who is holding the circuit. I am informed of a recent case in the county of Jefferson, where a circuit judge was overruled by two justices of the sessions. On the question whether a trial should be put over, they determined that it should be put over, and because that was done, the criminal, as I understand, finally escaped justice. I repeat that these officers are no merely useless, but that they are a positive nuisance, and that they ought to be done away with. I remember an anecdote which will illustrate the only use of these associate justices. It was said that a circuit judge once requested an associate justice sitting beside him to scratch his back, and after he had done it the judge remarked, "Now I see what a side judge is good for, I never knew before." [Laughter.] And that is about all the side judges are good for.

Mr. WAKEMAN—I cannot concur with the gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject. It seems to me that these justices of the sessions or some other officers like them should be provided for in the Constitution. Take for instance a circuit judge who goes to a county where he is not acquainted with the local affairs, these side judges can render a great deal of assistance to him in a case to determine what punishment shall be given, by giving him information in reference to the character of the criminal and the general circumstances of the case. And there is another consideration: a circuit judge who has long been in the habit of trying criminals has not all the heart he had when he commenced, and I think that sometimes the side justices do good by softening down the sentence, and infusing more of mercy into it than there would be if it were left entirely to a single judge. Again, in our courts of oyer and terminer you could not very well provide for two judges, because there would not be any balance of power. The county judge, as said by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro], might sit in the court of oyer and terminer, and there would be two lawyers on the bench, but it would be necessary to provide for three, as to have a balance of power.

Mr. KETCHAM—Is not the court of oyer and terminer now composed of an equal number of judges—the circuit judge, the county judge, and associate justices—four in all?

Mr. WAKEMAN—Courts of oyer and terminer may be held so, but in point of fact they are not. In almost all the counties of this State the county judge is the acting surrogate of the county, and, except specially requested to do so, he does not generally sit in the court of oyer and terminer at all; and if you continue the provision that the county judge shall act as surrogate in any county where the population does not exceed forty thousand, he will have enough to do without sitting in the court of oyer and terminer. Then, again, there are many proceedings of a quasi-criminal character before the courts where it is necessary to have some additional judicial force beside the county judge. I do not see why this system has not worked well for the last twenty years. You have substituted these two judges in place of the four judges of the old court of common pleas who used to preside prior to 1846. You propose now to allow a single judge to try a cause—and in regard to that, I mean to say, where the presiding judge makes the rulings, they are generally acquiesced in by the whole court; but in matters of punishment and questions like these, whether a man should be tried or not, questions in regard to which the justices know more of the circumstances than the judge can, I think they are very valuable officers. Then, there comes before the sessions many cases in reference to such matters as compelling parents to maintain their children, or children their parents, cases of bastardy, etc.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I would like to ask the gentleman from Genesee [Mr. Wakeman] whether the whole court are not bound to pass upon those questions?

Mr. WAKEMAN—Undoubtedly they are. But I say that such cases are generally governed by the opinions of the local justices, and I venture to say that in nearly every case where they have overruled the county judge, they have been right. I never knew them to do it where it did not turn out that they were right and the county judge was wrong. I do not mean on mere questions of law, but on questions of plain common sense. I am not at all prepared to say, sir, that a county judge should be permitted to pass alone upon cases involving men's liberties and rights, particularly when the judge has been a good while on the bench, because then, as I have said, he is not apt to be so merciful as I think he should be.

Mr. HAND—I am in favor of this amendment. It has sometimes been a matter of amusement to me, as I have sat in court, to see these fellows sitting there and doing nothing. [Laughter.] If the system has worked well, it is because they have done nothing. [Laughter.] I have never known them to do any thing in our county. The county judge has gone on and performed his duty, and they have acquiesced, and therefore the system has worked harmoniously. [Laughter.] It works harmoniously while they continue to do nothing. But when they take it into their heads to overrule the county judge the effect, I think, must be disastrous. If such men undertake, by their mere numbers, to overrule the rulings of men of legal minds and legal capacity who have been placed in the judicial office because they have such capacities, the effect, I say, must be very bad.

Mr. GRAVES—I hope that this motion to strike out will not prevail. I regret very much to hear statements made here that the magistrates who have been associated with the county judges are mere ciphers in that court. Most of us know, of course, that the duties of magistrates who are associated with a county judge are criminal, or quasi-criminal. Their duties pertain to nothing else which is connected with the county courts. Now, sir, my experience is very different from the experience of gentlemen who have suggested their opinions to this committee. I have always found, in the administration of criminal law, a very great assistance from magistrates who have been associated with me in the discharge of my judicial duties. If the position taken here by gentlemen is a correct one, then why not devolve upon the county judge the entire trial of a cause? Why associate with him in the court a jury? It is because you want the judgments of other men. The jurors have the common sense by which to determine the innocence or guilt of the person charged; and when that is determined by the verdict of the jury, then there is another very important duty to perform—to ascertain the amount of punishment that shall be inflicted upon the offender. Now, it is true that legal and technical questions do necessarily sometimes arise to be passed upon by these justices, but they are men of good, practical common sense; they know that the liberties and rights of a fellow-being are at stake; they have heard the evidence; they know the extent of the crime that has been committed, and they can judge with some degree of propriety what should be the nature and extent of the punishment inflicted upon him. Sir, although I have a very high respect for judges who sit in judgment upon the liberties and rights of persons charged before them, I have a still higher respect for the sober, sound sense of the magistrates that are associated with them. And, sir, I believe there is very great danger in many cases in permitting a judge to sit alone and pass upon cases involving different degrees of crime, and therefore necessarily involving different degrees of punishment. In such cases the punishment is to be meted out, after consultation with these justices, by the application of the rules of common sense and the laws of humanity; and these men, governed by no technical rule, but exercising their good sense, come to the assistance and relief of the county judge in the discharge of his duties in a very large number of cases where he needs such assistance. I sincerely hope that this provision in the section will not be stricken out.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I am not myself very anxious whether this amendment shall prevail or not, but I shall vote for it. I say I am not anxious, because I think really it is of very little use in the administration of the criminal side of our courts. There is only one view, in my judgment, that can be taken of this matter, and that has been indicated by the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves], who has just taken his seat. The use of this addition to the court is, in my judgment, very limited. This is my experience, and I think it is the experience of every lawyer here and of every layman who has ever attended the court of oyer and terminer. The use of these side judges is to tell the county judge, or more especially the circuit judge, who is the best fellow to be foreman of the grand jury. [Laughter.] After the side judges have performed this arduous duty, the trial proceeds. There sit the jury who are to determine the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. The prisoner is convicted, and then, I do agree with those gentlemen who desire to retain this provision, that sometimes it is useful for the judge, and especially for the circuit judge, to consult with these two men in respect to the measure of punishment to be meted out. Now, then, the only question we have to decide here is, is it necessary to have this appendage to that court for that purpose alone? I think not. I say that the district attorney himself, aside from the consideration that I will speak of in a moment, never has that blood in his heart that will lead him to refuse the ordinary and usual plea for mercy, if warranted by the circumstances of the case. That is natural; that is human nature. But aside from that, the counsel and if need be, these two local justices, although they are not upon the bench, may be appealed to to enlighten the court in regard to the circumstances of the case and the character of the criminal. When the court comes to pronounce sentence, the prisoner is called, and then any palliating considerations can be addressed to that tribunal by the persons I have indicated; and I do not think it necessary, for this reason alone, to append to the court two associate justices, who, judging from my experience, never take any part in the trial of causes. Hence I shall vote for the motion to strike out this provision.

Mr. FLAGLER—I am in favor of this amendment for the reason that if it be adopted it will dispense with ninety-nine judicial officers in each county of the State! This court, as now constituted, is a very formidable affair. It is made up of one unit and two ciphers on the right; and this, by all rules of computation, makes just a hundred judges. [Laughter.] Now, obviously, where we can make so large a saving, and so great a cutting down of office holders, we should not forego the opportunity. The popular, and, I believe, the correct idea is that these so called side judges are entirely useless. They may sometimes overrule the opinion of a competent judge, and where they do, it is to the public detriment. I hope to see the good sense of this Convention brought to bear on the adoption of the amendment now pending.

Mr. HALE—I rise to express my astonishment that the gentleman from Broome [Mr. Hand], who, only two or three days ago, took occasion to publicly thank God that he was not a lawyer, should be now in favor of taking away the lay element which now enters into the composition of the court of oyer and terminer, in this State. I supposed from the very contemptuous opinion which he expressed of the lawyers of this body, and of the profession generally, that he would be violently opposed to any proposition which looked to leaving the entire control of the administration of criminal justice of this State to members of that profession. A friend on my left suggests that the gentleman from Broome may consider that the county judges are not lawyers enough to hurt [laughter], but I do not think that is the idea of the gentleman, because it is well known that some of the best lawyers in the State—if it is proper to use the adjective best in relation to any member of the profession—occupy the position of county judges. Now, I do not think it would be policy for us to decide to abolish the office of justice of the sessions. I do not, myself, think that, in most cases, those members of the court are the most useful in the world; but, as has been mentioned by the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves], who has had experience as a county judge, and as has been mentioned by other gentlemen on this floor, there are cases in which the advice of those justices is of some value. I think we have all seen that, in this matter of sentencing prisoners, and in various matters which come before the courts which are not strictly questions of law, the advice of these members of the court who are generally considered the ornamental portion, [laughter], is really of some value. And it is not a very expensive luxury for this State to indulge in. I do not think that any county feels very much oppressed by the amount paid to these judicial officers, and therefore for this and the other reasons I have stated, I am inclined to think that it will be unwise for us to say that there shall be no lay members of our criminal courts henceforth.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I hope the amendment will be voted down, and the section as it is presented by the Judiciary Committee will be retained. If there were no other reasons, I think the one given by my friend from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] in the beginning of his remarks, would be sufficient to justify the retention of these officers. I understood him to say that the court always consulted these side judges in determining who should be the foreman of the grand jury. Now, sir, the little experience I have had upon grand juries, has taught me that this is a very important matter, and that upon the solution of the question, whether you are to have a business man as foreman of the grand jury, or a nonentity, depends in great measure the efficiency of the whole body. I think, sir, that this item mentioned by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] is by no means a trifling one. Now, these justices, as a rule, represent the highest average of ability among justices of the peace in any county, and gentlemen should remember that any remarks which they make in regard to these justices, or any imputations they cast upon their character, must disseminate themselves upon the whole mass of five thousand justices of the peace in the State and that these justices are pretty active politicians, pretty active at the polls, pretty influential even in the making of judicial nominations [laughter], although I think that is a matter that could be better managed by the bar. Again, these side justices are associated with the county judges as excise commissioners. We all know that the duties of that office are very important, and that the way in which they are exercised, and the manner in which the commissioners choose to grant licenses, and to whom they grant them, has much to do with the morality of the county. I think also, sir, that there is something in what the gentleman from Genesee [Mr. Wakeman] says in regard to those side judges having a tendency to moderate the rigidity and severity of the circuit judge. I think, on the whole, that we had better retain this provision as reported by the Judiciary Committee, and I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Ketcham and it was declared lost.

Mr. WALES—I move to amend by striking out the word "seven" in the third line, and inserting "four."

Mr. COOKE—I rise to inquire of this committee whether it is necessary to enlarge the tenure of office of county judges. Is there any thing in their qualifications, or in their positions, that should require their term of office to be extended to seven years. My own judgment is that four years is sufficient. I do not expect to get the very best men for this position. I believe that the idea has been already put forward to-night, that it is hardly expected that we shall get the first talent for our county judges, as a general thing; and it seems to me a matter of very questionable policy, to extend this term of office. I myself am opposed to it.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Wales, and it was declared carried.

Mr. KETCHAM—I move to substitute the word "law" for the words "board of supervisors" in the second line. I wish to make only a single suggestion in regard to this subject. I believe that by the Constitution of 1846 the compensation of the county judges was left to be provided for by law. If I am not mistaken the Legislature provided that the board of supervisors of the several counties should fix the salaries of the judges, and I really hope that we shall not go to tying that up any more strongly than it was tied up then. I may illustrate my reason for offering this amendment by mentioning one instance. I know a county of this State with over 50,000 inhabitants, where the salary of the county judge, who is one of the best lawyers in the county and as good as any in that part of the State, came near being fixed at first by the board of supervisors at three hundred dollars. This was done partly because they did not appreciate the labor attending the discharge of the duties of the office, and partly because they happened to differ with the judge in politics. The judge and the board of supervisors differed politically, and that consideration, as was very evident, entered into the action of the supervisors in this matter. Now there is that tendency on the part of these boards to fix the salary low where the judge is opposed to them in politics, and in the case that I speak of, if it had not been for the earnest efforts of the members of the bar, the salary would have been left at a sum, in a county of 50,000 inhabitants, so wholly inadequate as to preclude the possibility of any respectable lawyer holding the office and maintain any show of dignity. I think that the Legislature should be allowed to fix the salary, or at least left to say whether the board of supervisors should do it.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I would inquire whether this amendment takes the power away from the board of supervisors?

Mr. KETCHAM—No, sir; it would not.

Mr. COMSTOCK—In my opinion this power should be taken away from the board of supervisors altogether. Certainly it is a power which should reside either in the Legislature or in the board of supervisors, and should be exercised by one of these bodies to the exclusion of the other. I think the salaries of county judges should be fixed by the Legislature, to be paid, however, by the counties. I do not mean by that, Mr. Chairman, that the Legislature should establish a uniform salary for all county judges in the State, but that they should establish the salaries of the judges by law, the amounts to be graduated and regulated according to the population of the different counties. My idea is that a general law should be passed, declaring what the salaries of the county judges should be, graduating them according to the population of the different counties. With that view I offer this amendment to the amendment: "The salaries of county judges shall be established by the Legislature to be paid by the several counties."

Mr. KETCHAM—I accept that amendment.

Mr. GRAVES—I hope this amendment will not prevail. We have a statute requiring the board of supervisors to look over the accounts of the county judge and surrogate, and a statute requiring him to submit his accounts to them annually to determine the amount of business that he does. They, therefore, can determine better than any other body can what amount of labor the judge has had to bestow upon his office. They are familiar with all the duties that he has to perform both as surrogate and county judge, and there is no other body of men so well qualified to judge of the value of his services as the board of supervisors, because he annually renders them under oath an account of all that he has done. It seems to me quite improper that the power should be taken from the supervisors and vested elsewhere, because they are best qualified to judge.

Digitized by Google

Mr. KETCHAM—I was mistaken in saying that my amendment leaves the matter as it was left under the Constitution of 1846. It stands now as it stood under the Constitution of 1846.

Mr. BERGEN—I hope, sir, that this power will not be taken away from the board of supervisors. As has been stated, they are the best judges in their own localities of what the services of these officers are worth. If you take away this power from the supervisors and give it to the Legislature, the effect will be to send a lobby from the county to the Legislature to operate, and have the salary fixed at the rate they desire. The salary of the county judge is a county charge, not a State charge. The supreme court is a State charge, and therefore the salary of its judges should be fixed by the Legislature; but the board of supervisors represent the county and are responsible to the people of the county who have to pay the salaries; and certainly they are the best judges of what the amount of the salary of the county judge should be. Those who have to pay the bills are better judges in the matter than those who are not at all interested. There is a provision here that the salary shall not be reduced during the term of service, so that although the board of supervisors may refuse to increase the salary of the judge, they have no power to reduce it.

Mr. KETCHAM—May they not, after the election, and before the county judge enters upon the duties of his office, fix the salary at a lower sum than it has been fixed at before?

Mr. BERGEN—As I understand it they cannot do that.

Mr. KETCHAM—There is nothing here to prevent their doing it.

Mr. BERGEN—Then if there is not, an amendment of that kind would be very proper; but I hold that the parties who have to pay the salary should have the right, through their direct representatives, to fix the amount, and not have it so that, if there should be a difference of opinion between the people of the county in regard to the judge's salary, and the incumbent's opinion of what it should be, both parties should run up to Albany and "lobby" here, to have it fixed according to their views. I do not think there is a county in this State in which justice will not be done to the county judge by the supervisors.

Mr. COMSTOCK—If there be no objection I would like to say a word or two in commendation of my proposition

The CHAIRMAN—There being no objection, the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] will proceed.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I would like to ask whether there is any good reason to be given why the salaries of the different county judges, residing in counties of the same population and business, should not be uniform. Now, they are entirely unequal in different parts of the State; and in contiguous counties, where the functions of the county judges are equally important, entirely different rates of compensation are established by these local boards. No good reason can be given for that.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Under the Constitution as it now exists, and as I understand the scheme to be now, there are populations where there are two officers performing the duties of county judge and surrogate. How would my friends in such cases regulate this matter by the population?

Mr. COMSTOCK—An act of the Legislature probably would make a discrimination in such a case as that stated by my friend from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh]. What I insist upon and all that I insist upon is that, the Legislature should regulate the whole subject by laws operating uniformly in all parts of the State. Now, notwithstanding what has been said in regard to the wisdom of the supervisors, I am safe, in my own estimation, in saying that they do not possess but a very small part of the wisdom of mankind, nor any great share of magnanimity. They may be exceedingly competent to determine this matter of the salary of the county judge, but, after all, they are, in a sense, the worst tribunal or authority to which you can leave a subject of this kind. My object is to raise the character of these local courts. We are about to give them a jurisdiction which they have never possessed before. They are to discharge more important functions under this Constitution, if it be adopted, than they have ever been called upon to discharge. They may be made very important tribunals in the jurisprudence of this State, and, I think, the compensation of the judges should be regulated by law. The Legislature certainly cannot be deemed an inappropriate authority to make a law for all the counties of the State which shall operate equally and alike in every section of the State. I am satisfied that the proposition, if adopted, will do very much for the character of these courts and it is therefore that I make it.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], and the only reason that I cast my vote that way is on account of a difficulty suggested by another gentleman who has spoken upon this subject. The county judge and indeed the surrogate is elected under our law before the salary is fixed; and it is left in the power of this board of supervisors to absolutely legislate the county judge out of office, by giving him a salary of five dollars a year, should he happen to be of the opposite party and should the board see fit to do it. I shall vote to leave the power with the Legislature, trusting that they will devise some means by which the matter can be regulated, notwithstanding the objections that have been suggested.

Mr. BERGEN—The gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] states that it would be left within the power of the board of supervisors to legislate the judge out of office because of his politics. I would answer that by saying that, if the matter is left with the Legislature they will have the same power, if they choose to act in the same partisan spirit.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—The Legislature would not be apt to trouble themselves about the judge of each county.

Mr. GRAVES—I wish to make a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair must remind gentlemen of the rule, that one speech from one gentleman upon the same question is all that is in order, but if there be no objection the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] may proceed.

Mr. GRAVES—I desire simply to say that the compensation fixed for the county judge is always fixed by the board of supervisors before he enters upon the duties of his office; therefore if he is not satisfied with the sum provided by the supervisors he is at liberty to decline to accept the position; but I have never known an instance when a man declined to take the amount fixed by the supervisors as the salary of the office.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Ketcham, as amended by Mr. Comstock, and it was declared lost.

Mr. KETCHAM—I now move to insert after the word "supervisors" the words "before his election," so that the salary may be fixed before the officer is elected.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Ketcham, and it was declared lost.

Mr. SMITH—I move that the committee do now rise and report progress.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Smith, and it was declared lost.

Mr. GRAVES—I desire to insert the words "or increased," after the word diminish, in the twelfth line, so that it will read, "The county judge shall receive an annual salary, to be fixed by the supervisors, which shall not be diminished or increased during his term of office." The reasons which were assigned for preventing the increase of the salaries of the supreme court judges, it seems to me do not apply in the case of county judges. They are local officers. They do all their official business within the county, and at one particular place, and, therefore, there is no necessary variation in their expenditures, and there is not that necessity for leaving the amount of their salaries an open question, that there is in the case of the supreme court judges. If there should be such a radical change in the prices of the commodities of life for a local judge, as to justify the board of supervisors in increasing his salary, as it would be a local matter, and within the personal knowledge of the members of that board. I submit that there would be no difficulty in getting the increase; and I submit that they should also have the power to diminish as well as to increase the judge's salary. If this word "diminish" is to be continued in the section, I desire that these words, "or increased," shall also be put in; but if the word diminish be stricken out, I have no objection to leaving out these words also

Mr. HARDENBURGH—It was upon this particular portion of the section that I relied to relieve me from difficulties that have been suggested, and that were sought to be got rid of by the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. Ketcham], and by my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock]. Now, there is the difficulty that has been suggested by myself and by another gentleman, namely, that these salaries are to be fixed for the first of January. The term of office of the county judge, has now been fixed at four years. That is a term short enough, so that the fluctuation in the cost of commodities of life cannot very much affect him, and I desire a provision made to guard against the evil of which I have already spoken, that, if the judge happen to be obnoxious to the political party to which the majority of the supervisors belong, they can fix his salary so low as to absolutely compel him to resign. Therefore it is, I think, that the wisdom of this committee is displayed in saying it was not to be diminished during his term, being only four years. The whole may resolve itself into this: that I will give you a little more salary rather than have you resign. For that reason I trust that this committee will retain the provision precisely as it is.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Graves, and it was declared lost.

Mr. KETCHAM—I move to strike out in the twentieth line, the words "in cities," and in the twenty-third line the words "such cities," so that it will leave the Legislature to provide inferior local courts for other places than cities simply. There are large villages that may not have as much as some of the smaller cities.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—Is an amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN—It is, if it is germane to this amendment.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move to strike out all after the words "in cities," in the twentieth line to the close of the section. As I understand that section, if the city of Albany applies for a local court, the Legislature can organize it as they desire, and with one judge. The next year the city of Rochester may apply for a court and get three judges, or, it may be, in some other particular, different from the court at Albany. It seems to me that the second court should be like the first, and so should the others.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. E. A. Brown, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 30 to 30.

A DELEGATE—There is no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN—Gentlemen will please vote.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I move that the committee do now rise and report progress.

The CHAIRMAN—The motion is not in order.

The question was again put on the amendment of Mr. E. A. Brown, and, on a division, it was declared carried by a vote of 44 to 36.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr Ketcham as amended.

Mr. COOKE—I move to strike out the words "in cities" after the word "Legislature," in the first line.

Digitized by Google

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Cooke, and it was declared carried.

Mr. BAKER—If it is in order, I would like to propose the following amendment.

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

Strike out all after the word "continued" in line 5, down to and including the word "Legislature" in the seventh line, and insert as follows: "And shall have original jurisdiction in all civil actions in which the amount claimed by either party in their pleadings shall not exceed the sum of one thousand dollars, and such jurisdiction in special proceedings and such appellate jurisdiction as the Legislature shall prescribe.

Mr. BAKER—It will be seen that the amendment includes the proposition substantially, although somewhat enlarged, of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen]. The object is to fix in the Constitution the jurisdiction of the county court, and to extend the jurisdiction which may be exercised by that court. I am distrustful of leaving the matter to the Legislature to prescribe the jurisdiction. I think it is better that the Convention should fix it in the Constitution, so that, in future, the jurisdiction of the county court will not be in a constant state of fluctuation and change, which it will be, if the matter is left to the Legislature. It seems to me better to have stability and certainty. For that reason I submit this amendment, and if it does not get the support of this committee, I shall move it in Convention, and ask the ayes and noes upon it.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I would like to ask the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. Baker] how he fixes any thing by his amendment. The lawyer will put just exactly that amount in his pleadings. There is nothing accomplished, I insist upon it, by the proposition.

Mr. COOKE—I move that the committee do now rise and report progress.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Cooke, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 39 to 41.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Baker, and it was declared lost.

Mr. BERGEN—I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Bergen, and it was declared lost.

There being no further amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read the nineteenth section, as follows:

SEC. 19. The county judge of any county may preside at courts of sessions or hold county courts in any other county (except the city and county of New York, and the county of Kings), when requested thereto by the county judge of said other county.

Mr. WILLIAMS—I move that the committee do now rise and report progress.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Williams, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 38 to 42.

There being no amendments offered to the section, the SECRETARY read the twentieth section as follows:

SEC. 20. The Legislature may, on application of the board of supervisors provide for the election of local officers, not to exceed two in any county, to discharge the duties of county judge and of surrogate in cases of their inability or of a vacancy, and to exercise such other powers in special cases as may be provided by law.

Mr. SILVESTER—I move that the committee do now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Silvester, and it was declared lost.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I should like to inquire of some member of the Judiciary Committee, how extensive may be the application of the word "inability?"

Mr. FOLGER—The section has been transcribed precisely as it exists in the Constitution of 1846. [Laughter.] The word has received no additional construction.

Mr. BICKFORD—I rise to a point of order. There is no question before the committee.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—The question is on the adoption of the section. The gentleman [Mr. Bickford] is entirely out of order. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN—The Chair holds that the point of order is well taken, there being no amendment proposed to the section.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—The question is on the adoption of the section.

The CHAIRMAN—That is not the question.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Then I move to strike out the section. I hope this word "inability" may be considered by the committee as going far enough to contemplate a deficiency on the part of the judge of the county, that owing to the pressure of business he may be unable to discharge his duty, and another judge will have to be assigned. That interpretation is a fair one. If the chairman of the committee thinks the section will admit of such construction I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I renew the motion to strike out the twentieth section. By the eighteenth section, as now adopted by the committee, provision is made for the selection of a county judge, and in specified cases for the selection of a surrogate, where the population of a county exceeds forty thousand. In other parts of this judiciary article provision is made for the filling of vacancies by election in case of disability or death, or for some other cause the person selected by the people is not able to perform the duties of his office. While this provision of section 20 is in the Constitution of 1846, as suggested by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. Folger], I cannot see the necessity for it. It provides that, on an application by the board of supervisors, the Legislature may provide for the election of two local officers in the county to discharge all other duties provided for in section 18. Until I see some reason for this section I must oppose it.

Mr. BICKFORD—In villages where there are lawyers some distance from the county seat, their local officers may be elected to discharge certain chamber duties devolving upon the county judge. They are a great convenience.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I know of no portion of this State where special county judges are appointed. This was done some years ago, but I understand that they have all been abolished.

Mr. ANDREWS—If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that in Oneida and Oswego counties they have such courts.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I am speaking of my own experience.

Mr. ANDREWS—There are fourteen such courts in the State, I believe.

Mr. FULLER—There are fifteen of these local officers appointed in different counties in this State now. And, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford], they are a very great convenience to the profession in the way of performing chamber duties in those localities which are distant from the county seat. Take the county of Oneida, for instance. There is one of these local officers in the village of Rome, and he is very useful there. In my own county, there is one of these local officers. It has happened within the last month that the county judge was taken sick, and was unable to perform his duty, and the special judge took his place. It has happened once before within the last few years that the county judge was unable to perform his duties for some six months. They were performed during that time by the special judge.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. HAND—I renew it. I think it is unnecessary, inasmuch as we have two judges in every county to take the place of the county judge when he is not able to attend to the duties of his office. Those associate justices perform all the duties, and it is not worth while to put the parties to the trouble of getting up a new board. Those justices, if we may believe gentlemen upon this floor, are abundantly able to perform those duties and help the judges out. It seems to me it would be a loss of time, and a great deal of trouble to get up a new board. This is all provided for. One word with reference to the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale]. I do not feel so bad toward lawyers as he seems to suppose. [Laughter.] I think there are lawyers who make very good county judges. [Laughter.] We have some very good lawyers in the place of my residence, and some of them have been elected justices of the peace; they tried for it and they succeeded. [Laughter.] I believe there are four justices from the legal profession in my county, and they make pretty good justices. [Laughter.] So I am not down on lawyers to the extent that the gentleman might think. I will withdraw my motion.

There being no further amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read section 21 as follows:

SEC. 21. The Legislature may reorganize the judicial departments and districts at the first session after the return of every enumeration under this Constitution, in the manner provided for in the — section of sixth article, and at no other time. But the Legislature shall not increase the number of the departments or of the districts.

There being no amendment offered to this section, the SECRETARY read section 22 as follows:

SEC. 22. The electors of the several towns shall, at their annual town meeting, and in such manner as the Legislature may direct, elect justices of the peace, whose term of office shall be four years. In case of an election to fill a vacancy, occurring before the expiration of a full term, they shall hold for the residue of the unexpired term. Their number and classification may be regulated by law. Justices of the peace and judges or justices of inferior courts, not of record, and their clerks, may be removed after due notice, and an opportunity of being heard in their defense by such county, city, or State courts, as may be prescribed by law for causes to be assigned in the order of removal.

Mr. KETCHAM—I move to insert after the word "years" in line four, "jurisdiction shall not exceed fifty dollars."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Ketcham, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COOKE—I offer the following substitute for the section,

The SECRETARY read the substitute as follows:

Justices courts of inferior jurisdiction, shall be established by law. Such courts shall have civil jurisdiction in actions for the recovery of money only, or for the recovery of specific personal property when the damages or the value of the property claimed shall not exceed fifty dollars. The justices chosen to hold such courts shall have such criminal jurisdiction as has heretofore been possessed by justices of the peace.

Mr. COOKE—I think the public sentiment of the country demands at our hands some restriction upon the jurisdiction of justices of the peace. It is really an inferior court in point of capacity, and although I do not feel disposed to go as far as my friend from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford] has, in saying that inferior men are generally selected for that position, yet we all know that it is a court that is not to be trusted with any very extensive jurisdiction. We have provided so far for a county court, and we have proposed to give that court original jurisdiction. We have provided a supreme court to do all the more important business. Now what use are we to make of a justice's court? I am inclined to think that it ought hardly to be ranked among courts. It should simply afford a means of settling little neighborhood difficulties that are of small amount and not worth being taken into court. It seems to me that we ought not to accord to it any higher functions than I propose to give it in this substitute. Leave it to the Legislature to organize this court; leave it to confer jurisdiction to the amount of fifty dollars in the simplest cases, and then to limit appeals from justices' courts to the county courts, if you please, and it will do more toward the relief of the appellate courts, it strikes me, than any thing we have yet done. Now what matters it. If gentlemen will take up the cases that arise in justices' courts and follow them through the appellate courts to where final judgment is obtained, they will find that the amount involved in the action bears no proportion to the amount of expense involved, not only to parties but to the State. The aggregate of justice that is obtained in these litigations before justices of the peace is far less than the aggregate of expense.

Mr. BERGEN—I will call for the reading of the substitute in the first place.

The SECRETARY read as requested.

Mr. BERGEN—As I understand this amendment it would wipe out our present system of four justices of the peace for each town. Perhaps I misunderstand it, but that is my impression. Now, sir, this system has been in operation in this State for a great many years, and I believe it has given general satisfaction to the people.

Mr. COOKE—If the gentleman will allow me, I will say it leaves the Legislature to organize justices' courts in the different town and counties. They may assign just such a number of justices as they think sufficient.

Mr. BERGEN—It leaves it to the Legislature to abolish the present system which has been in operation for years, and which has operated, at all events in my vicinity, satisfactorily. We have not had with us, as the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford] says, inferior men elevated to the office of justice of the peace. We are in the habit of electing some of our best citizens. I am sorry to hear that in some portions of the State, the office is so degraded that inferior men are elected.

Mr. BICKFORD—I used no such expression, neither did I use the expression attributed to me by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke]. I said nothing about justices of the peace. I said justices of sessions were rather inferior; that they were not good specimens of justices of the peace.

Mr. BERGEN—I think the gentleman has not mended the matter by his explanation. Justices of sessions are justices of peace elected by the county from among the justices elected by the towns.

Mr. BICKFORD—They are not good specimens of justices of the peace.

Mr. BERGEN—The people of the county of Jefferson must have very bad judgment or perverted choice if they elect the worst specimens for their justices. It is not the custom with us. We generally elect the best specimens. I believe it wise to "let well enough alone." Under the last Constitution, as also under the Constitution of 1821, we made these justices Constitutional officers, and scattered them through each town for the convenience of the people. There are a great many duties which they perform outside of their judicial duties. They are made commissioners of deeds, and take affidavits, besides trying cases. They are a convenience to the people. I do not think the Legislature should be permitted, in a whim, to deprive the people of these conveniences. Then as to their jurisdiction, an argument is made, if I understand the gentleman aright, that in consequence of the county judge being authorized to try civil cases, there is very little use of giving similar jurisdiction to justices. Now, it may be in the county in which the gentleman resides, and in some other counties in the State, that there is not much civil business transacted. But the gentleman must bear in mind that there are other counties in which a county judge is wholly occupied with the criminal business. In the county which I, in part, represent, under the system of 1846, under which no original civil jurisdiction is given to the county court, the county judge is nearly the whole year occupied with the criminal business, and it is difficult for him to keep the calendar clear. As far as the county of Kings is concerned, perhaps it is unwise to give him any original civil jurisdiction, for his whole time is required in trying criminal cases. In large counties like Kings, this must be the case. Yet, if we adopt the amendment which has been offered, and in addition to the burden now upon his shoulders, we are to give him other jurisdiction, it will be impossible for him to discharge the duties which will devolve upon him. It is true, the State has provided in a measure another court in the county of Kings and city of Brooklyn, to relieve the justices. But that court also is overloaded and in session nearly the whole year. As our population increases—and the increase is rapid—other courts will be required to discharge the business which will accumulate. Upon that point, I have one word to say. The Constitution of 1846 and the system reported by the Judiciary Committee provides for the payment of the salaries of the judges of the supreme court by the State. They are intended to dispose of all the important civil and criminal business in the counties, and those judges will dispose and do dispose of that class of business in the great mass of the counties, at the expense of the State. Now, in justice, you should provide, at the expense of the State, a sufficient number of judges to perform that same duty in the county of Kings, and not require them, after paying their proportion of expense for the courts to perform those duties in other counties, to furnish in addition, at their own expense, judges to perform similar judicial duties in their own limits. I hope that the old system of justices of the sessions, which has been in operation and given satisfaction, will be continued, and that no innovation of this kind will be made.

Mr. FOLGER—I move that the committee do now rise and report the article to the Convention, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

Whereupon the committee rose, and the PRESIDENT resumed the chair in Convention.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that the committee had had under consideration the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, had made some progress therein, and made sundry amendments thereto, and had directed their chairman to report that fact to the Convention, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the article.

The question was put on agreeing with the report of the committee, and it was declared carried.

Mr. FOLGER—I move that this article be made the special order for to-morrow, in the order of unfinished business.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

Mr. PROSSER—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Prosser, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 18. 1867.

The Convention met at ten A. M. pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by Rev. J. T. PECK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. KRUM presented the petition of John W. Young, and other citizens of Schoharie county, for the abrogation of the Board of Regents of the University.

Which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BEALS presented the petition of Professor J. K. Abrams, and other citizens of Mohawk, on the same subject.

Which took a like reference.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of H. P. Willard, and fifty-five other citizens of Boonville, Oneida county, on the same subject.

Which took a like reference.

Mr. McDONALD—I ask leave to present a minority report on the salt springs.

The PRESIDENT—No objection being made, the report will be received.

Mr. McDONALD then read the following report:

The undersigned, a minority of the said committee to which was referred that portion of the present Constitution, relating to the salt springs of the State, would respectfully report:

The well known Onondaga salt springs and reservation are confined to a parcel of land lying around and near the head of Onondaga lake, particularly described in the report of the commissioners of the land office to this Convention, document No 27. For many years the manufacture of salt therefrom has been largely on the increase, and although salt water has been discovered in other parts of this State, at no other place has the practical manufacture of salt become a success. Although at one time there seemed some doubt on the subject, yet now the undersigned believes, and all admit that supplies of salt water of the best quality may be obtained on this reservation in exhaustless quantities, and that an annual product, of at least 15,000,000 bushels could be taken therefrom continuously, and without any diminution in the annual supply. Such is the opinion of the present superintendent, Hon. George Geddes, and of every witness examined by your committee. The annual product of the reservation has increased from 25,474 bushels in 1797, to 526,049 bushels in 1821; 3,340,767 bushels in 1841; 5,593,247 bushels in 1860, and 7,158,503 bushels in 1866; of this, solar salt has increased from 220,247 bushels in 1841 to 1,978,183 bushels in 1866. For a more particular statement of the production and brief history of the manufacture of salt, and the change in the laws regulating the same, the undersigned begs leave to call attention to the report of the majority of this committee, and commend the same. The title to this reservation is in the State. All the rights that the manufacturers of fine salt have, are obtained by virtue of leases from the State. In 1859, the whole law in regard to the manufacture of salt and the care and superintendence of this reservation was compiled, altered and amended, and all former laws repealed. (See Laws of 1859, p. 807, chap. 346). Among other changes made at this time was one repealing all former provisions by which certain salt blocks had a priority as to use of water over other salt blocks, and by this law all of the three hundred and sixteen salt blocks were put on an equality as to their right to use the water furnished by the State. Before this, the law provided that the owners of salt blocks might dig wells upon said reservation, and only pay six mills duty per bushel on salt manufactured therefrom. But by the law of 1859, the duty is made uniform at one cent per bushel, and if any person had a well, the superintendent may take possession and appropriate it, paying therefor the reasonable value, "but not to exceed its original cost."

These changes, and such others as were made at this time, cannot be regarded what is usually called unfavorable legislation by the manufacturers of salt.

The law of 1859 still remains in force.

Under this law, and by virtue of section 44 thereof, the superintendent executed leases of said fine salt blocks to the then present lessees for thirty years from 20th June, 1859, and these fine salt blocks are now held under such leases. Each of these leases, besides other conditions and covenants, contains the following: "And the said party of the second part (lessee) covenants with the people that he will conform in every respect to the provisions of any and all the acts of the Legislature now in force in relation to the salt springs and the manufacture of salt in the county of Onondaga, or any laws which may be hereafter enacted in relation thereto," etc.

The rights of the manufacturers of coarse salt arise and are founded on permits or licenses given by the commissioners of the land office. The undersigned does not state more particularly the rights of the salt manufacturers, as he desires only to show that the State has, by virtue of its ownership and contract, exclusive control over the reservation and all the erections thereon. When and on what conditions the State should exercise this power the undersigned does not propose to consider in this report.

In 1859 the manufacture of salt became quite depressed, and the price of salt was quite low. The competition between the owners of the different fine salt blocks was very great, and the capacity of these fine salt blocks being much greater than their manufacture the value of them was much less than their cost.

As will appear hereinafter, about one-third of the whole number of these fine salt blocks, if kept in constant operation during the season of seven months, would produce all the salt that was manufactured by the whole three hundred and sixteen. This was caused partially by the inability of the State to furnish more water, at least of the best quality, and partially by the unprofitable nature of the manufacture of fine salt.

To obviate this, and to combine and make the manufacture of salt remunerative if not profitable, "The Onondaga salt company" was organized in the winter of 1859 and spring of 1860. It is a corporation under the general manufacturing law, and at first had a capital stock of $160,000. This capital stock was made up by calculating five per cent on the value of all the property employed in and about the reservation in the manufacture of salt, both coarse and fine, which was called $3,200.000, and the owners of each salt block or portion of land occupied with salt covers for the manufacture of coarse salt, was called upon and expected to pay and take stock in said corporation to the amount of five per cent on this valuation of his property thus used in the manufacture of salt. Almost all the owners did thus subscribe and take stock, and the balance of stock was made up by other persons or owners taking more stock than was allotted, so that over nine-tenths of the stockholders were owners of salt property and in about the same ratio.

After the organiaztion of this corporation the corporation leased each salt block, and almost all lands used for the manufacture of coarse salt of the owners, who were also stockholders. These leases are uniform in their conditions, and a copy of one is included in the testimony submitted and attached to the report of the majority. By these leases this corporation acquired exclusive control of all lands and property thus leased, and in consideration covenanted to pay quarterly an annual rent equal to twelve and a half per cent, upon a valuation of said property provided for therein. This valuation was afterward made, and according to the testimony of J. W. Barker, superintendent of said corporation, these fine salt blocks were not worth at that time, or just before the organization of this corporation, the valuation. Those valued at $5,000 could have been bought at $4,000, and the undersigned believes some of them even at a lower price. Besides this agreement on their part to thus pay twelve and a half per cent on such valuation, this corporation further covenanted "that (it) the party of the second part will, during the period of this lease or grant, or until its termination sooner by forfeiture, as above provided, pay all ordinary city, town, county, school and highway taxes, and will at all times make reasonable and proper repairs for the purpose of protecting the said premises from delapidation and waste by the elements or other causes, and at the expiration of the period aforesaid, or earlier termination of the estate hereby granted, will restore the said premises, erections and appurtenances in as good repair as the same are when these presents are delivered, excepting only accidental losses by the elements other than fire."

These leases were all for ten years. Afterward some of the salt blocks were changed so that salt could be manufactured therein with coal instead of wood, at a cost of from $600 to $1.000, and in such cases the cost, or about the cost, of such change was added to the first valuation, and 12½ per cent paid also on such addition.

Thus, it will be seen, the owners of fine salt blocks, were to, and have, received annually 12½ per cent on a valuation (at least, one-quarter more than the actual value at that time) over and above all taxes, repairs of every kind, and at the end of term get back their property in the same repair, or rebuilt in case it was destroyed by fire or any other way, "except by the accidental losses by the elements other than fire." A few owners of coarse salt blocks did not lease, but this corporation afterward, by contract, obtained control of the sale of all salt thus manufactured.

Thus the Onondaga salt company obtained exclusive control of the manufacture and sale of all salt, both fine and coarse, made from the wells on this reservation, and continue to exercise the same. It allots to each salt block the amount of salt if is allowed to make each year, and determines the price per bushel it will pay, and usually lets this work to the owner of the block from whom it has taken the lease.

Hence it will be seen, that, although "the Onondaga salt company" is the one party in these leases and contracts and the individual or corporate owners of the separate blocks or coarse salt lots and covers are the other party, yet as these same individual or corporate owners are also stockholders in the said corporation in the same ratio as they are owners respectively the interests of both parties are identical, and that "the Onondaga salt company" was organized, for the purpose before stated, by the salt manufacturers by adding five or six per cent to their capital and creating a monopoly in its sale and manufacture.

Since 1860 salt deposits, especially at Saginaw, Michigan, or in portions of Canada, have either been discovered or the manufacture therefrom has been much increased and improved. At these places wood, as a fuel, is much cheaper, and as the cost of fuel is the main expense in the manufacture of fine salt, it can, in that particular, be manufactured cheaper. But on account of the purity of the water from the Onondaga springs, its high comparative strength, its exhaustless quantity, and the ease with which it is obtained, in connection with the improved methods of purifying and manufacturing it into salt, discovered through many costly experiments made by the State and by "the Onondaga salt company," Onondaga salt, of the same quality, is produced cheaper than any other manufactured salt.

The use of coal as a fuel has not only cheapened but improved the manufacture thereof, and as the price of wood can but increase at the place of manufacture where it is used, while on the contrary the price of coal will doubtless not increase except by increase in price of labor, it is quite probable, if not certain, that this difference on account of the cost of fuel as between Saginaw, the works in Canada, and the Onondaga salt springs will become less and less, and thus enable the Onondaga salt the better to compete with salt from these other parts.

In this connection, while referring to causes enabling the Onondaga salt the better to compete in the market with salt from other localities, and especially from Saginaw (which is the principal place from which competition comes westward), the undersigned would call attention to that well known fact that the bulk of freight on the canals and lakes is eastward, and hence that the price of freight is much less from Syracuse westward than from Saginaw eastward. In fact this is so much so that often shippers on the lakes are glad to get salt as ballast while any salt brought eastward must pay full freight. The great weight and bulk of salt according to its value only makes this difference the greater. These causes, while they are thus advantageous to Onondaga salt in enabling it to compete with Saginaw salt in its home markets, and markets west of it also, operate favorably in another way. They operate to prohibit the sale of Seginaw salt any great distance eastward, especially not on or near Lake Erie, and thus give the entire control of the price in certain markets to the manufacturers of Onondaga salt. The market thus controlled is found to be all the State of New York, except the river counties, New York city, and some of the south-eastern counties. It also includes a portion of Pennsylvania. The competition which prevents Onondaga salt controlling the market in New York city, and the eastern and south-eastern portions of the State, is the low price of foreign salt and the fact of the increased cost of freight eastward from Syracuse, considered in connection with its great weight as compared with its cost, as it gave Onondaga salt the advantage westward, gives foreign salt the advantage in these localities. To counteract this the tolls on the canal on foreign salt when compared with domestic salt are as 2½ to 1½ which makes a difference of five cents per barrel from Albany to Syracuse, and in that proportion for longer or shorter distances. The Onondaga salt company, in order to protect itself and its stockholders from the high price of coal produced by another combination well known as the coal monopoly, purchased a coal mine in Pennsylvania sometime about the year 1862. It operated this mine and thus obtained its own coal until the winter of 1865, when it sold this coal mine at an advance of $510,000, and also obtained a contract with the purchaser to furnish this company with all the coal it might need for 17 years, at 50 cents above net cost.

Thus organized, the Onondaga salt company have operated these salt springs under these circumstances with the following results, as appears from its books, the sworn statement of its officers, and of Hon. Geo. Geddes, superintendent of salt springs, and his deputies.

Amount of salt produced and sold, and price.

1866,....	7,158,503	1,431,701	1,978,183	395 637	2 35

This salt was sold at the various markets in about the same ratio each year, and in the year 1866, viz.:

New York city,..	149,663 bbls.	at $1 67.....	$249,937 21
Canada,.....	102,036 do	at 1 93.....	196,987 38
Lower Lake,.....	383,330 do	at 2 03.....	778,261 40
Upper Lake,.....	382,234 do	at 1 99.....	760,645 66

Making total,..	1,431,701	Av. price, $2 03	$2,918,127 15

This shows the net avails of such sales at Syracuse; and as the sales in the State were in fact $2.35, at Syracuse the allowance of ten cents for selling must have been deducted.

The following is a table of the average cost of transportation and sale of a barrel of salt in each market in the year 1866:

Upper lake ports,.....	49 cents.
Lower lake ports,.....	36 "
New York city,.....	51 "

The following is a table of the net price realized at Syracuse of all salt sold in different markets for different years:

	Home sales.	Upper lake ports.	Lower lake ports.
1863,.....	$1 30	$1 68	$1 66
1863,.....	1 89	1 82	1 87
1864,.....	2 60	2 19	2 41
1865,.....	2 16	1 94	1 34
1866,.....	2 25	2 03	1 99

From this it appears that in 1864 salt sold in upper lake ports netted 41 cents less, and that sold in lower lake ports 19 cents less than that sold in home market; and in 1866, that sold in upper lake ports 22 cents less, and that in lower lake ports 26 cents less per barrel than that sold in home market.

In addition to this the sales of fine salt in New York city in competition with foreign salt has been at net price at Syracuse of $1.60 to $1.75, and that sent to Canada via Oswego at a price from 25 to 40 cents per barrel less than home price, and that sold at Albany and some parts of Pennsylvania from 15 to 40 cents less per barrel. Thus the people of this State nearest the reservation have paid so much more, comparatively, for their salt.

In 1866, the valuation of property on which the Onondaga salt company paid 12½ per cent under their leases was:

Coarse salt property,.....	$1,618,640 00
Fine salt property and mills,.....	1,777,613 76
	$3,396,253 76

They are now valued, in the statement made by the superintendent of the Onondaga salt company, as follows:

517 coarse salt vats, $57 each,.....	$2,195,469 00
316 salt blocks,.....	2,205,500 00
5 salt mills,.....	98 000 00

ing return of its operations in its investment in the coal mine, and getting their own coal:

Year.	No. of tons furnished.	Cost price.	Price of coal monopoly.
1863,	55,509	$4.199	$5.486
1864,	96,626	5.373	8.97
1865,	127,417	5.03	7.776

The company sold their coal mine in winter 1865 and 1866, but under their contract they received,

1866, 132,503 at cost, $4.537 $6.262 making the whole number of tons furnished, 412,255 tons, with aggregate difference in price at which it was furnished, and asking price of coal monopoly, $989,229.01.

In 1866 the Onondaga salt company furnished coal to the manufacturers of fine salt at $5.00 per ton.

The joint salt monopoly furnished it 1867, $5.02 per ton.

In 1866, for every ton of coal consumed in manufacture of fine salt, 36 19-56 bushels of salt was produced.

In 1866 the company paid, under its contracts for manufacturing fine salt, 19 cents, and coarse salt, 8 cents per bushel. The average production of each fine salt block in 1862 and 1866, which was operated, was, 1862, 232½ bushels, 1866, 233½ bushels. General average, 233 bushels.

In 1866, only 214 fine salt blocks were put in operation, leaving 102 idle, each one in operation making on the average, 25,447 bushels.

With coal at $5 per ton, it was found on the average, that the coal to manufacture each bushel of salt, cost about 13¼ cents.

The salt boiler, who does all the work, was paid for boiling, three cents per bushel, and it was reckoned that one cent per bushel would pay all repairs. Each coarse cover produces, on an average, each year, 50 bushels. Each workman can take care of 100 covers, and in 1866 his wages were fourteen shillings per day.

The superintendent of the Onondaga salt company returns as the cost to that company of the manufacture of fine and coarse salt per barrel in the year 1866, viz.,

FINE SALT.

Manufacture, 5 bush. 19 cents,	.95
State duty, " 1 "	.05
Taxes and office expenses,	.10

From the report of the commissioners of the land office (Con. Doc. No. 27) and the superintendent of the salt springs (Con. Doc. No. 19) the further following facts appear:

That the whole number of acres of land owned by the State,	1174.87
Of this there is leased for fine salt block about,	54
" " " coarse salt covers,	754.68
There is of private land occupied by coarse salt covers	173.30

Of the remaining land except that occupied by the State buildings and works, most of it is low marsh land. But the best wells are found on it about the mouth of Onondaga creek and near the pump house, in the third ward of Syracuse.

The number of fine salt blocks on State land,	216
" " " " " " private "	100
The average annual capacity of these 316 blocks,	12, 000,000 to 15,000,000

That there were, at time of report, fifteen wells in use, and they were digging another which has since been finished and proven to be one of the best wells.

The average production of these fifteen wells is about 1,400 gallons per minute, 900 of which averages 66 degrees salometer or 16½ per cent salt; remaining 500, average 54 degrees salometer or 13½ per cent salt. The water averages from 52 degrees to 74 degrees salometer.

Annual capacity to furnish water to make about 9,000,000 bushels.

Average cost of production per barrel to the State, three cents three and one-quarter mills.

The total revenues and receipts from salt works since 1846, are,	$1,429,402 65
The total expenditures since 1846,	1,041,927 67
	$387,474 98

It will be noticed, that on stating the aggregate expenses (Doc. 27. page 31), there is a mistake of $100,000, arising from error in adding.

Making average yearly net income, $19,373.75.

The following table shows the sources from which receipts came and the objects for which expenditures were made:

from sales of land, $165,168.74, and there has been expended for land and damages, $178,698.02. (For particular statement see document No. 27, pages 9 to 21.) That the cost and value of wells, pump houses, conduits, offices and erections of the State, (see doc. No 27, p. 5), is $311,710.

This is an abstract statement of the facts proven before the committee, and some estimates of the superintendent of the Onondaga salt company. The facts will not be disputed, at least by the salt company or manufacturers, as they furnished all but those from the State records. As to their estimates, we shall have something to say.

The undersigned has been thus particular to state these facts, because of the great disagreement among the committee with regard to the subject referred to them, so that, although he may not be able to find out any remedy, he may yet furnish the facts from which the Convention may the better determine upon the question. His excuse for so particular a statement in relation to the Onondaga salt company is that, its history is the history of the entire salt manufacture ever since it was organized, and because the undersigned believes that the operation of the monopoly created by its organization and maintained by it ever since, has been detrimental to the interests of the people of the whole State, although it has been very profitable to all persons interested in the manufacture of salt, and hence to all interests connected therewith. From these facts, thus established, the undersigned has deducted the following tables, which he believes to be correct.

It will be observed that in the calculation as to the cost of manufacture of salt, both coarse and fine, the amount allowed for rent differs in the tables of the undersigned from the statement of the superintendent of the salt company. The difference arises in this: The undersigned calculates his tables from the actual rent paid by the Onondaga salt company, as returned by them, viz.: on $1,618,640, for coarse salt property, and $1,777,613.76 for fine salt property, while the calculation of the superintendent is made on his valuation of the present value of said property, viz.: $2,195,469 on coarse salt property, and $2,303,500 for fine salt property. The undersigned submits that, if the salt company wish to make a return of the actual cost, they should base it upon what they actually pay, and that it is not just, by monopoly, to increase the price of salt, and because of this increase in price to increase the valuation of the property, and then calculate the rental on this increased appraised value, as a part of the cost of production, to account for the increased price produced by monopoly. With these suggestions, he submits the tables, viz.:

Showing the average production of fine salt blocks during the year 1866, and cost of work and coal to manufacture the same:

214 blocks were operated, producing the average	25,477 bush.
During 1862 and 1866 the average production of each block daily was 233 bushels. If, therefore, it was operated 210 days, or continuously during the season, each block would produce	48,930 "
106 days would produce	5,180,390 " which is the entire production of 1866. Hence to produce all in 1866 only required 106 blocks; balance of 206 blocks useless.

The price paid for manufacture was		19 cents.
Of this the average cost of coal was	12¾	cents.
Paid for boiling,	3	"
Repairs,	1	"
Profits,	1¼	"
Making,		19 cents.

If the blocks are operated as in 1866, producing 25,447 bushels in season, the allowance for repairs on block worth average $5,000, will be, ... $254 47
Allowance for superintendence, ... 318 09
If the blocks were operated continuously through season, producing 48,930 bushels, allowance for repairs would be, ... 489 30
Allowance for superintendence, ... 611 62

This shows that 19 cents pays liberally for manufacture, repairs and superintendence, and in addition to this the owner gets 12½ per cent on valuation.

Showing how much should be allowed per barrel for the manufacture of salt by the Onondaga salt company in order to pay dividends upon the whole property leased by them, that portion of the salt blocks necessary to us, and upon the capital stock invested, as determined by the manufacture of 1866. The whole number of barrels made was 1,431,701, of which 1,036,064 was fine salt, and 395.637 was coarse. The valuation of fine salt property on which rent was paid was $1.777,613.76; of coarse salt property, $1,618,640:

	Fine Salt. Rent.	Pr. bbl.	Coarse Salt. Rent.	Pr. bbl.
At 12½ pr.ct. on all,	$222,201 71	21.5	$202,330 00	51.2
At 7 pr. ct. on all...	124,432 96	12.	113,704 80	28.6
At 10 pr. ct. on average valuation of 106 blocks necessary to make all salt made, if in continuous operation, value $661,414.38, ...	66,141 43	06.4

TABLE No. 3,

Showing average cost per barrel for manufacture of salt by Onondaga salt company for year 1866, and also what it would cost if this company paid seven per cent instead of twelve per cent on their leases, or ten per cent on the leases of one hundred and six blocks, which would make all the fine salt if kept continuously at work:

TABLE No. 4,

Showing the average net price at which salt was sold by the Onondaga salt company during the year 1866 in different markets. The price per barrel that the residents of this State (except New York river counties and some south-eastern counties) paid more than non-residents of different markets, and the aggregate excess in price thus paid. The amount sold in State market at $2.25 was 414,358, of which at least 350,000 barrels were thus sold to inhabitants of this State:

This table divides it and puts five cents per barrel for such expenses on all sold.

TABLE No. 6.

Showing the amounts divided among the owners of the salt works, coarse and fine, both in the shape of rents for real estate and dividends made by the Onondaga salt company, together with its surplus now on hand, thus showing the aggregate net profits of the owners of the salt works since 1860. The valuation of property on which 12½ per cent was paid for the year 1866, was:

If you deduct the bonus received on sale of coal mine, as not strictly within the business, viz., $510,000, you still have $4,316,441, or about $1,000,000 more than the valuation of the property on which they pay 12½ per cent, it being 127 per cent on property invested, and an average of more than 18 per cent annually.

From these tables, if correct, the following facts are established:

Digitized by Google

First. That of the 316 salt blocks only 106 are necessary to manufacture all the fine salt sold in 1866.

Second. That the Onondaga salt company has since its organization paid 12½ per cent on an excessive valuation, when made, of all these 316 salt blocks (although only 106 were needed and only 214 actually operated) net, over and above all taxes, insurance, dilapidation or other injury, and that this amount is called and calculated as part of the expense of the manufacture of salt.

Third That even under the liberal calculation and allowances of the salt company, and on this basis of 12½ per cent rent on all 316 blocks in 1866, the entire cost of a barrel of fine salt was $1.81.5, for coarse salt $1.51.2. If only seven per cent net had been allowed on valuation of all 316 blocks, the cost would have been $1.72 for fine and $1.28.6 for coarse salt per barrel; and if 10 per cent net on valuation of 106 blocks necessary, then the cost would be $1.66.4 for fine per barrel (tables Nos. 2 and 3), while all salt was sold at a net average of $2.03 per barrel.

Fourth. That the inhabitants of the western, northern, middle and southern portions of this State for the 350,000 barrels bought by them in 1866, were compelled to pay $147,000 net more than the inhabitants of Canada paid for same quantity. $220,500 more than the same amount sold in New York city net, and $150,500 more than the average sales in all other markets net (table No. 4). This is the benefit that the people of the State derive from the exclusive ownership and control of the salt springs and manufacture of salt therefrom.

Fifth. That the profits made on the 350,000 barrels sold the people of the State, residing where the salt company has a monopoly of the market, was in 1866, over and above 10 per cent net on the capital stock, 7 per cent on surplus and borrowed capital, and 12½ per cent net on said leases, $186,520, and over and above 10 per cent net on capital stock, 7 per cent net on surplus and borrowed money, and 7 per cent net on leases, $231,560 (table No. 5).

Sixth. That since 1860 the owners of the salt works have, on a property of the value of not more than $3,500,000, divided to themselves as net profits the amount of $4,316,441, or 18 per cent net yearly (table No. 6).

Seventh. That during the same time the entire net revenue of the State from these salt springs has been only $79,812.98, or only $11,401.85 annually for the use of all its property. (See return of receipts and expenditures of Onondaga salt springs, page 12.) If this be a true statement, the undersigned submits that the representatives of the people of the State, whether in Legislature or Constitutional Convention, should try and seek an appropriate remedy.

But before the undersigned proceeds to consider the remedy, he begs leave to refer to certain positions taken by those who represent the interests of the manufacturers of salt.

The undersigned is well aware that even before the committee there appeared a worthy man, who had been engaged in and acquainted with the manufacture of salt for many years, who stated that in his opinion manufacturers of salt had not, in the aggregate, made a net profit of over seven per cent per annum on investment. While the undersigned doubts not that the opinion thus given is perfectly honest, he would suggest that so many questions of the valuation of the property and cost during so many years are involved in the opinion, that it would be impossible to determine as to its actual value. Nor does he deem such an opinion material to the question under consideration. For the past seven years we have the actual results as returned to the committee by the officers of the Onondaga salt company, and hence against this no opinion can prevail. As we are seeking to remedy present evils instead of those of years long ago, the undersigned submits that the actual results of seven years past should be satisfactory.

But it is claimed that the large profits of the Onondaga salt company came not from the manufacture of salt, but from its great success in the purchase, working and sale of the coal mines.

It will be seen that the undersigned allows for the $510,000 bonus obtained on the sale, and he submits that is all that should be allowed.

The purchase was made entirely for the benefit of the manufacturers of salt, and the undersigned is quite sure that if it had proven a loss that would have been charged. Hence as a profit it should be credited.

Again, all other losses without particular statement are charged.

Take the year 1866.
1,036,064 barrels fine salt at $1 81.5 cost per barrel,		$1,880,456 16
395,637 barrels coarse salt at $1 51.2 cost per barrel,		598,203 14
1,431,701 barrels in all, cost,		$2,478,659 30
But the 1,431,701 sold for net at Syracuse,		2,918,127 15
Leaving a net profit to salt company of,		$339,467 15
While the salt company only return the profits of year 1866 at,	$107,016 38
To which, if you add dividend of Feb., 2, 1867,	67,200 00
you have	$174,216 38 Profits,	$174,216 38
Leaving of losses not particularly stated,		$165,251 47

It is claimed that this deficiency arises from losses by agents and in various ways, but the undersigned submits that with such a margin of losses all the profits of an undertaking especially for the benefit of the business should not be deducted. But the evidence shows that the coal companies have furnished coal during the early part of this year at $5.02 and as the calculation was at $5 per ton, and the price of salt is the same this year as in 1866, the undersigned submits no deduction can be made for year 1867 on that account.

Although the undersigned claims it should not be done yet even if you allow all the profits claimed on account of coal contract, yet the remaining net profits would be amount of a 12½ per cent on leases,	$2,927,975 54 which is at least equal to the entire valuation of all property belonging to the manufacturers in 1860, making a net profit of 100 per cent or over 14 per cent per annum net profit.
And profits of salt company over and above alleged profits on coal,	399,263 93

In the report of the majority of the committee, the relation between the State and the manufacturers of salt is spoken of as a quasi-partnership, and taking this as a foundation, the minority report of Mr. Comstock makes certain calculations as between the State and the manufacturers.

The undersigned begs leave to dissent from any such position. The relation between the State and the manufacturers bears no resemblance, and has no similarity to a partnership. There is no joint interest in either the property or the profits. The State is the owner and lessor performing certain work for a fixed compensation for the work and use of the property. The manufacturers are the lessees, with no obligation to pay any thing but the rent. The State legally has the whole control. For the past seven years the manufacturers have practically had the whole control.

But even on the basis of a copartnership or quasi-copartnership, the report of Mr. Comstock, while it sets forth the true general principles which govern the settlement of a copartnership omits to take into account many items that should properly be considered, and in the opinion of the undersigned such report does not properly consider other facts.

In his statement of the capital stock invested on the part of the State, he only allows the nominal price paid the Indians for the reservation, and the cost price of buildings, offices, and erections thereon, it being only about $11,000 over and above the cost of the erections. Such an allowance need only be stated to see its unfairness. That the value of all the lands (about 1,100 acres) belonging to the State, with the saline deposits, is only $11,000, is too absurd to need more than to be mentioned. The report also omits to say any thing about the vast water-power drawn from the canal, moving four large water-wheels, which operate the pumps. It also charges as profits received by the State, the tolls received at 12½ cents per bushel, when in another part of the report it is admitted that such increased duty was asked for to improve the canal, and thus benefit the salt works. The undersigned submits that the benefit of the Erie canal has not been so unimportant to the salt manufacturers that, after they have received the benefit of the expenditure of such increased duty, they should seek to charge it against the State. A failure to take these matters into consideration, makes the calculation entirely delusive.

Again, in the year 1859, the whole arrangement between the State and the salt manufacturers was changed; and, although the undersigned denies that the relations between the State and the salt manufacturers bear any resemblance to a partnership, yet he fears not to compare the profits received by each on the value of the property invested. The undersigned submits that if you consider the property of the State only equal in value to that belonging to the manufacturers, this valuation is too small. But thus regarding the State and the manufacturers as having property of equal value invested, since 1859 we find that the manufacturers have received as net profits since their investment, $4,316,441 (table No. 6), while the State from its equal investment has only received $79,812.98. (See page 12.) From such a connection, whether it be called a partnership or quasi-copartnership, it is submitted that the State should seek to be relieved, especially where, as we have shown, a very large portion of such profits, and much more than the proportionate share, is taken from the people of the State.

Having thus referred to these collateral matters, the undersigned begs leave to submit the following considerations with regard to the constitutional provisions necessary and proper in relation to the salt springs:

The Constitution should provide as to the salt springs:

1. That the exclusive control and management should be given to the commissioners of the canal fund, or some independent board.

2. Those who manufacture salt from the reservation should be prohibited from discriminating in price against the people of the State.

3. The absolute control of the manufacture by any one person, association or corporation should be prohibited, and in part to accomplish this, every inhabitant of the State should be allowed to dig wells and manufacture salt on the same condition as any other citizen.

4. The duty should be increased.

5. The salt springs and reservation should not be sold.

First. The exclusive control and management should be given to the commissioners of the canal fund or some other independent board.

Heretofore the control has been with the Legislature as the law-making powing. It may seem almost inexplicable that the Legislature or any other agents or the people should have allowed the interests of the people to be thus disregarded in the management of the salt springs, as has been shown. But when we consider the great combined local interests—the large pecuniary interest involved—the ability and industry of the representatives, in both Senate and Assembly, from the locality interested, and the opportunity under the present Constitution to co-operate and combine with other local or public matters, the result, although it may seem almost unaccountable, need not be wondered at. The history of attempted legislation on the subject would best serve to explain this.

If, however, the exclusive control was given to the commissioners of the canal fund, the rights of both the State and the manufacturers would be duly regarded and decided upon their own merits, not connected or combined with other projects or interests.

Second. Those who manufacture salt from the salt springs of the State should be compelled to sell the salt manufactured therefrom as cheap to the people of the State as to other persons.

As we have shown, the State has exclusive control over the salt springs and the manufacture of the salt therefrom. On account of the cheapness with which salt can be there manufactured, and its great comparative bulk and weight, and consequent cost of transportation, the people of the western, northern and southern portions of the State are entirely dependent for their supply on Onondaga salt, and the manufacturers thereof completely control the market and make the price what they wish. This is the result of natural causes, and the increased price charged the people of those portions of the State on account thereof has been fully stated. Under such circumstances, what more natural than that the people, the owners of these springs, having absolute control, should enact that their lessees should furnish them, with what they needed of this necessary article, at at least the same rates as they furnish others not having any interest in the property. What more natural than that a farmer who shall rent a farm which produces an article of necessity not produced by any other farm, should agree with and thus compel his lessee to furnish him with what he may wish of that necessary article as cheap as furnished to others. How unnatural would it be for him to pay much more, especially where, by his lease, he still has absolute control of the matter.

But it may be said this is not practicable. Why not? As extensive as the sales of salt are, there can be no trouble in finding out what they are and the price, and with that knowledge, and the absolute power to cut off all supply of water, the undersigned submits that the people or its agents are possessed of all that could be wished to enforce the prohibition. Yet it may be urged that if this be done that the manufacture will become so unprofitable that it will not be prosecuted. It is sufficient for the present to say that the Onondaga salt company claim that they do not sell any salt below cost, and that cost includes a liberal allowance for all other expenses, and 12½ per cent net annually on all real estate invested therein. This is submitted to be a fair if not a large income. For further considerations on this subject the undersigned begs leave to refer to the remarks hereinafter on the question of an increase of duty. With this provision the inhabitants of this State would get the advantage of competition. The capacity of the works being so much more than the consumption of the people of the State, the salt manufacturers must and do send their salt to other markets where it comes in competition with Saginaw salt in the West and foreign salt in the East, as hereinbefore stated, and thus, under the present monopoly, salt is sold in those other markets from 20 to 45 cents less per barrel net than to the people of the State. If this provision was adopted, the people of this State would get their salt thus much less, and would be relieved from the payment of the large amount averaging over $150,000, which they are now compelled to pay for the privilege of owning and having absolute legal control of the salt springs.

Third. The control of these springs or the manufacture of salt therefrom by any one person, association or corporation should be prohibited, and to accomplish this every citizen of the State should be allowed to dig wells and manufacture salt therefrom on the same condition as any other.

Now no one but the State can dig any wells, and even if any person was allowed to he would still be liable to pay the same duty as one to whom the State furnished water, and in addition he would be subject to the right of the superintendent to take his well on his paying him its value, not exceeding its cost. If this clause was not expressly intended to prevent any one digging any well, it accomplishes that result equally well No person will invest his money where if he loses it is his loss. If he succeeds the result of his investment and labor can be taken away from him on payment of not more than its cost.

The amount of capital required to sink a well and erect a block to manufacture fine salt is not so great that it cannot be easily obtained, and if a free competition was allowed as long as the manufacture was profitable enough, persons would be found to go into the business. If the statement of facts and deductions therefrom hereinbefore prove any thing, it is that the great evil in the management of the salt springs is the monopoly by which it is controlled, and hence the great remedy is to prevent any monopoly in the manufacture of this article of necessity.

To accomplish this the undersigned knows of no more effective system than to allow all citizens under general rules to go on and manufacture salt. The facts before stated have shown there is plenty of opportunity and the supply of salt water is exhaustless. The undersigned will show, when treating of the increase of duty, that at present prices, in any market, the production of fine salt would be very profitable, and if so, an opportunity to compete on equal terms would soon bring about competition. Especially would it be so if the manufacturers were not allowed to make any discrimination against the people of this State, as recommended; and thus the price would be affected by this competition and become a fair indication of its cost within this State.

Nor can it be objected that this would in any way interfere with the rights of the present owners or lessees of salt springs. There is no provision in any way regulating the distribution of water, excepting only that furnished by the State, and there is no obligation on the part of the State to furnish any particular quantity. Even as to the distribution of that furnished by the State, the mode or right of priority may be changed as in 1859. Hence, as to that inexhaustible supply, which any person may pump and procure for himself, there is no limitation on its disposition, and any disposition of it the State might see fit to make for its own protection or purposes cannot be objected to by the present lessees. In fact, the undersigned would, as far as possible, consistent with the rights of the present lessees, have the State relieved of all work in procuring or distributing the salt water and restrict its operation to the enforcement of such regulations and restrictions as may be necessary to collect the duty, insure purity of the manufactured article, and guaranty and protect the people in all their proper rights as owners of said salt springs and reservation.

Under such a rule, allowing any citizen to dig and manufacture on the same conditions as any other, the board having charge of these salt springs and reservation could easily see that no one person or monopoly leased or controlled the whole or greater part of said springs.

Fourth. The duty on salt should be increased.

This question, and the next, as to the sale of the springs and reservation, are the ones principally discussed in the reports of the majority and of Mr. Comstock. As to the right of the State to levy a duty there is no dispute. As to the present necessities of the State we all know too well. A large debt presses upon us.

As claimed by the report of the majority, the undersigned cannot see why the State should not derive an income somewhat commensurate with its value from its property, just as any individual does.

But in addition to this, the undersigned would increase the duty in order to thus give some portion of the large profits, now obtained, to the State. If the duty was increased, then the manufacturer must sell the article on which he pays this increased duty for so much more as the increased duty, or he must make and sell it for so much less profit.

But, as has been shown, the present capacity of the springs and of the salt works is much greater than the market, and the only competition is at a distance and mostly outside of the State, and even now about five-sevenths of the entire product is sold in these outside competing markets. If, then, the recommendation of the undersigned that all discrimination in price as against the people of this State should be adopted, the only question is whether salt can be manufactured at such a price, that with this duty added it can be furnished so as to compete in these outside markets. It will be remembered that in all the calculations so far made, as to the cost of salt, both coarse and fine, the undersigned has taken the allowances made by the Onondaga salt company. As has been before stated, the undersigned believes some of these allowances to be liberal if not excessive. In addition to the high rent paid and charged for the use of the property, and the fact that only about one-third of the fine salt blocks are necessary, the undersigned would call attention to others. The allowance of 19 cents for manufacturers of fine salt, over and above rents, the undersigned believes to be too great. As will be seen by table No. 1, at 19 cents an average block, worth $5,000 would, when operated as now (only about 100 days), allow $254.47 for repairs, and $318.09 for superintendence; and if it should be operated 210 days the allowance would be $489.30 for repairs, and $611.52 for superintendence.

The aggregate price of boiling 100 days, at 3 cents per bushel,	$764 31
The aggregate price of boiling 210 days, at 3 cents per bushel,	1,467 90
If the price was 2 cents per bushel, 210 days,	978 60

Which would be about $500 for each boiler, or over $107 each more than they now get for what is made in each block. This, in addition to a large rent and the payment of all taxes, the undersigned submits is quite liberal. As to the allowance of eight cents for manufacture of coarse salt, the undersigned has reason to believe that while it affords a liberal compensation it is probably not too much. The undersigned also regards the charge of ten cents per barrel for taxes and the expenses of the home office as quite large. It will be remembered that all sales are reckoned net at Syracuse, and hence all cost of outside agencies or expenses are deducted. Now ten cents per barrel on the production of 1866 would make the sum of $143,170.10. That so large a sum should be expended in payment of taxes and expenses of the home office, does not seem necessary. Either the salaries of the officers and employees, or the taxes, or both, must be very large to cost that sum.

And yet, with all the allowances and 12½ per cent net on all real estate, useless and idle as well as used, the cost of manufacture of fine salt would be,	$1.815	for coarse	$1.512
If 7 per cent net be allowed on all property, would be,	1.72	" "	1.396
If 10 per cent net be allowed on property needed to manufacture (106 blocks), would be,	1.664

But if there was no monopoly, and the competition between the different owners of the blocks was allowed to operate, then salt could be manufactured at the following rates:

10 per cent on average value of blocks	$500
For repairs	250
	$750

If the blocks operate 210 days at average production of 233 bushels, total production would be 48,930 bushels. Allowing $750 for rent and repairs, it would be .015 per bushel.

Hence the undersigned submits that the following as a fair allowance for the manufacture of salt per barrel:

	Fine salt.	Coarse salt.
Use of real estate,	$0.075	$0 40
Boiling,	0.100
Cost of coal, $5 per ton,	0.675
State duty,	0.050	0 05
Paid for making and repairs, vats and packing,	.....	0 04
Taxes and selling,	0.050	0 05
Packing	0.050
Barrel,	0.450	0 45
Making total cost per barrel,	$1.545	$1 35

If these calculations be correct, then, on the average, salt could be manufactured so as to be sold at $1.50; if you should add two cents duty per bushel, ten cents, it would make the cost $1.60. But the lowest salt has been sold, as reported, was in New York city, and that produced $1.75 to $1.87 net at Syracuse. And as the net avails of other markets is from $1.90 to over $2.00, the undersigned submit that an additional duty of two cents per bushel might be added, and yet allow a good profit, and enable the manufacturers to compete in any market they now occupy, and even go farther. We have already shown the future prospects as to the ability of the manufacturers of Onondaga salt to compete with that manufactured elsewhere, are very favorable.

The undersigned therefore submits, that as a legislative act, it would be proper to add an additional duty of two cents per bushel; yet, as a part of the Constitution, he would say that the duty should not be less than two cents per bushel, leaving the board of commissioners of the canal fund to raise it if proper.

The undersigned is aware that salt is one of the necessities most generally and equally used by people of all classes, and hence, that according to well established rules, other things being equal, a tax in the shape of a duty should not be levied upon it. This position is urged by the report of the minority, Mr. Comstock, with great ability and at length. The undersigned would, however, suggest that the duty on salt is not a tax in shape of a duty. That term is only applied when a government, without in any way producing or adding to the intrinsic value of an article, simply by virtue of its sovereign power, compels the payment of a certain sum as a duty thereupon for the support of government. Such are the impost duties of the general government. But such is not the nature of the duty on salt. It is simply a small and reasonable charge for the use of the property and labor of the State, and the distinction sought to be drawn in the report of Mr. Comstock, between the propriety and justice of payment for the labor of the officials and agents of the State and payment for the use of its property, has no foundation in fact, any more than if it had been the labor and use of property of any individual. The learned quotations and reasonings in regard to a duty, simply as a tax, do not therefore apply.

The fact that about four-sevenths of the salt manufactured is sold out of the State, and that only three-sevenths of the duty is paid by the inhabitants of this State, is only an additional reason. If those who reside out of the State get the advantage of the use of the property of this State, why should they not pay for it?

But it is urged by Mr. Comstock in his minority report that if a higher duty is imposed it will compel the manufacturers to abandon part of the market they now furnish, or they will be compelled to add sufficient to the price of that sold in the home market alone (about three and a half times the increased duty) to reimburse them, and thus a portion only of the State will pay the taxes of the State. The last suggestion, to put it wholly on that sold in the home market, only shows the presumption of the advocates of those who by monopoly are enabled to exercise a power over the people who legally own all and control all. The recommendation that the manufacturers should be prohibited from discriminating in the price against the home market would prevent this. As to their being driven out of any market, that would depend upon how little profits the manufacturers would put up with before they would abandon any market. The undersigned has tried to show that they could make a very liberal profit, and sell in all markets and even more than they do now.

But the difference is that the report of Mr. Comstock claims as a part of the cost the excessive allowances referred to in this report. That among other things, property only one-third which is needed must pay twelve and a half per cent net out of the business.

The fact is palpable that there is far more fine salt blocks than can be used, and hence for this business, according to the ordinary rules of trade they are not worth near their cost. As the undersigned has tried to show through the operations of the Onondaga salt company, this and many other laws of trade have been reversed, and a business a part at least of which if left to the ordinary laws of trade could not be profitable, has been made very profitable mostly out of the pockets of the people of this State, and it is now claimed that the people thus taxed through their agents, this Convention should see to it, that they do nothing to affect these excessive profits or this taxation.

The undersigned knows of no obligation on the part of the State to tax itself, to sustain and make profitable a business not so by natural laws, although, if it fail thus to do, large loss and injury may come upon many of its worthy citizens, and a large and unnatural thriving business be injured thereby.

Nor can any obligation be drawn from the relation between the State as owner of the property, and the manufacturers as lessees. The reason for the depression in the business in 1859, when it was operating under natural laws, was the want of a market, and the increased competition arising from discoveries of salt elsewhere. The State did not guaranty against any discovery of salt at Saginaw or elsewhere. Nor did any obligation arise from want of brine, because at that time owners of salt property could dig their own wells, and the State was under no obligation, legal or equitable, to furnish any more water than was furnished.

There is one other consideration always urged against the increased duty upon salt (referred to in the report of the minority, Mr. Comstock), to which the undersigned begs leave to refer in conclusion on this question. On the supposition that the increase of duty will compel them to abandon part of their market, they allege that the loss to the State in the reduction of tolls on salt, coal, barrels and duty on salt, will be more than the people of this State, within the home market, have been compelled to pay over the cost.

The undersigned has shown that the basis of this position is untrue, that if they are willing to manufacture at a fair profit (and they will be if they cannot get more), all markets now occupied will still be open, and even others.

But admitting the supposition, the conclusion is untrue. The undersigned does not know on what ground such a claim can be made. Except the salt itself, the other articles (coal, barrels, etc.) would be taken elsewhere, and may be farther for other purposes. In addition to this, the advocates for the manufacturers of salt also generally advocate the doctrine that the capacity of the Erie and Oswego canals is about or soon to be reached, and it is submitted that the tolls on salt are not so excessive as to give it a preference over other merchandise. Yet taking the claim as made, let us examine it for a moment. As calculated for the year 1866, it would be:

Net revenues from duty,.....	$31,227 66
Tolls on salt (Maj. Rep., Evid. p. 48),.....	76,653 00
Tolls on coal, .108 (132,508 tons),.....	14,310 32
Tolls on barrels,.....	1,000 00
	$122,190 98
It will not be claimed that over one-half will be lost, which will be,.....	61.095 49
But 960,000 barrels of salt in home market, at $2.35, is,..	$2255,500 00

Digitized by Google

It should cost $1.50,.....	$535,000 00
		297,500 00
Leaving the amount paid by the people over what it is claimed they would lose,.....		$236,404 51

Thus this last claim is not only unfounded, but untrue.

For these reasons the undersigned, therefore, submits that it is just, equitable and right to all parties that the duty on salt should be increased as herein indicated.

Fifth. The salt springs and reservations should not be sold.

In supporting this prohibition, which has always been a part of the Constitution of this State, the undersigned finds himself alone and opposed by all the other members of the committee. Thus alone he feels supported by the uniform action of the people, both in Convention and elsewhere, since the purchase of the springs.

The reasons alleged in the report of the majority for the removal of the constitutional restriction against the sale of the salt springs and reservation are:

1. That the necessity (the want of private capital) which originally required the State to purchase them and aid the manufacturers does not now exist.

2. That new salt formations and springs have been discovered, so that salt is no longer a monopoly, and if tolls and customs were reduced then foreign salt could be furnished to compete.

3. That the manufacturers have now obtained as much control as if they owned them, and the interest on purchase price, if sold, would be much more than present income. Let us consider these reasons.

As to the first, that the object for which the State bought and held this reservation has ceased. The undersigned believes this has not been the only object. The desire to aid in procuring cheap salt was also one of the main objects. But whether that has heretofore been the main object or not, the undersigned claims that it should hereafter be. The people, through its Legislature, have too often allowed their attention to be drawn off from the excessive prices paid in the home market by strong appeals in favor of the increase in the manufacture and consequent increase of duty.

Thus the hope of increasing the production from two to three millions of bushels and thus to add, in the shape of duty, the gross sum of from $20,000 to $30,000 to the revenues of the State, has been the blind behind which the manufacturers have been enabled to extort from the people of that partion of the State where they control the price, the aggregate sum of from $150,000 to $200,000 more than the same quantity netted them sold in other markets.

As to the second reason, that recent discoveries of salt have made it so plentiful that it has ceased to be a monopoly, the undersigned would submit that, except as to foreign salt, the whole history of the salt manufacture in this State and at Saginaw, and all other places denies this supposition. On the contrary, for reasons heretofore stated, the manufacturers of Onondaga salt have not only had a monopoly in the home market, but have also competed with all other salt in their home markets at a fair profit, as they allow, and at a very large profit as the undersigned claims. If, then, Onondaga salt can be made so as to compete with that of other markets so far distant, it can hardly be said that salt of these markets would compete with it in its own home market. The greater bulk and weight and consequent cost of freight, taken in connection with the course of trade from west to east, would and always will entirely forbid this.

But it is alleged that if the customs and canal tolls on foreign salt were reduced to correspond with tolls on other articles of prime necessity, foreign salt from various localities could be sold to the people of Syracuse, "at their own doors cheaper than they now sell their own production." The customs or duties levied by the general government on foreign salt are quite heavy (24 cents per 100 lbs if in sacks or bags, and 18 cents per 100 lbs if in bulk) but on examination the undersigned cannot discover that they are any higher than are levied on the average of articles of prime necessity, and the necessities of the general government will hardly warrant any expectation of any great reduction in duties for several years to come.

Even if it were as alleged, as this State or Convention has no control over those duties, and as the interests of all States should be consulted with regard to these reductions, it would hardly be wise to look for relief from that source. As to canal tolls, the excess of tolls on foreign salt over those on domestic salt from Albany or New York to Syracuse is only five cents per barrel. This deduction would hardly add much to the opportunity for competition.

But when we remember the facts as established, that the salt company (manufacturing salt at the cost and making the dividends as has been stated), in the year 1866, sold in the New York market, in direct competition with foreign salt, nearly 150,000 barrels, and that it cost over fifty cents per barrel to transport and sell the same, the undersigned submits that no change in canal tolls (which is all the State has control of) will afford any relief by way of competition with foreign salt.

Hence the undersigned submits that any person or corporation that may control the Onondaga salt springs can hereafter, as now, always maintain a monopoly in what is called the home market, and dictate the price of this prime necessity to the greater portion of the people of this State, according to their greed for gain, and without reference to cost.

The third reason given for the sale, in the report of the majority, is too true in fact, but the undersigned submits that it is a reason against, rather than for the sale. The Onondaga salt company has, in fact controlled, as though it were owner in fee. But, behind all, was the undoubted power and control of the State, which, although it had been lulled to sleep, yet was well known to the manufacturers to exist, and subject to be called into exercise at any time.

How much the knowledge of this dormant power has prevented the manufacturers from making further demands upon the people of the

Digitized by Google

State, in the shape of even higher prices, the undersigned can only conjecture. There is, however, one fact that may throw some light on this subject.

In the year 1862, when, on account of the peculiar and critical condition of our national affairs, the market for salt became such that the Onondaga salt company could dictate almost any price, and did ask and receive $3.25 per barrel, making such profits as to divide $380,000 on a capital of $160,000, it suffered such a rebate on the price of salt sold to the people of this State as to amount to $150,000, which otherwise might have been added to their already large profits. The United States, either directly or indirectly, was compelled to pay a considerable portion of the thus increased cost in the purchase of supplies for its army and navy. Yet, under all these circumstances, the Onondaga salt company did not fail to take advantage of circumstances, and did not allow any consideration of the needs or critical situation of our general government to effect as against its pecuniary interest and profits. If such considerations have no weight, the undersigned submits that it would not be improper to suppose that the only or main consideration which operated to produce this rebate in favor of the people of the State was, that the State owned and could control every thing connected with the salt springs and the manufacture of salt therefrom. In support of this position, the undersigned begs leave to state that he understood the officers of this corporation to admit that in making such rebate, they were not forgetful of its probable influence on what they were pleased to term unfavorable legislation. Again, it is to be inferred from the report of the majority, that all the salt manufacturers are opposed to the sale of the salt springs and reservation.

The undersigned does not understand this to be the fact. On the contrary, the undersigned is informed that the fine salt manufacturers are generally in favor of retaining the prohibition of sale, while the coarse salt manufacturers generally favor the removal of the prohibition, and the sale which they expect may be brought about if not prohibited. The reasons alleged are that the coarse salt manufacturers own more than one-half of the stock, and hence control the salt company. That the salt company, with its already accumulated capital and surplus of about one million of dollars, is the most probable purchaser if a sale should be made, and if thus made the coarse salt manufacturers would have the power to discriminate against the owners of fine salt property. The owners of fine salt property are not inclined to trust to their disposition after they acquire the power. As the interests of the State are much greater than those of the fine salt manufacturers, it hardly seems improper that the true friends of the State should have a feeling like the fine salt manufacturers.

Nor does the undersigned believe this distrust unfounded. On the contrary, he believes it to be well founded, and that if a sale of the salt springs and reservation were made, it is not only probable, but scarcely to be doubted that the Onondaga salt company would become the purchaser. Even if some other person or corporation should become the purchaser it is submitted that the opportunity arising from natural causes, and those beyond the control of this State for the formation and continuance of a profitable monopoly are so great that such opportunity would not be neglected. In such case, the only limit in price of salt sold to the people of this State, within what is called the home market, would be the greed of the seller with little regard to the cost of production. This, we submit, is borne out by the history of the last seven years. The undersigned, therefore, confidently submits that the sale of the salt springs would be a most suicidal policy on the part of the State. Whatever increased revenue was thus obtained would be far more than equaled by the increased price of salt that the people of the State would be compelled to pay.

By a sale, the monopoly would become a fixed fact forever. In order to avoid a temporary evil entirely under control, the remedy proposed by the majority would render it permanent and entirely beyond control. The undersigned has suggested these remedies for the consideration of the Convention, but whether on examination any of them shall be deemed wise or unwise the undersigned submits that it would be clearly unwise for this State to part with a power the shadow of which has already saved $150,000, and to hand over the greater portion of the people of this State, dependent entirely upon some uncontroled monopoly for one of the pure necessities of life, at least as far as the price they must pay is concerned. Hence the undersigned submits that to avoid all doubt as to such a result, the prohibition of sale so long and so wisely continued, as a part of the Constitution of this State, should not now be stricken out

The undersigned submits the following as a proposed section:

SEC. —. The salt springs belonging to this State shall never be sold; but the exclusive control of the same shall be vested in the commissioners of the canal fund. The lands contiguous thereto and property appurtenant shall also be under the exclusive control of the commissioners of the canal fund, to be sold, leased, managed and controlled by it, subject to the following conditions:

1. No person, corporation or association manufacturing salt therefrom shall discriminate in price on the sale thereof to the people of this State or any portion thereof.

2. No person, corporation or association shall either directly or indirectly control more than one-third of salt manufactured or brine taken therefrom, and that all citizens of this State shall be at liberty to go upon, dig for, and manufacture salt on the same conditions, subject to the legal rights of the present lessees.

3. The duty on salt shall not be less than two cents per bushel or its equivalent.

ANGUS McDONALD.

The report was referred to the Committee of the Whole and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALVORD—The Committee on Revision has instructed its chairman to ask of the Convention the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That, under the supervision of its

Digitized by Google

chairman, the revised work of the Committee on Revision shall be from time to time printed, so that when such work shall be completed the report of said committee may be made to the Convention in a printed form ready for its consideration.

The question was put on the adoption of the resolution, and it was declared carried.

Mr. SEAVER presented the following report from the Committee on Printing:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution:

Resolved, That five hundred extra copies of the report of the select Committee on Bribery and Corruption be printed for the use of the Convention—

Beg leave to report, that the expenses already incurred have been much larger than were anticipated, both for printing documents and the publishing of verbatim reports of debates, etc., in consequence of the prolonged session of this Convention; that the usual number of copies of the report referred to has been printed for the use of the Convention; the matter has also been published in the two newspapers designated to print the verbatim report of the debates and proceedings of this body, for which the Legislature will no doubt provide payment; and thus all needful publicity has been given to it. Your committee, therefore, recommend the rejection of the said resolution.

J. J. SEAVER,
Chairman.
J. M. FRANCIS,
W. H. MERRILL,
A. POTTER.

Mr. OPDYKE—The committee have no desire to get an additional number of the report printed, because it will increase our expenses. But I have ascertained that a large number of the members have not this report on their files of documents, and as there are very few left I suppose it would be proper to provide each member with a copy for his use when the subject comes up for consideration.

Mr. SEAVER—With that explanation from the chairman of the Committee on Corruption [Mr. Opdyke], I would suggest and move that one hundred and fifty extra copies be printed, in order to supply the files.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I believe that we have not printed extra copies of most of the reports of the committees of this Convention, and I do not see any reason why we should depart from the ordinary course in this case. It is true that it is a subject in which the people of the State are very much interested, and it may be deemed disrespectful to the Convention to bring that subject up. I know it was considered so yesterday, and for that reason I do not see that the printing of an additional number is at all necessary. I do not believe that any thing this Convention has done will tend to frighten away those useful members of our system of legislation that ordinarily visit the capital. And I do not believe it is necessary that this report should be printed and published to assure them that they shall not be molested during the coming winter in the ordinary patriotic work in which they are engaged. The only possible advantage, it seems to me, from publishing the report broadcast is, to show that no action need be expected on the part of this Convention, designed to shut off the patriotic action of the lobby. And as that is not necessary, I, for one, am opposed to incurring this additional expense.

Mr. SEAVER—I will only say that the fact exists that the files are not all supplied, for some reason or other, with this document; and it is only the necessity of completing the files that induces me to move this extra number.

The question was put on the adoption of the report of the committee, as amended by its chairman, and it was declared carried.

Mr. MERRITT—I have been informed by the chairman of the committee raised at the time this special order, in reference to the meetings of the Convention, elsewhere than in the Capitol, was fixed, that they will not be able to report to-day, and therefore, out of deference to that committee, I move that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Merritt to postpone, and it was declared carried.

Mr. ARCHER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Comptroller be requested to pay from the contingent fund of the Convention, for fifty copies of the Manual, or such number, not exceeding fifty, as the clerk of this Convention shall certify to have been furnished the Constitutional Conventions in other States and the compiler of the Manual.

Which was referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. ARCHER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the printer to the Convention is hereby directed to bind the debates of this Contion in such sized volumes as the Secretary shall designate.

Which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MAGEE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the amendment offered by Mr. Magee to section 15 of the report of the Committee on Finance, relating to taxation, be referred to the Committee on Revision, with power, etc.

Mr. MAGEE—I would not now, if I were permitted, occupy the time of this Convention by submitting the remarks which I desire to submit in support of the amendment which I have offered. I will waive that until a future, perhaps more propitious occasion than the present one.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Before this is referred to the Committee on Revision with power, I hope it will be before the Convention, and I ask that the amendment referred to by the gentleman [Mr. Magee] may be read.

The amendment was accordingly read by the SECRETARY.

The question was put on the motion to refer, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 41 to 52.

Mr. FOLGER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That debate in the Convention upon the report of the Committee on Judiciary, be limited to ten minutes to each speaker upon each proposition, and that no one member speak more than once on any proposition.

Digitized by Google

The question being put on the adoption of the resolution, it was declared carried.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary as amended in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FOLGER—I understand that the report is not yet printed, but it will be here by twelve o'clock. I move a postponement of the report until twelve o'clock, or until the document arrives.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I suggest to the mover that he allow us to take up the report of the Judiciary Committee where it was left off last night in Committee of the Whole and read it through. That part of the report has not been acted upon in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT—If there be no objection that order will be made.

The SECRETARY read the following section:

SEC. 22. The electors of the several towns shall, at their annual town meeting, and in such manner as the Legislature may direct, elect justices of the peace, whose term of office shall be four years. In case of an election to fill a vacancy, occurring before the expiration of a full term, they shall hold for the residue of the unexpired term. Their number and classification may be regulated by law. Justices of the peace and judges or justices of inferior courts, not of record, and their clerks, may be removed after due notice, and an opportunity of being heard in their defense by such county, city or State courts, as may be prescribed by law for causes to be assigned in the order of removal.

Mr. COOKE—I offer the substitute that I offered last night in Committee of the Whole.

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

Justices' courts of inferior jurisdiction, shall be established by law. Such courts shall have civil jurisdiction in actions for the recovery of money only, or for the recovery of specific personal property when the damages or the value of the property claimed shall not exceed fifty dollars. The justices chosen to hold such courts shall have such criminal jurisdiction as has heretofore been possessed by justices of the peace.

Mr. BICKFORD—I wish to make an inquiry as to what would be the effect of the construction now to be had under this section. Will it be final, or will the section be subject to a further review in the Committee on Revision?

The PRESIDENT—There will not be another review unless it is specially ordered.

Mr. BICKFORD—I simply wish to say with reference to this amendment moved by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke], that I think it had better not be adopted; I think this section had better remain as it is at present. I do not know that there is any desire on the part of the people for any change in relation to justices of the peace as they now exist, and as their courts are now organized.

The question was put on the adoption of the substitute offered by Mr. Cooke, and it was declared lost.

There being no further amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read section 23 as follows:

SEC. 23. All judicial officers of cities and villages, and all such judicial officers as may be created therein by law, shall be elected or appointed at such times, and in such manner, as the Legislature may direct, except as herein otherwise provided.

There being no amendment offered to this section the SECRETARY read section 24 as follows:

SEC. 24. Clerks of the several counties of this State shall be clerks of the supreme court, with such powers and duties as shall be prescribed by law. The clerk of the court of appeals shall keep his office at the seat of government. His compensation shall be fixed by law and paid out of the public treasury.

Mr. BICKFORD—Will it not be necessary also to declare that the clerks of the counties shall also be clerks of the county courts? I move to amend by adding after the words "supreme court," in the second line, "and of the county courts of their respective counties."

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Bickford, and it was declared lost.

There being no further amendment offered, the SECRETARY read section 25, as follows:

SEC. 25. No judicial officer, except justices of the peace, shall receive to his own use any fees or perquisites of office; nor shall any judicial officer in the State, except a county judge, or surrogate, or special county judge or surrogate, or justice of the peace, or police justice; nor shall any judicial officer in the city of New York or in the city of Brooklyn, practice as an attorney and counselor at law in any court of record in this State, or act as referee.

Mr. MERWIN—It seems to me that the section as it now stands is too general in its character, and that the exception will not include all the judicial officers desired to be excepted. I think the object could be attained by an amendment in this way: Strike out all after the word "shall," in line three, down to and including the word "justices," in the fifth line, and insert "any judge of the court of appeals or of the supreme court," so that the section will read, "nor shall any judge of the court of appeals or of the supreme court, nor shall any judicial officer in the city of New York," etc.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Merwin, and it was declared carried.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I propose an amendment which I suppose may be made by the Committee of Revision, but I think it would make this proposition much clearer; to put first the prohibition in regard to judicial officers in the city of New York or the city of Brooklyn, and to put the other clause afterward, so that it would read in this way; "No judicial officer in the city of New York or in the city of Brooklyn, and no judicial officer in the rest of the State, except justices of the peace, shall receive to his own use," etc. The awkwardness of the punctuation there makes some little difficulty in regard to the application of the last phrase, "practice as an attorney or counselor at law," in reference to both sections of this amendment. I offer the amendment that I have suggested, unless some reason is shown why the change should not be made.

Digitized by Google

Mr. FOLGER—I do not see any necessity of that change. The section embraces two prohibitions, one against receiving fees and perquisites, and the other against practicing as attorneys and counselors. Now, the first proposition is general, that no one except justices of the peace shall receive to his own use any fees or perquisites of office. That is a single proposition which it seems to me is conveyed to the mind definitely by the language used. Then the section goes on to say, "nor shall any judicial officer in the city of New York or in the city of Brooklyn practice as an attorney or counselor at law, in any court of record in this State, or act as referee;" and that provision also seems to be quite definite and unmistakable.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I was wrong in stating the place where I should move to insert it. What I wish to do is, to make it read so that the prohibition in regard to local judicial officers in the city of New York and the city of Brooklyn shall be first, and the general prohibition in regard to judicial officers in the rest of the State, second.

Mr. FOLGER—As a mere matter of taste, I have no objection to the change.

Mr. ROBERTSON—It seems to me that the change would make the meaning clearer, but I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MURPHY—I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee why this discrimination is made against the cities of New York and Brooklyn? For one, I am opposed to having a constitutional provision applied to one part of the State and not to another part of the State. If this rule is good with regard to the city of New York and the city of Brooklyn, it is also good with regard to the country.

Mr. FOLGER—If the gentleman will look at the section carefully, he will see that the discrimination is not so great as he supposes. Every judicial officer in the city of New York or in the city of Brooklyn is prohibited from practicing as attorney or acting as a referee. Every judicial officer in the country is under the same prohibition, except the county judge and surrogate or the police justice. Now, the reason for this exception is, that if, in the country, you should prohibit a county judge from acting as a counselor at law, you would never get a county judge from the legal profession; but in the cities of New York and Brooklyn a man who holds the position of judge or of surrogate has as much as he wants to do or as he ought to do, because the business of those cities is amply sufficient to occupy the attention and abilities of any man, and the emoluments of each of these offices are also ample. But it is not so in the country, and you would not be able to get a fit man for judge at all if you extended this prohibition to those officers in the country. The exception is not made in a spirit of invidious local discrimination, but only to meet the circumstances of the case.

Mr. MURPHY—The statement of the chairman of the committee [Mr. Folger], in regard to the difficulty of getting gentlemen to act as county judges in the country, under such circumstances, may be true, but I do not see that the reason that he gives for prohibiting these officers in New York and Brooklyn from practicing as counselors or as referees has any force whatever. As I understand the gentleman, the reason he gives is that in those cities these officers will have too much to do to be able to practice as attorneys or counselors. Now, that is a private, personal consideration, and one which, it seems to me, should not now be regarded in the framing of a Constitution.

Mr. FOLGER—One word further. The object of the committee was to reach what I think the profession throughout the State will regard as an evil—the practice of judicial officers acting as referees by order out of their own courts, or practicing in other courts whereby there may be created a reflex influence from one bench to another. The standing committee sought to avoid that, and sought to avoid it by adopting general terms which would cover the whole State. But then the query came up, "if you adopt these general terms, and cut off all judicial officers from acting as counselors or referees, do you not deprive the bench of the surrogate's court, and of the county courts in the rural districts, of the services of competent men?" For a good lawyer will not take a position which will disqualify him for practice when the position itself is of small emolument. And it was decided that that was so, and that no man would take the office of surrogate or county judge in the country if he were thereby prohibited from practicing as attorney or acting as a referee. So we went as far as we safely could, and stopped just short of what we regarded as the greater evil.

Mr. MURPHY—I now move to strike out, commencing with the word "law," down to and including the end of the section. I do so for the reason that I have already given. I am opposed to this discrimination between the city and the country. Here is an evil which the gentleman [Mr. Folger] says ought not to be permitted. But he says that if the prohibition be made general a greater evil will arise, viz.: that you cannot get gentlemen to act as county judges in the country, though in the cities you may. Now, sir, there has always been a reason given for thus discriminating between the city of New York and the country; but such discriminations have brought upon us untold evils. If it is an evil in principle to permit these officers to act as referees or counselors at law, the prohibition should be applied equally to the whole State, and no mere matters of personal convenience or practical convenience should be allowed to interfere in the adoption of a provision so important. I shall therefore insist upon a vote upon this amendment.

Mr. VAN COTT—I would have been glad if my colleague [Mr. Murphy] had told us whether he thought there was a good reason in principle for prohibiting judges of the supreme court of the city of New York from practicing as counselors at law, or as referees; because if there is a principle for such prohibition, he ought not to have moved the amendment that he has offered here, but his amendment should have been to include the country officers within the prohibition, and not to exclude those of the city. Now, sir, within my own personal experience there have been very great abuses from allowing judges of the courts to act as counselors at law. I would mention a very gross case where a judge having a question of law under consideration, on a motion for a new trial, was retained by one, the counsel of one of the parties in another case of the same character and on the same side, so that his interests were at once involved with the interests of that particular side of the case, and the effect of it was palpable in the decision that he rendered on the motion for a new trial. I mention this merely as a single case, and such cases are of frequent occurrence. It is a common thing in the country for judges not to have time to try their cases at circuit or at special term, but to have time to try some of the same cases as referees, which I think is a very great abuse, and tends to the degradation of the judiciary in the judgment of all reflecting men. Now, sir, I think the principle of exclusion right, and I also think this discrimination is right, because the cases tried in the county courts and in the surrogates' courts in the country are so infrequent and of such a character that this complication of the interests of the judge with the interests of the case is not apt to occur. And there is a reason for the discrimination in this, that a judge in the city with a large amount of business to transact, and a large salary, has not the same justification for turning from the performance of his public duties to the dispatch of private business, as a judge in the country has. A county judge in some counties takes a salary, from two hundred and fifty to a thousand dollars a year, and performs the duties of his office for the accommodation of the bar and of the people, and because he receives a mere pittance for the performance of his public duties, he ought not to be excluded from practicing his profession. If he were so excluded, as has been said here, it would be almost impossible to get a good lawyer to take the place of a county judge, or of a surrogate in the country. Now, I am not alarmed at discriminations where reasons for them exist. It would really be inconsistent, and a more marked discrimination, to apply the same rule to different circumstances. We are entirely consistent when we say that one set of circumstances in the city requires one rule, and that another set of circumstances in the country requires another rule—in each case adapting the rule to the peculiar circumstances; and this mere general technical idea, that you must have a uniform law applying throughout the State under all circumstances, however different, has, I think, already been pressed quite beyond its legitimate application, on various occasions in this Convention.

Mr. GRAVES—Is an amendment now in order?

The PRESIDENT—An amendment will be received.

Mr. GRAVES—I move to strike out after the word "officer," in the fifth line, these words, "In the city of New York, or in the city of Brooklyn," and to insert, "except county judge and surrogate;" so that it will read, "Nor shall any judicial officer except a county judge and surrogate practice as an attorney or counselor at law in any court of record in this State, or act as referee."

Mr. FOLGER—The gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] moved to strike out the same words which the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] moves to strike out.

Mr. GRAVES—I would include in my amendment justices of the peace.

The PRESIDENT—The proposition of the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] differs from the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] in that respect.

Mr. EVARTS—The amendment of the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves], as now made, to exclude justices of the peace, is certainly equivalent to the amendment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy]. The gentleman from Kings moves to strike out that portion of the section which makes a distinction between the provision for the cities of New York and Brooklyn and the provision for the rest of the State. The gentleman from Herkimer moves to insert in the inhibitions in the city of New York and the city of Brooklyn the same exceptions that are proposed in the inhibitions against officers in the rest of the State. Certainly the amendments are substantially the same. Now, in regard to the amendment itself. The result of the labors of the committee and of the Convention, if the amendment of the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] shall prevail, will be to put into the Constitution a license to the surrogate of the city of New York and the surrogate and the county judge of the county of Kings to practice law and act as referees. Better take the amendment in the shape that the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] proposes it, and have no discrimination in terms or in form.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] allow me to inform him that the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] is to strike out the whole of the remainder of the section from the point at which he takes it up, and not merely to strike out the words specially relating to New York. His amendment would allow even the judges of the supreme court to practice law.

Mr. EVARTS—I do not so understand it.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—It is so. I am satisfied that I understand it correctly.

The PRESIDENT—Will the gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves] please restate his amendment?

Mr. GRAVES—It is to amend so that it will read, "Nor shall any judicial officer except the county judge or surrogate, or justice of the peace practice as an attorney or counselor at law in any court of record in this State, or act as referee."

Mr. EVARTS—That is a difference between police justices in the State and police justices in the city; that is all. Now, as has been stated by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the ground of discrimination is simply this: not that we make distinctions between the rest of the State and the crowded populations of Brooklyn and New York, but that we recognize distinctions that have been made by the arrangements of population. As a matter of principle we would gladly exclude from acting as referees or practicing as attorneys or counselors at law, all persons holding judicial offices in any part of the State, and that is the precise provision of this section; and in regard to the cities of New York and Brooklyn, we see no reason why the exclusion should not be general, because the judicial officers for those large populations have both business enough to occupy their whole time, and salary enough to compensate them. In looking through the State, however, we find certain inferior local judicial officers who, it is well understood, do not have enough of judicial business to occupy any very large part of their time, and yet they are necessary officers in their respective localities. The small amount of business devolving upon these inferior judicial officers in the country, leads to their small compensation, which is really compensation for but a small portion of their time, and we see, therefore, that we must adopt either a rule that will exclude from such public offices persons of the learning, experience and faculty required to discharge the duties of their offices properly, or else we must allow these gentlemen to exercise their professional faculties outside of their official spheres. In this provision we simply recognize the differences that are made by differences in population, and we have formed our exceptions to the general object we have in view, according to the different circumstances of different populations and localities.

Mr. MURPHY—I find that the amendment which I offered does not exactly accomplish the object I had in view, and therefore I will amend it. My amendment is to strike out the words, "any judicial officer in the city of New York or in the city of Brooklyn," so that the section will read: "Nor shall any judicial officer in the State practice as an attorney or counselor at law in any court of record in this State, or act as referee."

Mr. SPENCER—I offer the following amendment: After the word "State," in the third line, insert the words "specified in this article," so that the provision will read: "No judicial officer except justices of the peace shall receive to his own use any fees or perquisites of office, nor shall any judicial officer in the State specified in this article," etc. My object in offering this amendment is to provide for a possible case where the Legislature may authorize some other judicial officer, having inferior jurisdiction, to those here specified in this article. I do this for the reason that a difficulty has arisen under the present Constitution in regard to such officers. An attempt has been made in two or three instances to establish police justices in villages with civil jurisdiction, and the attempt has been resisted upon the ground that the power was conferred upon the Legislature to create courts of inferior jurisdiction to the implied exclusion of the powers to create such courts elsewhere. Under the provision which is embraced in the twenty-third section of this article, all judicial officers of cities and villages, and all such judicial officers as may be created therein by law shall be elected at such times and in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe. It was held that this section was opposed to such exclusion; and that the Legislature consequently had the power to create these courts of inferior jurisdiction, and under the article now under consideration such courts undoubtedly may be created. By confining the provision to the officers specified, any difficulty on this ground may be obviated.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Spencer, and it was declared lost.

Mr. MURPHY—I propose a further amendment in the third line, to strike out the words "in the State," and to strike out from and including the word "nor," in the fifth line, to and including the word "Brooklyn," in the sixth line, these two amendments to go together as one. The effect of that will be to allow county judges and surrogates in all parts of the State to practice as counselors at law, giving those officers in New York and Brooklyn the same right as in all other parts of the State.

Mr. MERWIN—I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] that the words "in the State" have already been stricken out, and the section as it now stands reads "nor shall any judge of the court of appeals, or of the supreme court, or any judicial officer," etc.

Mr. MURPHY—When was that stricken out?

Mr. FOLGER—It was stricken out on the motion of the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Merwin], on his amendment to the gentleman's [Mr. Murphy's] amendment.

Mr. MURPHY—My desire is that we should be consistent, and make this provision generally applicable, but I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I wish to offer a further amendment to this section. The article in the Constitution of 1846 relating to the administration of justice has not been included in the article reported by the committee. It was the tenth section of the Constitution of 1846, as follows: "The testimony in equity cases shall be taken in like manner as in cases at law."

Mr. FOLGER—I would suggest to the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] that that would come in under general amendments, and more appropriately as a section by itself. I do not believe there would be any objection to inserting it as a separate section.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I will leave it, then, till it can be moved under that head.

A DELEGATE—I would like to hear the section read as amended.

The SECRETARY read the section as amended as follows:

"No judicial officer, except justices of the peace, shall receive for his own use any fees or perquisites of office, nor shall any judge of the court of appeals or of the supreme court, nor shall any judicial officer in the city of New York or in the city of Brooklyn, practice as an attorney or counselor in any court of record in this State or act as referee."

Mr. E. A. BROWN—If I understand the section as it has been amended, it leaves the judges of the superior court at Buffalo the liberty to practice law. There is nothing to prohibit judges of that court from practicing as attorneys or counselors, and I move to amend so as to make the prohibition applicable to them.

Mr. EVARTS—If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to make a suggestion. Gentlemen will see, as the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown] has suggested, in regard to the superior court of Buffalo, that the judges of the court of common pleas in the city of New York are left at liberty to practice law.

Mr. FOLGER—Oh, no; they are excluded by the sixth line.

Mr. DALY—If the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] will allow me to make a statement, I will say that the judges of the superior court in the city of New York and of the court of common pleas are prohibited by the judiciary act of 1846 from practicing as lawyers.

Mr. EVARTS—That is very proper; but this is a constitutional provision that we are now speaking of.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Merwin] was adopted. That will remedy the difficulty.

The PRESIDENT—That motion can only be now considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. MERWIN—I object.

Mr. MURPHY—I would like to inquire why were not the judges of the superior court of Buffalo also included in this provision?

Mr. FOLGER—I would inform the gentleman that they are excluded from practicing by the provision beginning on the second line, "nor shall any judicial officer in the State," etc. Putting it in that form left the section comprehensive, including every thing that was not specially excepted. The amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Merwin] to strike out the words he suggested deranged that plan.

Mr. VAN COTT—I move to insert in the sixth line, after the word "Brooklyn," the words "or in the city of Buffalo."

Mr. FULLER—I hardly think that that amendment is necessary. The superior court of the city of Buffalo is of the same character as a county court. The judges have not as much business as will fully occupy their time, and it has been the practice to refer causes to them from the supreme court, and they act very frequently as referees in Buffalo. It is a great convenience to the people and to the bar.

Mr. BARKER—I hope the prohibition will not be extended to the judges of the superior court of Buffalo. Those judges are on a small salary, and they do a great deal of referee business in a manner generally acceptable to the people of the western part of the State. They often go beyond their own counties to act as referees, and I hope that this restriction will not be applied to them.

Mr. EVARTS—I cannot think that there is any soundness in the reasons given for permitting the judges of the superior court of Buffalo to act as referees. If there be any merit in the proposition that any of these judges should be prohibited from practicing law or acting as referees, it is equally applicable to the judges of the city of Buffalo as to the judges of the city of New York. I think that here the principle of uniformity entirely applies. If you need a local court in Buffalo to be fixed in the Constitution, then that court is important enough to take the services of the judges named for it, and we should not allow them to mix their interests with the business of referees or the practice of the law.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I think that the reasoning of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] may, very possibly, not apply with full force to this case. We have, in the Constitution created a county judge for the county of Erie, and have left the county judge of that entire county, including the city of Buffalo, at liberty to practice law. Why then, should not the judges of only local jurisdiction in that city be allowed to practice law, and especially why should they not be permitted to act as referees if their business, as is alleged by gentlemen, better acquainted with the facts than I am, is of moderate extent. It appears that these judges acting as referees afford great accommodation to suitors in that city, and it seems to me that unless their duties are so great as to exclude them from the transaction of other business, there is no principle involved here which should prohibit them from doing what the county judge of the county of Erie may do.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Van Cott, and it was declared carried.

Mr. MURPHY—I think there are other localities in the State that ought to have the benefit of this provision. I suppose that in the county of Monroe, in the city of Rochester, there is quite as much business as the judges of the court can perform, enough to occupy all their time. I think also that this is probably the case with the city of Albany. I am now on a matter of principle. This general reservation of the rest of the State except the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and now the city of Buffalo, seems to me improper. I would suggest that we make a general exception of the judges in all those counties where there are incorporated cities.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Murphy, and it was declared lost.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott], including the city of Buffalo, was carried.

A DELEGATE—I object.

The PRESIDENT—Objection being made, the motion to reconsider lies on the table under the rule.

There being no further amendment offered to the twenty-fifth section the SECRETARY read section 26 as follows:

SEC. 26. The Legislature may authorize the judgments, decrees and decisions of any local inferior court of record, of original civil jurisdiction, established in a city, to be removed for review, directly into the court of appeals.

There being no amendment offered to the twenty-sixth section the SECRETARY read section 27 as follows:

SEC. 27. The Legislature shall provide for the speedy publication of all statute laws, and of such judicial decisions, as it may deem expedient. And all laws and judicial decisions shall be free for publication by any person.

Mr. BALLARD—I move to amend this section by inserting after the word "expedient" in the third line, the words "and also the appointment of a reporter of the supreme court." It is obvious to every member of the bar in this body, that there needs to be some improvement in the character of the reports of the supreme court. They are now under the proper control of the court itself. The reports are published indiscriminately. Members of the bar send decisions to the reporter to be reported, and they are reported without the knowledge of the court until they appear in print. Now, my proposition is, that, the Legislature shall provide by law for the appointment of a reporter. It will be remembered that one of the standing rules of the supreme court now is, that the judges shall meet every two years and revise the rules, and the Legislature may clothe them with power to appoint the reporter at this meeting, or may make such other provisions as they think the case requires; but it does seem to me that there should be some discrimination exercised in regard to the appointment of the reporter, so as to avoid the multiplication of reports, many of them unreliable, that we now have. I will not enlarge upon this matter because this view must be obvious to every one. I would add that, in the third section, we have provided for the appointment of a reporter by the court of appeals. They appoint their own reporter, but I think it would be better to allow the Legislature to provide for the appointment of a reporter for the supreme court, because there are several parts of the supreme court.

Mr. HALE—I move to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Cortland [Mr. Ballard] by inserting after the word "appointment," in his amendment, the words "by the court or the justice thereof, designated to hold general terms." My object in this amendment is that, if it is thought best that the reporter of the decisions of the supreme court shall be appointed, it shall be incumbent upon the Legislature, in providing for that, to have some person designated who will be approved of by the court; and it seems to me that, with such a qualification, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Cortland [Mr. Ballard] may be of great value to the provision in guarding against the reporting of all the decisions of the supreme court, and giving us only a selection of the cases decided.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair does not think the amendment of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] germane to the proposition of the gentleman from Cortland [Mr. Ballard].

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Ballard, and it was declared adopted.

Mr. SPENCER—I move to strike out of the second and third lines these words, "and of such judicial decisions as it may deem expedient." I cannot see any necessity for imposing an injunction upon the Legislature to cause the publication of the judicial decisions of this State. There has been complaint here that the decisions published were altogether too numerous, and too bulky, and certainly our experience is, that they will come thick and fast enough without any such constitutional injunction as this.

Mr. HALE—I now move the amendment which I moved as an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Cortland [Mr. Ballard], to insert after the word "appointment," in his amendment as adopted, the words, "by the justices of the supreme court designated to hold general terms."

Mr. BALLARD—I do not disagree with the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] in regard to the propriety of the appointment of the supreme court reporter, but it seems to me that, it is better to leave it with the Legislature, and let a proper law be passed designating by whom the reporter shall be appointed. The judges of that court have a rule to meet every two years for the revision of the rules. But there has not been a meeting of the supreme court judges for several years, and, inasmuch as that meeting has been neglected, it may be deemed wise to have the reporter appointed by some State officer, or by the Governor and some State officer. But, at all events, my view is that it should be left with the Legislature, rather than tied up in the Constitution.

Mr. HALE—The reason I offer this amendment is that we have had some experience of the practical working of appointments by the Legislature. The Legislature provide without any restrictions for the appointment of a reporter. They have had that power heretofore, in regard to the appointment of the reporter of the court of appeals, and the consequence has been that, in some instances, reporters have been appointed who were not satisfactory to the judges of the court of appeals, and some dissatisfaction has been felt in the profession at some of the appointments made. I submit it is better that the judges themselves should have the appointment, and the only way to secure that is to put into the Constitution, that in making the provision for the appointment of the reporters of the supreme court, the Legislature shall provide that they shall be appointed by the judges.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Hale, and it was declared carried.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I offer the following amendment: After the word "publication," in the second line, insert the words "in a weekly State paper, a file of which shall be furnished to each school district library." My honored colleague from Richmond, and also my respected friend from Erie who is now absent, both objected to such publication on the ground of expense. Now, I suppose these weekly papers could be had at the rate of a dollar a copy per year; that would be a cost of some fifteen thousand dollars to the State; but what would that sum be compared with the good that might be effected by carrying to the knowledge of every citizen the daily transactions, or at least the weekly transactions, of their representatives here? How is it possible for our people to have any knowledge of what is going on in the Legislature without some such provision? Take, for instance, the law in reference to working upon roads, the law in reference to animals found astray, and other laws of that character which are of direct interest to the people in the country. I believe I am not exaggerating the fact when I say that one or the other of these laws is sometimes tinkered as often as four times in one session, and how are we to know what the laws are unless they are published? What has a greater tendency to foster disrespect for all laws than to neglect to bring them to the knowledge of the people? I believe, sir, that one of the most wholesome provisions we could enact would be a provision for the prompt publication of the laws.

Digitized by Google

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. S. Townsend, and it was declared lost.

There being no further amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read section 28 as follows:

SEC. 28. The first election of judges of the court of appeals and of justices of the supreme court, and of judges of the superior court and court of common pleas of the city and county of New York, and of the superior court of the city of Buffalo, shall take place at such time as the Legislature shall prescribe between the first Tuesday of April and the first Tuesday of June, 1868. The said courts and the commissioners of appeals shall respectively enter upon their duties on the first Monday of July next thereafter.

Mr. FOLGER—The adoption of the amendment by which the present judges of the supreme court and justices of the superior court are continued in office make a part of this section unnecessary; and there should be also a change of the kind I mention in line seven. I move to strike out "eight," in that line, and insert "nine." I move, also, to strike out from the word "and," in line two, down to and including the word "Buffalo," in line four.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to strike out "said courts," in line eight, and insert "court of appeals."

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

There being no further amendments offered to the section, the SECRETARY read section 29 as follows:

SEC. 29. On the first Monday of July, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, jurisdiction of all suits and proceedings then pending in the present supreme court shall become vested in the supreme court hereby established. Proceedings pending in county courts and in suits originally commenced in courts of justices of the peace shall be and remain in the county courts as is now provided for by law. The courts of oyer and terminer hereby established shall, in their respective counties, have jurisdiction on and after the day last mentioned of all indictments and proceedings then pending in the present courts of oyer and terminer. Indictments and proceedings pending in the court of general sessions of the peace in the city of New York shall be and remain in the said court, subject to all provisions of law relating thereto. Indictments and proceedings pending in the courts of sessions in the several counties of this State shall be and remain in the said courts, subject to all provisions of law relating thereto.

Mr. FOLGER—I move that the word "eight" be stricken out of line two, and the word "nine" inserted.

The PRESIDENT—There being no objection, that amendment will be made.

There being no further amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read section 30 as follows:

SEC. 30. The judges of the present court of appeals, and the justices of the present supreme court, are hereby declared to be severally eligible to any office at the first election under this Constitution.

There being no amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read section 31 as follows:

SEC. 31. County judges, justices of the peace, and coroners in office when this Constitution shall take effect, shall hold their respective offices until the expiration of the term for which they were respectively elected.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I offer the following amendment to this section. To insert the word "surrogate" after the words "county judges." I am aware that an amendment accomplishing the same purpose was proposed and adopted in Committee of the Whole last night, to another section, but this is the section to which it manifestly belongs. Therefore I offer it here.

Mr. EVARTS—It is the surrogate of New York that is provided for in that section.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—It seems to me the next section relates to the surrogate of New York.

Mr. EVARTS—I agree that the amendment of the gentleman from Cayuga [Mr. C. C Dwight] seems to be a proper disposition of the subject.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. C. C. Dwight, and it was declared adopted.

Mr. BICKFORD—There will need to be, I apprehend, a provision inserted in regard to local officers to discharge the duties of county judge and surrogate. They might be constitutionalized out of office unless protected by this or some other section. I therefore move to insert after the words "justices of the peace" the words "local judicial officers."

Mr. BARKER—I would amend by inserting "special county judges."

Mr. BICKFORD—I accept that amendment.

Mr. FOLGER—The same phrase is used in section 20. The gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford] has the proper word.

Mr. EVARTS—Judicial officers in general are covered by section 32. It may be the gentleman from Jefferson is right in supposing that special mention needs to be made of special county judges. But general local judicials are disposed of by section 32.

Mr. FOLGER—The gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] is slightly in error. Local courts in cities and villages are referred to, but there are local officers in counties, and it is to them that the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford] refers.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Bickford, and it was declared carried.

There being no further amendments offered to the section, the SECRETARY read section 32 as follows:

SEC. 32. All local courts established in any city or village, including the surrogate's court of the county of New York, shall remain until otherwise directed by the Legislature with their present powers and jurisdiction; and the judges of such courts, and any clerks thereof, in office on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, shall continue in office until the expiration of their terms of office, or until the Legislature shall otherwise direct.

Mr. EVARTS—I can see no reason for including laws which refer to the surrogate of the city and county of New York, now that provision has been made for the surrogates by the amendment of the thirty-first section. There is another amendment, I would suggest, and that is to insert at the end of the first line, so that it will read as follows: "all local courts established in any city or village, not in this article especially provided for," because the fifteenth section, contains all special provisions for the local courts of the city of New York, and the city of Buffalo. The amendment is to strike out the words, "including the surrogate's court, of the county of New York," and inserting in lieu thereof, "not in this article especially provided for."

Mr. ROBERTSON—I move to strike out the words, "surrogate's court," and insert the words "general sessions of the peace."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Robertson, and it was declared lost.

The question was then put on the amendment of Mr. Evarts, and it was declared carried.

Mr. FOLGER—In line six I propose to amend by striking out the number "8" and inserting "9."

There being no objection, the section was so amended.

There being no further amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read section 33 as follows:

SEC. 33. The Legislature may create probate courts, abolish the office of surrogate, confer upon existing courts the powers and duties of surrogate and the jurisdiction of surrogates, create registers of wills and of the probate thereof, and of letters of administration, and provide for the trial by jury of issues in surrogates' courts, and in courts having the like powers and duties.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I move to strike out the thirty-third section. It seems to me the powers made in this section are covered by the previous section, which has just been read, and by other sections. I do not see the need of retaining it. It is cumbersome, and all the powers which adhere to the Legislature are expressly provided in other parts of the article.

Mr. FOLGER—I think the gentleman is in error. This article has arisen from the demand which has been made upon the Legislature from time to time for the creation of additional surrogates' courts in the city of New York. Applications were made not only from the bar of that city, but also from some gentlemen who have held the office of surrogate, for an additional force in the surrogate's office. The plan proposed was for two additional surrogates for the city of New York, dividing the city into three divisions by geographical lines. The query was raised and affirmatively answered, that there was no power in the Legislature to create additional surrogates' courts in that city, that the language of the Constitution inhibited it. There must, by its provision, be one surrogate's court for each county, and no more. We should not deprive the Legislature of the power of meeting the demand for an additional force in the probate court in that city. This section is proposed for the purpose of meeting that necessity and enabling the Legislature, at its leisure, with due deliberation, to create a probate court, calling it a surrogate's court or a probate court, or by whatever other names and with such additional other powers as may be necessary, especially that for the trial of issues which are raised in surrogates' courts and tried by juries instead of surrogates, besides many other things. It seems to me an important and necessary power to give to the Legislature, that of providing for just such an exigency as has been represented to exist in the city of New York.

Mr. ALVORD—I would suggest an amendment in the fourth line, by striking out the word register and inserting the word registrar.

There being no objection, the amendment was made.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I would like to ask, whether the Legislature have not the power, under any additional provision, to direct a trial by jury in a surrogate's court, and also to confer upon surrogates' courts the jurisdiction over real estate, if it is deemed advisable.

Mr. FOLGER—I do not feel entirely satisfied to answer that question, either in the affirmative or negative.

Mr. C. L. ALLEN—I hope this section will not be retained. I see no necessity for it in the present organization of the surrogates' courts throughout the State. In the remarks I made last evening I said all I think it necessary to say on this subject, and I will not repeat it now. I will only add that once we had courts of probate in this State under the Constitution of 1777. The wisdom of the framers of the Constitution of 1821 abolished that office and substituted the office of surrogate. The Constitution of 1846 retained the same provision. The practice of that court operates well, I believe, in all the counties.

Mr. EVARTS—I beg to ask the attention of the Convention for a moment to a few suggestions on this subject. There is, in framing a fixed form of government for twenty years, some difficulty felt in the manner of arrangement, which may not seem to be very important at the time, but a circumspect reference to the duty of the Convention will make it desirable for us to insist upon an absolute unchangeability no further than is clearly necessary for some serious consideration. Now, the duties of surrogate in this State originally partook of what we would call an official character in distinction from a judicial character; but by degrees it has been found convenient—and in the main, perhaps, the experiment has justified it—to make the judicial function larger and larger, until the surrogates, particularly in communities where the population and property are large, have jurisdiction of a most extensive class of important interests. Any thing that connects itself with the estate of a decedent in the way of testamentary disposition, or in respect to rights of personal representatives or of guardians, is within the surrogate's judicial function; and the probate of contested wills, as we all know, comes to be one of the most important as well as one of the most extensive subjects of judicial cognizance. In England they have, of late, broken up the official character of the old probate court, known there as doctors' commons, and have let in the light of day, thus securing the ordinary guaranties in protection of the public, and open administration of justice in these important subjects of probate jurisdiction. The probate court, with a judge holding the same position in reference to the general judicial establishment that the judges of other courts of record do, with pleadings and a jury trial, now discharges in England these important functions. In the city of New York and in the city of Brooklyn, and in some other large cities, it is very apparent that the amount of wealth and population must necessarily make, year by year, the number of these probate litigations greater. Our Constitution, as we propose it, does not itself make any change. But it does not forget that in the progress of twenty years, if not at the present time, it may be very desirable that the Legislature should have the power to separate the mere official duty of the surrogate, as the register of wills and in taking formal proof of uncontested wills and issuing testamentary papers and letters of guardianship from the true judicial functions now discharged by the surrogate, and which pass upon the gravest questions of law and fact that can be submitted to any tribunal of the State. If the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] is right in supposing that all this faculty would rest in the Legislature without this section, I would agree with him in striking it out. But the fear is that the office of surrogate being in the Constitution provided for as a part of the establishment of the State, an attempt of the Legislature to make a court of probate that would have a judge under the usual conditions of judicial responsibility which belong to a judge of a court of record, and a jury as a part of its regular framework, might be held to be unconstitutional. We all know that the supreme court in its general term is now occupied with appeals, and at circuit in the trial of issues of fact, which, in the expensive manner now provided, come from the surrogate's court for a jury finally to determine. Safety in this branch of litigation, and economy, require that it shall be competent for the Legislature, when any portion of the State shall communicate such desire to their representatives, to open a probate court for the trial of contested cases with a jury, leaving the official duties of the surrogate in the registration of wills, and formal probates to remain as they have heretofore been.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. E. Brooks to strike out the section, and it was declared lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I would suggest to the Convention whether the use of the word "other" in place of the word "existing" would not be more appropriate; whether the word "existing" does not confine it to the courts existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution? That would, of course, cut off the Legislature from creating a court in which should be vested the power of the surrogate, together with some other power which could be exercised by some other court under the present Constitution.

Mr. EVARTS—I have no objection to such amendment.

Mr. FOLGER—I have no objection to it.

The section was so amended.

Mr. E. BROOKS—Since the Convention declined to strike out the section, I move to strike out the words "abolish the office of surrogate." I do not think it wise to so re-enact scenes which have transpired in the legislative history of this State, creating a scramble, on the one part, for the abolition of the office, and on the other for its retention. We have declared in the previous provisions of this article that these officers shall remain as they now are. It is the judgment of a great majority of the gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject that the office is a wise one, and that it fulfills an important function in the judicial history of the State. I, therefore, to test the sense of the committee, move to strike out the words "abolish the office of surrogate."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. E. Brooks, and it was declared adopted.

Mr. SPENCER—It occurred to me when the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] proposed to substitute the word "registrars" for "registers," that his criticism upon this word was more nice than wise. I have examined the Constitutions of several States in that particular, and also Webster's Dictionary, upon the use of the term, and I found that register is the proper term to be employed. I therefore ask that the substitution of the word registrars may be reconsidered. It will be found that the word register is employed for this purpose in the States of Delaware, Maryland, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, and is the term for a Constitutional officer. I believe it is also employed in the statutes of several other States for that purpose. The term "registrar," as far as I know, is not in use in this country, but is in England an office of the university.

Mr. EVARTS—In our own State the habit of the Constitution is to use the word register.

The PRESIDENT—The amendment was ordered by unanimous consent, and if there be no objection, the section will be again amended as suggested by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer].

There being no objection, the section was restored, in respect to the word "register."

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I move to strike out the words "confer upon existing courts the powers and duties of surrogates, and the jurisdiction of surrogates." It is evidently proper that it should be stricken out, particularly after the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks].

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Livingston, and it was declared lost.

Mr. BALLARD—I move to insert after the word "courts" in the second line, the words "of record."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Ballard, and it was declared carried.

Mr. BICKFORD—It seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], important as it was, was not sufficiently considered. It appears to me a very important question whether the Legislature shall have power to abolish the office of surrogate. I therefore move that the vote by which the amendment was adopted be reconsidered, and I call the ayes and noes on the question.

Objection being made to the immediate consideration of the question, the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

There being no further amendment offered to the section the SECRETARY read the first section as follows:

SEC. 1. The assembly shall have power of impeachment, by a vote of the majority of all the members elected. The court for the trial of impeachments, shall be composed of the President of the Senate, the Senators, or a major part of them, and the judges of the court of appeals, or the major part of them. On a trial of an impeachment against the Governor, the Lieutenant-Governor shall not act as a member of the court. No judicial officer shall exercise his office after he shall have been impeached, until he shall have been acquitted. Before the trial of an impeachment, the members of the court shall take an oath or affirmation truly and impartially to try the impeachment according to evidence, and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, or removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit under this State; but the party impeached shall be liable to indictment and punishment according to law.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I move to strike out the word "judicial" in the eighth line.

The question was put upon the amendment of Mr. M. I. Townsend, and it was declared lost.

Mr. POND—I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

After the word "them" in line six insert as follows: "While engaged in said court as members thereof, Senators shall receive such compensation therefor as may be prescribed by law."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Pond, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I see that a conviction can be had by less than one-third of the members composing the courts for the trial of impeachments, by the use of the word "present." One-half of the court can hold court, and two-thirds of that half can convict. It is a difficulty that has been encountered in the Senate.

Mr. FOLGER—That is the case in the present Constitution.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—The fault is in regard to the passage of a law over the veto power I propose that it shall read two-thirds of those required to hold the court. I propose to strike out the word "present," and after the word "present" add "the majority of all the members belonging to said court."

Mr. ROBERTSON—I would suggest that the gentleman can accomplish his purpose by striking out the word "present." A court is convened for the trial of an impeachment and is to be composed of certain persons, and no person shall be convicted except by two-thirds of the members of the said court.

Mr. EVARTS—It is not a court unless it contains a majority of the Senators and judges of the court of appeals. There must be a presence of enough to make a court. The provision is that it shall require two-thirds of the members present to convict.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Then you have two-thirds of the majority.

Mr. EVARTS—Undoubtedly.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Hardenburgh, and it was declared lost.

There being no further amendment offered, the SECRETARY read the second section as follows:

SEC. 2. There shall be a court of appellate jurisdiction, called a court of appeals, composed of a chief judge and six associate judges, who shall be chosen by the electors of the State, and shall hold their office for the term of fourteen years, and shall not be elected for a second term. At the first election of judges under this Constitution every elector may vote for the chief and only four of the associate judges. No chief judge or associate judge of said court shall remain in office longer than until the first day of January next after he shall have reached the age of seventy years. Any five members of said court shall form a quorum, and the concurrence of four shall be necessary to a decision, until otherwise provided by law. The court shall have the appointment, with the power of removal, of the reporter and clerk of the court, and of such attendants as may be authorized by law.

Mr. MURPHY—I rise to ask the attention of the Convention to the section just passed in regard to the matter alluded to by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh]. "Two-thirds of the members present" is a rather ambiguous phrase. If there are sixty members of the court thirty-one would constitute a quorum; and by this phraseology twenty-two may convict. The article should read "two-thirds of those who constitute the court," not two-thirds of those present at the time the judgment is delivered.

Mr. EVARTS—I move to amend the second section by striking out from the fourth and fifth lines the words "for the term of fourteen years, and shall not be elected for a second term," and substitute the words "during good behavior until the age of seventy years." On that I ask the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Evarts and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Armstrong, Barto, Beadle, Beckwith, Bergen, Bowen, E. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Chesebro, Cochran, Colahan, Comstock, Cooke, Curtis, Daly, C. C. Townsend, S. Townsend, Wales, Williams, Young—58.

Mr. WAKEMAN—I move to strike out in the second section, in lines four and five, the words "and shall not be elected for a second term." On that I call the ayes and noes.

Mr. EVARTS—Before this question is put I move to reconsider the vote last taken.

Objection being made to the immediate consideration of the question, the motion of Mr. Evarts was laid on the table.

A sufficient number seconding the call of Mr. Wakeman for the ayes and noes, they were ordered.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Wakeman, and it was declared adopted by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Ballard, Barker, Barto, Beadle, Beals, Bell, Bergen, Bickford, E. Brooks, W. C. Mr. BALLARD—I move to strike out the second sentence in section 2: "At the first election of judges under this Constitution, every elector may vote for the chief and only four of the associate judges." It will then leave it standing upon the first sentence of the second section, that the electors may vote for all the judges put in nomination. On that I call the ayes and noes.

A sufficient seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Ballard, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Alvord, Archer, Axtell, Ballard, Barker, Beckwith, Bell, Bowen, W. C. Brown, Carpenter, Cochran, Cooke, Daly, Fowler, Garvin, Goodrich, Grant, Graves, Hadley, Hand, Hardenburgh, Harris, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Ketcham, Krum, Landon, M. H. Noes—Messrs. C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Andrews, Armstrong, Baker, Barto, Beadle, Beals, Bergen, Bickford, E. Brooks, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, Case, Cassidy, Cheritree, Chesebro, Comstock, Curtis, C. C. Parker, Pond, Potter, President, Prindle, Rathbun, Reynolds, Rogers, Roy, Silvester, Sheldon, Smith, Stratton, Tappen, S. Townsend, Van Campen, Van Cott, Wakeman, Young—68.

Mr. BARTO—I move the following amendments: To strike out the word "six" in the second line and insert "four." To strike out "five" in the tenth line and insert "three." To strike out "four" in the eleventh line and insert "two."

A division being called for,

The question was put on the adoption of the first amendment offered by Mr. Barto, and it was declared lost.

The question was then put on the adoption of the second amendment offered by Mr. Barto, and it was declared lost.

The question was then put on the adoption of the third amendment offered by Mr. Barto, and it was declared lost.

Mr. EVARTS—I move to strike out all the third sentence of the section: "No chief judge or associate judge of said court shall remain in office longer than until the first day of January next after he shall have reached the age of seventy years." This circumscribes the freedom of choice on the part of the electors. They choose for the fixed term of fourteen years; they determine whom they will choose, with his age or without his age. It embarrasses, further, the judiciary; those who aspire to the office and those who desire to continue in office. It may be a point with the electors whether they will choose a man who can serve out the full term of fourteen years, or one whom they will thus disfavor who cannot serve a full term. A judge leaving his first term at the age of fifty-seven, is placed at a disadvantage compared with one leaving at the age of fifty-six. The truth is that the termination of office by expiration of age is only a part of the system of tenure for good behavior; and whenever fixed terms are adopted freedom of choice settles the whole question.

Mr. BICKFORD—I submit that it does not limit the choice of the people at all. If they choose to elect a man, for instance, who is sixty years of age, with the understanding that he is to serve ten years, why may they not have the privilege? As it stands now they have that privilege of electing a man sixty years of age, understanding that he is to serve only ten years, and it is not at all restrictive of their liberty of choice.

Mr. MORRIS—I merely desire to say that I think, under no circumstances, ought any incumbent to occupy an office beyond the age of seventy years.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I move to amend by striking out "seventy" and inserting "seventy-five."

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Hardenburgh, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. Evarts to strike out the third sentence.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND called for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Evarts, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 40 to 62.

Mr. RUMSEY — I move to amend the section by striking out all down to and including the word "judges," in line seven, and inserting in lieu thereof, the following: "There shall be a court of appellate jurisdiction called the court of appeals, composed of a chief judge and six associate judges. The judges of the present court of appeals shall be judges of the court hereby created, and hold their offices until the expiration of the terms for which they were severally elected. The other judges of said court shall be chosen by the electors of the State, and all of said judges hereafter to be elected shall hold their offices for the term of fourteen years. At the first election of judges under this Constitution, every elector may vote for the chief, and only one of the associate judges." That is precisely the section as it is now, except that it retains the present judges in the court of appeals in office during the continuance of their term. It is offered as a substitute for that portion of the section. I ask the ayes and noes on the amendment.

A sufficient number seconding the call the ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. COMSTOCK—This amendment is totally inconsistent with what has been adopted by the most deliberate votes of this Convention. By a strong vote the Convention has just declared that at the first election of judges, under this Constitution, every elector may vote for the chief and only four of the associate judges; necessarily the amendment offered by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Rumsey] is inconsistent with that, and obliterates it from the system. It also is entirely inconsistent with the previous part of the section, to wit, that there shall be a court of appeals composed of a chief judge and six associate judges, who shall be chosen by the electors of the State and shall hold their office for a term of fourteen years. I doubt whether the amendment is in order. Whether in order or not, it is wholly inconsistent with what this Convention has already done.

The question was then put on the amendment offered by Mr. Rumsey, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Axtell, Bell, W. C. Brown, Cooke, C. C. Dwight, Endress, Ferry, Fowler, Fuller, Goodrich, Grant. Graves, Hammond, Hand, Harris, Krum, M. H. Lawrence, Ludington, McDonald, C. E. Parker, Pond, Prindle, Rumsey, Seaver, Spencer, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Wales, Williams, Young—32.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Archer, Armstrong, Barker, Ballard, Barto, Beals, Beckwith, Bergen, Bickford, Bowen, E. Brooks, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, Carpenter, Case, Cassidy, Cheritree, Chesebro, Cochran, Colahan, Comstock, Curtis, Daly, Eddy, Ely, Evarts, Farnum, Field, Flagler, Folger, Francis, Garvin, Gross, Hadley, Hale, Hardenburgh, Hatch, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Kinney, Landon, A. Lawrence, Lee, Livingston, Magee, Mattice, Merrill, Merritt, Merwin, Miller, Monell, Morris, Murphy, Nelson, Opdyke, A. J. Parker, Potter, President, Prosser, Rathbun, Reynolds, Robertson, Rogers, Silvester, Sheldon, Smith, Stratton, Tappen, Van Campen, Van Cott, Wakeman—77.

Mr. BICKFORD—I move to strike out the word "judge" wherever it occurs, and insert "justice;" also to strike out "judges" and insert "justices."

Mr. EVARTS—That may as well be left to the Committee on Revision.

Mr. BICKFORD—It is a mere matter of tasto; I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. COOKE — I move as an amendment to add to the second section the following: "The Legislature shall have power to provide for the election of two additional judges of the court of appeals." The Judiciary Committee recommended a commission—that is, conferring power on the Legislature to provide for a commission to clear the calendar of the court of appeals, provided this court we have organized proved inadequate to that purpose. That section was stricken out, and now there is no provision made for that purpose. It was supposed by some gentlemen who claimed that this court of appeals as recommended and as adopted by the Committee of the Whole, would be adequate to perform all the duties devolving upon the court—that such improvement would be made in the circuit as to diminish the amount of business that comes to the court of appeals. I have no doubt the committee have adopted the best plan that they could adopt in view of all the circumstances, and yet I think there is great reason to believe that there will be such an amount of business going into the court of appeals as that court cannot dispose of. At all events, it is wise for us to make provision in case that result should follow. The Convention of 1846 left the Constitution without any provision for an emergency of that kind. In the course of ten years it became evident that some provision was necessary in order to relieve the court of appeals from an overburdened calendar. An effort was made to effect a change in the Constitution for that purpose, which failed. and the consequence has been that the cases in the court of appeals are a number of years in arrear. I think it is wisdom in us to make some provision for this purpose, to prevent a recurrence of this evil, particularly, when we see that the business in the court of appeals for the year 1862 had reached the amount of five hundred causes, brought into the court for a single year, and when we see that it is increasing at a ratio that will double it every ten years. For the purpose of putting it in the power of the Legislature to provide some relief for this court, I offer this amendment. It will not be necessary to resort to it if the prediction of the gentlemen here prove true. If it turns out that this court is adequate to keep down the calendar, the Legislature will never be called upon to exercise this power. But I ask gentlemen, whether it is proper for us to leave the Legislature tied up, and leave the court bound hand and foot, unable to help itself for the want of just such a provision as this?

Mr. BALLARD—I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke]. "I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say," and what has already been said. If we leave this court of appeals as it is now provided in this article, it will be overwhelmed with business beyond the means of extrication. If we clothe the Legislature with the power to add two members to it in case the necessity arises, then there will be nine judges, and four judges with the presiding judge can continue in session. While four, with the presiding judge, are holding a court of four weeks, the remaining judges, if they see fit, can be in consultation. At the end of four weeks the remaining four resume the bench, and thus continue to hear causes and decide them. And I believe, in that way, business will be promoted, and the decision of causes dispatched, and thus save the court from being overwhelmed with business as they have been in former years. I hope that the amendment may be adopted so that the Legislature can exercise this power if the necessity arises.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope this amendment will not be adopted, certainly in its present form. The attempt has been made directly in this Convention, in the Committee of the Whole, more than once, to organize a court of appeals large enough to work in sections—a double-headed court." That point in the organization of the court has been discussed over and over again in the Committee of the Whole, and it seems to have been the deliberate judgment of this Convention that we should have one court operating as a unit, the judgment of the whole of the members of which should be exercised upon all the controversies in that court. If this Convention has settled any thing heretofore, it has settled that proposition. I regard this as an indirect attempt to arrive at a result which has been condemned when presented in a more open form. The avowed object of this amendment is to produce a court large enough to work in sections, and to destroy that unity in a tribunal of last resort which seems to have been desired by this Convention. This is the avowed object of this amendment, and it might just as well have been proposed as an original proposition, that the court of appeals should consist of nine members, as to adopt this amendment now, for it gives to your Legislature authority, the very next winter after the Constitution shall have been adopted, to make the court consist of nine members. And I apprehend there will be a move in that direction very soon. How soon will there be a movement to add to the members of that court? Somebody will be dissatisfied with its decisions, and will say, "I will go to the Legislature now and add a judge or two judges to that court." Some political party may desire to change its political complexion by adding two members to the court. I think this Convention should make up its mind definitely whether it wants one court or two courts; and having made up its mind, should abide by that decision.

Mr. HALE—I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke]: "But no such addition shall be made unless the judges of the court or a majority of them shall recommend the same; nor shall such additional judges hold their offices for a longer time than may be recommended by said judges."

Mr. COOKE—I accept the amendment.

Mr. HALE—I have offered this amendment with a view of guarding against the danger which was referred to by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], in case the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] should be adopted. As now amended, the amendment, if adopted, would merely provide this: Instead of having a commission, as was recommended by the Judiciary Committee and voted by the Committee of the Whole, it would be in the power of the judges of the court of appeals to recommend to the Legislature to give them two additional judges to aid them for a limited period to get rid of any accumulation of causes which might occur. If adopted, there would be no danger of additions being made for political reasons or to influence any decision by the judges of the court of appeals.

Mr. ANDREWS—I trust this amendment in either form will not be adopted, and that we shall adopt the section which has already been passed upon three or four times in committee.

Mr. KRUM—I hope this amendment will be adopted. One great difficulty in our present judicial system is the blockade of the court of appeals. When the amendment was proposed by the gentleman in Committee of the Whole I had some doubts as to its adoption. I had doubts as to its adoption for the reason that I did not know but the court of appeals, as organized by this section, would prove adequate to the performance of the business. With the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] we leave the question to be determined by a practical operation, whether or not the court, as it is now organized, can dispose of the business. If it can there will not be two judges added to it by the Legislature. If the court in its practical operations shall determine that it cannot perform the business, then the amendment relieves the court of that difficulty by the addition of two more judges. It seems to me that is the true way. The court will try to perform the business as it is now, and if it cannot perform the business then there is relief in the amendment offered. For these reasons I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. FERRY—With all due respect to those who entertain a different view I am very decidedly opposed to this amendment. When the time shall arrive that our court of last resort in this State must be a double-headed court, or operate in sections, some other system must be adopted. The remedy for the blockade of the court must be found in some other method of relief. The courts from which the business is derived—from which appeals are taken to this court must be reorganized in some form or the right of appeal must be limited. To my mind it would be a sorry picture to see the court of last resort operate by sections —a double court. We have had experience enough with our eight courts—general terms of concurrent jurisdiction in the supreme court in this State—to cure every man of the desire for double courts who has had practice under it.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I shall feel myself constrained to vote against this amendment; and for the reason that I deem it unnecessary. There is, in the twelfth line of the section, a cure for any blockade the court may get into, and I trust there will be wisdom enough in the Legislature to use the remedy when the times comes. It is that by law the Legislature may provide a different quorum from the one indicated in the tenth and eleventh lines. And I trust the Legislature will not be so "double-headed" as to hesitate about having the business of the court done, even though they subject themselves from the outside to the accusation of double-headedness. A smaller quorum than five may be authorized by the Legislature in case the blockade does come. I have confidence in the good sense of any Legislature in this State to believe that if the exigency does come they will see that the business of the State is done under the section as it stands.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I merely rise to inquire of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] if we, over in this corner, rightly understood him, that the court of appeals had now arrested the increase of the calendar for the last two years, and by the manner in which they have discharged their duty had resisted and overcome effectually that continued increase which the gentleman from Cortland [Mr. Ballard] says still continues. That statement would alone induce me to vote against the amendment.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I said in Committee of the Whole that I believed the business of the court of appeals had not much increased in two or three years past. I believe that is what I said.

Mr. MILLER—I offer an amendment, to be prefixed to the amendment now offered: "after the first day of January, 1880." I wish that the plan proposed by the committee may have a full and fair trial before we attempt any doubtful experiment. But perhaps to avoid all necessity of the amendment to the Constitution, if this plan should work badly, it might be well to provide for some such relief. I offer the amendment that after the first of January, 1880, the Legislature may provide for this relief.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Miller, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Cooke as amended on the suggestion of Mr Hale.

Mr. BALLARD—I call for a division of the question.

Mr. HALE—I rise to a question of order. The question is not susceptible of division, the latter part being the condition of the first part.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman is correct. The amendment is not susceptible of division. The question must be taken on the proposition as a whole.

Mr. BALLARD—Then I will move to strike out the amendment of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale].

Mr. COOKE—I wish to say one word in reply to the question put by the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] to my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], as to whether the business of the court of appeals had increased within the last three or four years. I understood the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] to say that it has not. The statistics show that it has increased so as to double every ten years up to the beginning of the war, or the first two years of the war, to 1862. The cases that were brought into court in that year were five hundred. The most that the court has ever been able to dispose of in any one year, including motions and calendar causes, has been three hundred and twenty causes. Now we may look, I say, for six or eight hundred causes going upon the calendar yearly, before five years more have elapsed. The business has been, to some extent, diminished, during the war. The effect of the war began to be felt on the business of the court as early as 1863, but that business is now increasing, and it takes no prophet to foretell that the increase will be more considerable as the business revives from the depression caused by the war, and attains its former activity. Now, the gentleman from Otsego [Mr. Ferry] says it will be a great calamity if the court of last resort has to divide itself into sections. Many of the gentleman here will understand how I explained the proposition I submitted to the Committee of the Whole for carrying on this court so as to double its capacity, and will also see that the manner of dividing it into sections cannot interfere at all with its unity, or the uniformity of its decisions; for the presiding judge of the court, it is contemplated, shall be present at every session of the court, and at their consultations. Now, I would ask my friend from Otsego [Mr. Ferry] whether the calamity of having a court constructed in that way, and doing the business up promptly, is any thing to be compared to that of a delay of seven or eight years in the disposition of our cases. I claim that of all the evils, the one most to be dreaded is that of a postponement of justice, by delay in the decision of causes. I would rather have eight courts of last resort than to have eight years' delay. But then, no such consequences need result. The court will be a unit, its decisions will be uniform, even if the Legislature, upon the advice of the judges of the existing court of appeals, come to the conclusion that some such contrivance is necessary to be resorted to in order to relieve the calendar. I do not see any difficulty about it, or any harm to come out of it. But I would put back the question to these gentlemen: What are we to do in case this Convention misjudge as to the capacity of the court that we are about organizing, as the Convention of 1846 misjudged with reference to the court of appeals organized by them.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—The gentleman [Mr. Cooke] puts the question what we are to do. We are overlooking the fact that it will be in the power of the new Legislature, after two years' favorable consideration of the project, to amend the Constitution on this point or any other point.

Digitized by Google

We are not making a Constitution for twenty years. It can be amended as we amended it in 1854. As to the subject of the calendar, I understood the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] to state that the arrest of the increase was confined to the last two years. But I wish to state to the Convention that the moment the fact is known of the arrest of the great delay to the litigants in this court and their lawyers throughout the State, the moment it is known by those who go to that court merely for delay, that it will not reach their purpose, an immense class of this frivolous litigation will cease. This frivolous litigation ought never to be entertained in that court; and if it were possible by an amendment of the Constitution to provide that it should never go upon the calendar of the court of appeals at all, I would be glad to adopt a provision of that kind. Again, I would ask professional gentlemen whether or not the legislation that has taken place in Congress within the last few years—I refer to the legislation on the national banking system—whether that legislation is, as I believe it is, almost solely under the control of the judicature of the United States? Take away that important class of litigation, take away the bankrupt matters now occupying the United States courts, and it will contribute largely to reduce the calendars of these State courts.

Mr. FERRY—My objection to the system of my friend from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] is this: I think he is incorrect in supposing that his plan does not destroy the unity of the court. If I believed with him, I should think differently. It being important (and he admits its importance) that the court should be possessed of that feature, and to destroy it would be a calamity, if the business of the court should greatly accumulate, if the court should be found inadequate to keep its calendar clear and to discharge the duties of the office, then, I say, I have in my mind half a dozen remedies for the evil that I would resort to before I would adopt that of the gentleman, believing, as I do, that it makes a court of sections. He undoubtedly entertains the opinion expressed honestly, but the Convention, being equally honest, have heard his ingenious argument and they have decided against him in regard to it, being of the opinion that the system will not work as he represents it.

Mr. DALY—I think there is great force in the inquiry put by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke]. Since the action which this Convention has taken upon the report of the committee, no provision whatever is made to meet the exigencies of the future. There was a provision in the report of the committee that, at the expiration of a certain number of years it should be in the power of the Legislature to order a commission to clear off any accumulation which might arise in the court of appeals. That provision was stricken out upon the motion of the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] with very great unanimity. We have agreed upon a fixed number of judges in the court of appeals, no greater than the number provided for in the Constitution of 1846. Now, Mr. President, gentlemen of this Convention will remember that I called the attention of the Convention some days ago to some very important facts in regard to the past action of the Convention; of the great confidence which was felt in 1821 that the supreme court, as then organized, would be able to discharge the business of the State; and of the equal confidence, expressed in the Convention of 1846, that the court of appeals would be so efficient that no cause would be more than one year from the time of its commencement in the supreme court until its final decision in the court of appeals; and also of the practical results, as shown by the large accumulation of business before 1846, and the accumulation in the court of appeals. Now, I call the attention of the members of the Convention to the fact, that, the judicial force of this State is less, in proportion to its population and great interests, than that of any other State in the union whose system I have had an opportunity of examining, and I have gone over many of them. Gentlemen will find, attached to the report of the Judiciary Committee, a comparison of the judicial force of this State with a portion of one of the States of Europe, corresponding in population, with this State—a comparison of the territorial jurisdiction of the department of the imperial court at Paris, which embraces a population of less than four millions, the difference being about one half a million. The judges in the imperial court of Paris are sixty-three in number. The judges corresponding with the supreme court of our State are sixty-five in number, and the whole number of judges of that department, as against the number that we have, presents just this result: they have three hundred and ninety-one judges, and we in this State have but two hundred and ninety-five. Now, I think it is worthy of the grave consideration of this Convention, whether they are willing to leave the arbitrary number of seven in the court of appeals to discharge all the business that may arise in the future, to meet the exigency of the increase of population, the increase of wealth, and the corresponding increase of litigation, without any provision in the event of their proving insufficient. If there has been diminution in the business of the court of appeals from the commencement of the war, it has been very well answered by the remark of the gentlemen from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] that if it had not been for the war, if the prosperity of the country had gone on for five or six years more, it is impossible to tell what would have been the condition of the court of appeals. I therefore think that this matter ought not to be passed over lightly, and I think the wise course is to adopt the amendment offered by the gentlemen from Essex [Mr. Hale] which does not leave it in the power of the Legislature to increase the number of the appellate judges, unless the judges of the existing court shall deem that necessary. And I ask, as the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] has asked, what harm is there in allowing the Legislature hereafter to add two additional judges to the court of appeals, if the judges of that court state to the Legislature that that increase is necessary for the dispatch of business?

Mr. FERRY—I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly], for whose

I have the highest respect, in regard to this matter. My objection to the section was that there can be more business transacted by a court of seven judges than by a court of nine judges, if they are to act together. Does the gentleman contemplate the division of the court of last resort and their acting in sections, in order to do more business in that way?

Mr. BALLARD—I withdraw my amendment. I will also add—

The PRESIDENT—Under the rule, the gentleman from Cortland [Mr. Ballard] having once spoken, and objection being made, he cannot proceed.

Mr. COOKE demanded the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question being put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Cooke, it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Archer, Armstrong, Ballard, Bickford, Bowen, E. Brooks, E. P. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Case, Chesebro, Cochran, Cooke, Francis, Goodrich Grant, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Hardenburgh, Hiscock, Kinney, Krum, Landon, A. Lawrence, Lee, Ludington, Miller, Morris, C. Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, C. L. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Baker. Barker, Barto, Beals, Bell, Bergen, E. A. Brown, Cassidy, Cheritree, Comstock, Curtis, C. C. Dwight, Eddy. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Convention took a recess till seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at 7 o'clock, and resumed the consideration of the report of the Judiciary Committee as amended in and reported by the Committee of the Whole.

The SECRETARY read section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. Upon the organization of the court of appeals under this Constitution, the causes then pending in the present court of appeals shall become vested in the court of appeals hereby created. Such of said causes as are pending on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, shall be heard and determined by a commission to consist of five commissioners of appeals. But the court of appeals hereby created, for cause shown, may order any cause thus pending before the said commissioners, to be heard in such court. Such commission shall consist of the judges of the present court of appeals elected thereto, and a fifth commissioner who shall be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. BICKFORD—I move to amend this section as follows: Strike out all after the word "appeals" where it first occurs in the seventh line, to and including the word "court" in the ninth line, and add at the end of the section the following, "and the concurrence of four of the said commissioners shall be necessary to decide any cause, and if four shall not concur, the same shall be certified and be decided by the court of appeals hereby created." It is provided by the section as it now stands, that any cause now pending in the court of appeals that is vested in the court of appeals, may, by order of the court, for cause shown, be heard before the court instead of before these commissioners. If that provision remains as it is, the court of appeals will be pestered with applications to have causes heard in the court, rather than before the commissioners. It is very likely that there will be a very general desire on the part of lawyers, that their causes should be decided by the new court of appeals, rather than before this commission; and to obviate such constant applications, which would take up a great deal of the time of the court, which should be occupied in hearing and deciding causes, is the object of this amendment. It specifies what causes shall be heard in the court of appeals rather than before the commissioners, namely those which have been heard once before the commissioners, and in which four of the commissioners have not concurred in rendering a judgment. That fact being certified to the court of appeals, that court will hear and determine the causes, and as I have said, I offer the amendment to save the time of the court of appeals.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I do not think that the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford] has fully considered all the reasons for inserting the clause which he proposes to strike out. It may happen that one of these five commissioners will be a party to the cause, or interested in the cause, or disqualified to sit in the hearing of a cause, because some of his kindred are interested in it, or he may have heard it in the court below. All these would be special reasons for transferring the cause to the court of appeals, and the amendment of the gentleman would not permit such transfer to be made for any of these reasons. It would permit only such causes to be transferred, as had failed to command four concurring voices in their decision in the commission. I think, therefore, that his amendment ought not to pass. The court of appeals would be amply able to protect itself from undue applications for the transfer of causes, and I should very much prefer to give the court of appeals entire control of the matter, so that they might order any cause which they please to order into the court of appeals; but at all events, I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford] is quite too restricted, and ought not to pass.

Mr. BICKFORD—I will defer to the opinion of the gentleman whose experience is so much greater than mine, and whose opinion in this matter is so much more valuable, and withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BALLARD—I offer the following amendment to the third section: After the word "Senate," in the thirteenth line, insert "and the concurrence of four shall be necessary to a decision."

Mr. A. J. PARKER—We do not want the provision suggested in that place. It will come in better after the word "appeals."

Mr. BALLARD—It is suggested by my friend [Mr. A. J. Parker] that this should be inserted after the word "appeals," in the seventh line, and I have no objection to changing the position of the amendment.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Ballard, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COMSTOCK—If the vote upon this amendment is not final, I should like to say a word in regard to it. I am inclined to think that it had better pass, and I think we had better reconsider the vote.

Mr. RATHBUN—Mr. President, we all voted "No" on this side of the house, because no man here heard what the proposition was, and our rule is, when we do not understand a proposition, to vote in the negative. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT—The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

After the word "Senate," in the seventh line, insert "and the concurrence of four shall be necessary to the decision."

Mr. COMSTOCK—I now move a reconsideration of the vote by which this amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT—The amendment not having been understood, and, no objection being made, it will be considered a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I doubt whether important causes ought to be received on the calendar of the court of appeals by the judgment of less than four of these commissioners. As the court of appeals is now organized, it requires five voices to render a judgment of affirmance or reversal. Now we know that there is, upon the calendar of the court of appeals at this time, and to be disposed of by this commission, a large number of cases of great importance, and I think it is more safe and more just to suitors interested in these cases that they should not be finally determined without the concurrence of four of the members of the commission. If there be an apparent inconvenience in that, it is relieved by the consideration that, if any cause shall be of such difficulty and importance as not to secure the concurrence of four of the commissioners, it can at once be removed into the court of appeals.

Mr. BARKER—I cannot see any wisdom in this proposed amendment, and I hope it will not prevail. It is certainly unusual and extraordinary that there should be a constitutional provision requiring so near a unanimity in the members as would be required by this amendment. It requires that there should be four out of five concurring in the adjudications of the commission. It often occurs in the hearing and determining of a case in court, that one of the judges is disqualified in some way from participating in the decision, and in such a case this amendment would require the entire unanimity of the judges sitting. It seems to me that under such a provision, the court would cease to be a useful court, and I hope the amendment will not prevail, because, in my judgment, the plan would not be found to be at all beneficial in its working.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I cannot agree with the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] in regard to this amendment. It seems to me to be a very desirable one. The objection that he makes is that it requires the concurrence of almost the entire number of the commissioners sitting The answer to that is, that, in the present court of appeals six judges may constitute the court, yet five judges must concur either to affirm or reverse a judgment, so that in the court of appeals the law requires almost unanimity. Another reason why this amendment should be adopted is this: It is proposed to require four to concur in a decision. That is the precise number that is required to concur in the new court of appeals that we are organizing, as the gentleman will see by the section preceding this. Suppose you do not make this provision, what would be the consequence? Your commission is to consist of five members. If you make no provision on the subject three might hold the court, and two, being the majority of those present, might decide. It would never do to leave the matter in that way. If you make a commission of appeals you must organize it in such a way as to give the people as much confidence in the judgments pronounced by that commission as in those pronounced by the court of appeals itself; and you can do that only by requiring the same number of judges to concur whether the cause be heard in the commission of appeals or in the court of appeals.

Mr. BARKER—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will remind the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] that he has already spoken once upon this amendment.

Mr. BARKER—I do not desire to make any remarks now but simply to give notice to the Convention, that if this amendment be voted down, I will then offer a further one requiring four of the commissioners to constitute a quorum.

Mr. MURPHY—The Constitution of the present court of appeals requires that five judges shall concur in giving a decision. The reason for making that provision was obvious. The court consists of eight members and if they should stand in any case, four to four, as they might reasonably be expected to do in some cases, there would be no decision at all, and therefore it became necessary that there should be a provision of this kind. Now, what is the provision sought to be adopted here, because of its analogy to the provision in regard to the court of appeals? That analogy cannot be established. This commission consists of five commissioners. If you adopt the amendment proposed, you allow two of the judges to make a decision, because you leave it to the power of two to prevent the affirmation or reversal of a judgment. What is to become of cases where the vote stands in that way, where the majority of the court are overruled by the minority? Are such cases to be re-argued, leading to a repetition of the same state of things? You certainly are bound to follow up this amendment if you adopt it, by some provision that such cases shall be disposed of in some other way I do not know any better course to pursue than to allow the majority of the court always to give the decision. Where a court consists of an even number of members, there must, of course, be some provision made to avoid a tie in the opinions of the judges, but where the number is uneven, I think it is best to let the majority give the decision, and I hope that this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I simply desire to add to the remarks of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], that by adopting the report of the committee we make a discrimination that I think is somewhat unjust to the suitors having cases pending in our courts. There are now, I believe, over a thousand cases in the court of appeals, and by the time that this section will become operative there will probably be a good many more. As the law stands, and as it stood when the suitors took the initiatory steps to come into this court of last resort, they had the advantage of the present system, requiring five judges to concur in the judgment of the court—four judges, to be sure, being enough upon a second argument, but only, I think, where the judgment was adverse to the appellant in the court below, the rule being substantially that five judges are necessary to concur in a judgment. Now, it is proposed to put it in the power of these commissioners to control the decision of the court; that is, to prevent the affirmation or reversal of the judgment rendered below, for it certainly comes to that, the commission being composed of five members. That is unfair to suitors whose cases are now in that court.

Mr. BECKWITH—I desire to reply to the remark of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy]. He says that if this amendment be adopted some other provision will become necessary for the disposal of causes, in the decision of which the required number shall not concur. If the gentleman will look at the subsequent part of that section he will find that such causes can go directly into the court of appeals. Where it is found that four of the commissioners do not concur in the judgment, the case passes directly into the court of appeals by an order of that court.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Will the gentleman from Clinton [Mr. Beckwith] show me where that clause is?

Mr. BECKWITH—It is this: "But the court of appeals hereby created, for cause shown, may order any cause thus pending before the said commissioners to be heard in such court."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Ballard, and it was declared lost.

Mr. BARKER—I move to add after the word "appeal," in the seventh line, the words "and four judges shall constitute a quorum."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Baker, and it was declared carried.

There being no other amendments to the third section, the SECRETARY read the fourth section as follows:

SEC. 4. If any vacancy shall occur in the office of said commissioners, it shall be filled by appointment by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and if the Senate is not in session, by the Governor, but in such case the term of office shall expire at the end of the session of the Senate next after such appointment. The said commissioners shall appoint from their number a chief commissioner (and may in like manner fill all vacancies in such appointment; and may appoint and remove such attendants as shall be provided for by law). The reporter of the court of appeals shall be the reporter of said commissioners. And the decisions of said commissioners shall be certified to and entered and enforced as the judgments of the court of appeals. The said commission shall continue for three years, unless the causes committed to it are sooner determined. If, at the end of three years from the time of entering upon its duties, all the causes assigned to such commission shall not have been heard and determined, the residue shall be heard and determined by the court of appeals hereby created.

Mr. SPENCER—I move to amend by striking out all after line 14 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"And in case at any time afterward there shall be such an accumulation of business in the court of appeals, that the same cannot be disposed of speedily and promptly, and the fact of such accumulation shall be duly certified by the court to the Governor, he shall, prior to the final adjournment of the Senate, after being so certified, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint a further commission of five, with power to hear and determine such cases pending in said court, as shall, by said court, be assigned for the purpose."

I offer this amendment to meet a difficulty which has been suggested, that notwithstanding the commission which has been provided for, there will be an accumulation of business hereafter for which no provision has yet been made.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Spencer, and it was declared lost.

Mr. FERRY—I offer the following amendment: in line 13, after the word "commission," insert "with the assent of the Legislature." The object of this amendment is to give to the Legislature some control over the action of these commissioners. I do not desire to say that these commissioners will neglect their duty, or will not labor as faithfully as the people may think they ought to, but nevertheless the thing is possible, and it is well enough to give the Legislature control of this commission, a power to shorten their term of service if it shall be necessary. If they labor faithfully, whether they are likely to finish the business in three years or not, the people will probably be content that they should continue; but if they fail to labor as faithfully as the people think they ought, let the Legislature have power to terminate their existence as a commission. That is all there is in this amendment.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Ferry, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I move to strike out the parenthesis commencing in line seven and ending in line eight. I will read the clause, and I think gentlemen will see that there is no need of this parenthesis: "The said commissioners shall appoint from their number a chief commissioner (and may in like manner fill the vacancies in such appointment)—

Mr. FOLGER—I think it would hardly do to strike that out. Suppose the chief commissioner should die or resign, there must be power to appoint another to succeed him.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—That is provided for in the preceding part of the sentence. It says "the said commissioners shall appoint from their number a chief commissioner." When he dies, have you no provision for his successor.

Mr. FOLGER—We have a provision in the parenthesis which the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] proposes to strike out, and that is the only place where it is.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Is there no provision in the article for the appointment of such a chief commissioner?

Mr. FOLGER—The provision, I say, is just in the language which the gentleman proposes to strike out. First the commissioners are authorized to appoint from their number a chief commissioner, and then if he dies or resigns, or refuses to act, this clause provides that they may fill the vacancy.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—The gentleman means that the other four commissioners can appoint his successor.

Mr. FOLGER—Yes.

Mr. HARDENBURGH — I understand. I withdraw the amendment.

There being no further amendment offered to section 4, the SECRETARY read section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. When a vacancy shall occur in the office of chief justice or associate judge of the court of appeals, three months prior to a general election, the same shall be filled at such election; and until any vacancy can be so filled, the Governor, by the advice and consent of the Senate, if the Senate shall be in session, or if not, the Governor alone, may appoint to fill such vacancy. If any such appointment of chief justice shall be made from among the associate judges, a temporary appointment of associate judge shall be made in like manner. But in such case, the person appointed chief justice shall not be deemed to vacate his office of associate judge any longer than until the expiration of such appointment. The powers and jurisdiction of the court shall not be suspended for want of appointment, when the number of judges is sufficient to constitute a quorum. All appointments under this section shall continue until the first day of January next after the election at which the vacancy can be filled.

There being no amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read section six, as follows:

SEC. 6. There shall be a supreme court having general jurisdiction in law and equity, subject to such appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeals as may be prescribed by law. The Legislature, at its session next after the adoption of this Constitution, shall divide the State into four judicial departments, and each of said departments into two districts to be bounded by county lines. The city and county of New York shall form one district. There shall be thirty-four justices of the said supreme court; ten thereof in the department in which is the city and county of New York, and eight in each of the other departments. But the Legislature shall have power to provide for an additional justice in each of said departments. One-half of the justices in each department, shall reside in each district of such department, at the time of their election.

Mr. HALE—I move to amend by striking out all after the word "law" in the third line and insert,

"There shall be in the State twelve judges of said court, any three or more of whom may hold general terms. The existing division of the State into eight districts shall continue, subject to the power of the Legislature to change the same as in this article provided. There shall also be in the first judicial district four, and in each of the other districts two justices of the supreme court: and the Legislature may provide for additional justices, not exceeding one in each district."

The amendment which I offer is substantially the same as that offered in Committee of the Whole by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. It is the same that I offered in Committee of the Whole, except I provide in this section that the twelve judges to be elected by the State at large shall perform the general term duty. One word in explanation of the system which is proposed by this amendment. It is not proposed to do away with the present system of holding general terms in every district of the State. It is not proposed to do away with the power of every judge or justice of the supreme court of the State to sit and hold special terms in every county in the State. It differs from the system adopted in Committee of the Whole in this and in this only: it provides that the appellate bench shall not be elected by any special locality, but shall be elected by the people of the State at large. Each district, as before, is to elect its justices—those who are to hold trial terms and preside at circuit courts, courts of oyer and terminer and special terms. Those judges who are elected by the people at large, are to do general term duty and hold general terms, as provided by the subsequent section, in each district in the State; but it is not proposed to deprive those judges elected by the people at large of the power of doing circuit duty also; it merely provides that they shall do the general term duty. If this system were adopted, it would undoubtedly be found that these judges would be more than would be necessary to do the general term business alone, and they could be required also to hold circuit courts, and in that way their time can be fully employed. As I have said, this proposition differs from the system adopted in having the appellate bench elected by the people of the State at large.

Mr. SPENCER—I offer the following substitute: Strike out all after the word "law," in the third line of the section, and insert as follows:

"The State shall be divided into eight judicial districts of which the city of New York shall be one; the others to be bounded by county lines, and to be compact and equal in population, as nearly as may be. There shall be four justices of the supreme court in each district, and as many more in the city of New York as may from time to time be authorized by law."

The article reported in relation to the supreme court, having been conformed to the present organization of that court, it seems to me proper that this provision copied from the present Constitution should be adopted here, to make the entire section harmonious.

Mr. FOLGER—This is the same proposition which has been already offered by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] and voted down in Committee of the Whole; and it has been repeatedly offered since in Committee of the Whole, and repeatedly declared out of order, as having been once rejected. It seeks to substitute for the system adopted in Committee of the Whole, and the system recommended by the Judiciary Committee, the present judicial system of the supreme court. It is true that, as the article now stands, there is but very little difference between the two propositions, but that little is important. The article as it stands recognizes the division of the State into departments, which draws after it the formation of four general terms instead of eight general terms.

Mr. SPENCER—Does the article anywhere else, except in this section, recognize it a particle?

Mr. FOLGER—If it does not, except in this section, yet the recognition of it in this section conveys to the Legislature that this Convention and the people (if they adopt this Constitution) are determined to have four general terms, and four only; and that is the reason why I am so strenuous for the system of departments; and that is the difference between the plan of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], which he has from time to time urged upon the Convention, and the plan of the Judiciary Committee. Our plan seeks to avoid that multiplicity of diverse decisions which would arise from having many general terms, and it gives that idea explicitly to the Legislature, so that when they come to pass a judiciary act they may see that they are required to obviate that difficulty.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I desire, when we reach the eighth section of the report of the Judiciary Committee, to offer a substitute that I think will meet the wants, or rather the variant views, of the gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject; and therefore, for the present, I shall oppose any amendments or substitutes that may be offered to this section.

Mr. SEAVER—I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer], if his proposition contemplates strict uniformity of decisions, and if it prevents justices of the supreme court from sitting in review of their own decisions?

Mr. MURPHY—It appears to me that the principle of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] is right. We have already adopted, in the sixteenth section, an amendment which requires that the judges of the supreme court shall be elected by the electors of their respective districts. We have therefore made necessary a modification of this section, else there will be "confusion worse confounded." Perhaps the amendment of the gentleman [Mr. Spencer], in its terms, goes too far, and the objection taken to it by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] may be correct, so far as he seeks to have the State divided into departments, and the judges to hold general terms embracing two districts; but by the sixth section, now under consideration, it is provided that there shall be thirty-four justices of the supreme court, ten thereof in the city and county of New York, and eight in each of the other departments. Now, how many are to be elected in the second judicial district?

Mr. VAN COTT—Five.

Mr. MURPHY—It does not say so.

Mr. FOLGER—I will explain to the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy]. After we had passed these sections, and the proposition of the gentleman from Steuben [Mr. Spencer] had uniformly been discarded by the committee, when we came down to section 16 the committee did then adopt this plan of electing by districts. That renders necessary some amendment which shall prescribe how the judges shall be elected in the district which comprises the city of New York, and I had it in my mind to offer an amendment by and by to provide for that.

Mr. MURPHY—Then the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] and myself agree.

Mr. FOLGER—So far.

Mr. MURPHY—I will offer an amendment myself.

The PRESIDENT—No amendment is in order, there being two amendments already pending.

Mr. SPENCER—If I may be allowed to answer the question of the gentleman from Franklin [Mr. Seaver] I will state that the amendment I proposed does contemplate uniformity of decisions in the supreme court, so far as uniformity is practicable, and that it is just as attainable under the plan I propose as under the section in its present form.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a question of privilege. I believe we passed a resolution that no gentleman should speak more than once upon any question, and if any gentleman who has spoken once upon this question undertakes to speak again, I shall consider it my duty and privilege to rise and object.

Mr. SPENCER—I call for the ayes and noes on the amendment.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Spencer, and it was declared lost.

The question then recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. Hale.

Mr. HALE—I call for the ayes and noes.

Mr. FOLGER—I wish to ask the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] whether his plan proposes a system of circuit duty separate from general term duty.

Mr. HALE—It does to this extent—

Mr. FOLGER—The gentleman has answered me. That proposition—

Mr. HALE—No, I have not answered the gentleman. I say it does to this extent: It provides that the justices shall not sit at general term, but the general term judges be allowed to sit at circuit and perform circuit duty.

Mr. FOLGER—I suppose that that proposition has been already discussed in the committee. I only wish now to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that it is a proposition that has been voted down repeatedly.

A sufficient number seconding the call for the ayes and noes they were ordered.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Hale, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Archer, Axtell, Baker, Barto, Bickford, E. Brooks, Case, Cassidy, Cheritree, Colahan, Comstock, Cooke, Ferry, Fuller, Grant, Graves, Hale, Hammond, Hand, Hardenburgh, Krum, Landon, M. H. Lawrence, Miller, Pond, Potter, Prindle, Rathbun, Schell, Silvester, Smith, S. Townsend, Tucker, Wales—34.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Ballard, Barker, Beals, Beckwith, Bell, Bergen, Bowen, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Chesebro, Cochran, Corbett, Curtis, Daly, Duganne, C C. Dwight, Eddy, Ely, Endress, Evarts, Farnum, Field, Flagler, Folger, Fowler, Garvin, Goodrich, Gould, Hadley, Hatch, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Kinney, A. Lawrence, Lee, Livingston, Ludington, Magee, Mattice, McDonald, Merrill, Merritt, Merwin, Monell, Morris, Murphy, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, President, Reynolds, Robertson, Rogers, Rumsey, L. W. Russell, Schumaker, Seaver, Sheldon, Spencer, Stratton, Tappen, Van Campen, Van Cott, Wakeman, Williams, Young—72.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to strike out, beginning with the words "one-half" and continuing down to the end of the section. By the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole, by which the judges are to be elected by districts, this provision is rendered unnecessary.

Mr. VAN COTT—It is not rendered unnecessary because the section does not determine the question as to how many of the judges shall be elected in each district in the first department. I suggested an amendment which I intended to offer, to insert after the word "reside" in line thirteen the words "and shall be elected." The sentence will then read "one-half of the justices in each department shall reside, and shall be elected in the district of such department at the time of their election." I do not offer this amendment now, however, because it will better come in in another place.

Mr. MURPHY—We have nowhere fixed what shall be the number in each district. If we adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] —

Mr. FOLGER—If the gentleman will refer to section 6, he will see that justices of the supreme court shall be elected by the electors of their respective districts; and —

Mr. MURPHY—It struck me that the amendment suggested by my colleague from Kings [Mr. Van Cott] would effect the purpose.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Ten of the judges are given to the city of New York; I desire to ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee if it is not the scheme of that committee that each district shall have four judges?

Mr. FOLGER—Each district is to have four judges, except the first district, which is to have more than four, and which will be provided for by an amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Van Cott] when we come to the sixteenth section.

Mr. BECKWITH—I hope this provision will not be stricken out. My reason is this: when we come to section 16 there will be offered, I have no doubt, an amendment to strike out "district" and insert "department." And then how shall we be situated? The judges will be elected by departments, and they may all be elected in one district. I trust this will not be done. It is well known that the judges, as they are now located in the different districts, afford somewhat of an opportunity for the profession to transact business, especially special term business, in some neighborhood in their vicinity In my neighborhood we have no judge within one hundred and fifty miles in one direction. If he is absent at general term or circuit, then we have to travel about one hundred and fifty miles to get to a supreme court. Members of the profession know very well that, under the old system, we were a great deal better pleased than we are now. Our accommodation was greater than it is now, because, at that time, we had supreme court commissioners who could do the chamber business. We have now, it is true, a county judge who may do that work; but county judges in the country are permitted to practice; if they have been counsel in a case they cannot act. Hence we are forced to travel one hundred and thirty to one hundred and fifty miles to obtain an order. If this motion prevails, and then a motion should be made, as I have no doubt it will be, to strike out the word "district" and insert the word "department," then we shall be in that position. The fourth judicial district is to be united to the third district, and all the judges can be elected in the third district. Then we shall have to travel a distance of one hundred and seventy miles to reach a judge, without having a supreme court official in our neighborhood.

Mr. ALVORD—Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? I would ask whether, if it should so happen, as the gentleman supposed, when we come to the sixteenth section, we cannot, under amendments generally, come back and put this in the right position?

Mr. BECKWITH—I would prefer to have this retained and strike that out if the other prevails. I should be perfectly willing to vote for striking out the word "district" and inserting the word "department," provided you let this stand and add to it "during their continuance in office."

Mr. HALE—Section 16, as adopted by the Committee of the Whole, provides that justices of the supreme court shall be elected by the electors of their respective districts. It is now proposed to strike out this provision, that one-half of the judges shall reside in each of the districts or departments. If that is stricken out, I would like to know how they can be elected by the electors of their respective districts? What will be the districts of the justices of the supreme court when there is no provision in this section which prevents them all being in one district or department? I think that the motive for striking this out is something more than was stated by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger].

Digitized by Google

Mr. FOLGER—If the gentleman [Mr. Hale] thinks that, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HALE—That is satisfactory, Mr. President.

Mr. SPENCER—I offer the following amendment:

Strike out after "district," in line eight, and insert, "There shall be four justices in each judicial district; as many more in the judicial district embracing the city and county of New York as may be authorized by law."

Mr. ROBERTSON—If in order, I will offer another amendment.

The PRESIDENT—It is in order.

Mr. ROBERTSON—The amendment is this: That the city and county of New York shall form one district, and shall be entitled to six justices of the supreme court, and then to strike out the last clause which is proposed by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger]. The gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], I understand, has withdrawn his proposition to strike out the last three lines. As the increase of force in the first district was owing to the population of the city and county of New York, I propose they shall form one district, and be entitled to six justices of the supreme court. I propose to strike out the last part, which allows one-half of ten judges to be elected by the electors of their own districts.

Mr. COOKE—I have no objection to this latter clause; my objection grows out of the sentence which occurs before that.

The PRESIDENT—Is the gentleman speaking to either of the proposed amendments?

Mr. COOKE—To the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson]. The preceding sentence allows the Legislature to provide for an additional justice for each of said departments. Now, to provide after that, that they shall be divided equally between the two districts, one-half to be elected by each district, I think it will make it quite inconvenient to divide the ninth man between the two districts. [Laughter.] It will require an equal half of each district. Again, this sentence to which I allude will be inconvenient in any aspect of the question, because the sixteenth section requires all the justices to be elected by their respective districts.

Mr. R. A. BROWN—I have an amendment which I desire to state, and I hope the gentleman will accept it. It is in line twelve, to strike out the word "each," and insert in place of it the word "either," or "any;" and to strike out "department," and insert "district."

Mr. ROBERTSON—I will accept the amendment.

Mr. VAN COTT—I shall propose presently, if the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson] is not adopted, to change the phraseology of the ninth line of the sixth section, so that it will read, in place of "ten thereof," "five thereof." The city of Brooklyn, to-day, has a population of nearly one-half of that of the city of New York, yet with it is included the counties of Rockland, Kings, Queens, Suffolk, Westchester, Orange, Putnam and Dutchess. New York has provision made for it for eighteen superior judges, besides its force of criminal judges. I think that is too large a proportion to allow the city of New York, which has still provision for an additional justice. If that amendment is adopted I shall propose to divide the ten judges between the first and second districts, by the insertion of three or four words in this section.

Mr. MURPHY—I have a very high regard for the committee which prepared this section, but I confess I cannot understand exactly what it means. So far as I can read, the insertion of the word "department" has no effect. As I understand the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] there is no further provision in the article which recognizes or provides what he seeks to have done, viz., general terms in those departments instead of general terms in the district.

Mr. VAN COTT—The eighth section provides expressly for that.

Mr. MURPHY—I was about to ask the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] what was the reason of this last provision being inserted, that one-half of the justices shall reside in each district or each department, so far as regards the city of New York. What was the motive of the committee?

Mr. FOLGER—The motive of the committee in presenting that number was, that we conceived that a great relative proportion of the law business of the State was done in those two districts; therefore we provided for an additional force of judicial power, putting five in the first district and five in the second.

Mr. MURPHY—I understand the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson] is in opposition to what was determined by the committee, and I am therefore bound to vote against his amendment. I think the object which we are all seeking might be accomplished by amending this section by striking out in the thirteenth line the word "reside," and inserting the words "be elected." If the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robertson] shall prevail, I shall make this proposition.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Robertson, and it was declared lost.

Mr. MURPHY—I propose to amend by striking out the word "reside," in the thirteenth line, and inserting the words "be elected."

Mr. SPENCER—Might not the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] so modify his amendment as to make it any additional district, instead of that embracing the city and county of New York, so that it will read as follows: "There shall be four justices in each judicial district, and such additional justices in any judicial district as may be authorized by law."

There being no objection, the amendment was so modified.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I now desire to repeat to the Convention what I was about to say when I was on the floor before, that I cannot understand the necessity of this distribution into departments, since the Convention have come down to the selection of judges in the judicial districts, of which there are now eight. I would like to ask from any member of the committee what earthly object there is in this system of distribution?

Digitized by Google

Mr. RATHBUN—I am not on the Committee on the Judiciary, but I understand the object to be this—that a general term may be taken from the districts forming the department—one general term to meet in both of the districts.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—The gentleman means that a scheme is contemplated of one general term in a department.

Mr. RATHBUN—That is it. You get rid of four general terms in the State and have four left.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—You get rid of four general terms. I was about to say to the members of the Convention that when we come down to the eighth section, an opportunity will be afforded to provide for the organization and designation of justices to hold these terms, under a plan simpler, I think, and one that will accommodate all those, or most of those, who have been in antagonism. I will read, so they may vote and pass upon it, if they see fit. I propose to substitute in the eighth section, when we reach it, this proposition: that the Legislature, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall provide for the organization of three or more general terms, leaving it to the molding hand of the agents of the people, having no departmental system, and that these general terms shall be general terms of the State. I think that three will perform the duty. I have made it imperative upon the Legislature to create at least three, but still leave it open by the words "or more." They may make "three or more." I use the language of the section reported by the Judiciary Committee. "But provision shall be made by law for designating ten or more of said justices," that is the thirty-four to compose the supreme court judges of this State, "three or more of whom shall be designated to hold the general term." Those who advocate the scheme of an absolute divorce of the general term from the circuit can be satisfied by this, and those who desire, strange as it may appear, an interchange of thought and action between the circuits and the general terms, can be satisfied in this respect. It leaves the matter plastic and flexible. If the scheme works wrongly the Legislature can alter it. As the system now is, you have iron-bound it by departments and by districts. You give the seventh and fourth districts the same legal effective force that you give the third and second districts, and the city of New York. Now, I want it as a general wants his army, so that he can send his forces wherever they are necessary. I think I am right in saying that one-sixth, if not one-fifth of the legal business of this State is done in the city of New York. Yet by this iron-bound and straight-jacket system you have just as much force in a rural district as you have where it is most needed. You cannot alter it without great trouble.

Mr. BARKER—It must be confessed that the language used in this section is rather unfortunate. There are two ideas designed to be presented. One is, that the State shall be divided into eight judicial districts, and that it shall also be divided into four departments, embracing two districts in each department. I think I have prepared an amendment which will meet all our views. I propose to strike out of the eighth line, the words "thirty-four" and insert "thirty-three." This will provide for thirty-three justices of the supreme court. I then propose to strike out of the section, from and including the word "ten" in the ninth line, and insert the following: "five thereof shall reside in the district in which is the city and county of New York, and four in each of the other districts. But the Legislature shall have power to provide for an additional justice in each district;" and then the section from the eighth line will provide for both districts in the department. It will provide for giving five of these thirty-three judges to the city and county of New York, which the section provides shall be one district. Then it gives the Legislature power hereafter to give an additional judge to each of these districts. We therefore create a district or a department and give to the Legislature power to elect an additional judge in each district. That I think will satisfy the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], and it will give the Legislature power to give the city of New York six judges.

Mr. TAPPEN—In the confident expectation that the Committee on the Judiciary will be able to better this section, I offer this resolution:—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman that the resolution is not now in order.

Mr. TAPPEN—It is a resolution referring the matter to the Committee on Judiciary to revise and report upon to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT—That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. TAPPEN—I withdraw it.

Mr. SPENCER—As the amendment of the gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] differs from mine only in fixing an additional justice provided by the Constitution of the State and authorized by law, I accept it.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Barker, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 47 to 45.

Mr. HALE—I move to amend by striking out the words "additional justices in each district," and insert in the place thereof "additional justices, not exceeding one in each district." It seems to me, as the section reads, it might be a question whether the Legislature could provide for an additional justice in any one district, unless it was extended to all the districts of the State.

Mr. BARKER—I cannot conceive any such possible construction. Each district would be considered by itself, and an additional justice provided.

Mr. HALE—I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not think there is any such language in the present Constitution.

Mr. BARKER—The word "any" can be inserted.

Mr. HALE—That would do perhaps.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I should like to inquire of those who have charge of this section—for I confess I have lost the run of it—what they propose to do with the judges now in office; whether the judges to be elected under the new Constitution in the districts, as that Constitution provides, will depend on the manner in which the State is districted. It may all work very well if the Legislature makes the districts identical with those which now exist, otherwise it will not work at all.

Mr. McDONALD—I offer the following amendment if it be in order.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair cannot decide until he hears it.

Mr. McDONALD—The amendment is as follows: I move to amend the section by striking out all after the word "law," in line three, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The judicial districts of this State shall continue as now until the next enumeration. There shall be four justices in each district, except there shall be five in the first and second judicial districts. There shall be three general terms. The Legislature may provide for a fourth if required. Each general term shall consist of four judges, of whom the chief justice shall be one."

The PRESIDENT—It will be received.

Mr. McDONALD—The object of the amendment is simply to get rid of the difficulties that have been suggested. It provides that the present judicial districts shall be continued, and it allows the other clause, which we have adopted so unanimously, with regard to the continuance of the present judges. It provides for the electing of a justice in the first and second districts, and with regard to the general terms it provides that there shall be three, and that the Legislature may create a fourth.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. McDonald, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Hale.

Mr. HALE—I will withdraw that amendment.

Mr. BAKER—I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the section:

SEC. —. There shall be a supreme court, vested with general original and appellate jurisdiction, in law and equity, subject to such appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeals as may be prescribed by law. Said supreme court shall consist of a chief justice, to be elected by the electors of the State at large, who shall hold his office for the term of twelve years, and of the justices to be elected in each of the eight judicial districts hereinafter mentioned. The Legislature, as soon as practicable after the adoption of this Constitution, shall divide the State into eight judicial districts, of which the city of New York shall be one, and each of the other seven districts to be bounded by county lines, and to be composed of contiguous and compact territory, having an equal population, as near as may be. There shall be four justices of said court elected in each of said eight districts by the electors therein, and as many more in the district composed of the city of New York as may from time to time be authorized by law, but not to exceed in the whole such number in proportion to its population, as shall be in conformity with the number of such judges in the residue of the State in proportion to its population. The justices first to be so elected in such districts shall be classified so that one of the justices of each district shall go out of office at the end of every three years, and after the expiration of their terms under such classification the term of their office shall be twelve years. The chief justice of said court, and the justice in each of said districts having the shortest time to serve, shall constitute the court to hold the general terms thereof at such times and places as may be designated by law. The justices of said court, other than those required to hold the general terms thereof, shall be the justices for holding the circuit courts, special terms of the supreme court, and to preside in the courts of oyer and terminer to be held in the several counties of this State, provided said chief justice or any of the justices of said court shall attain the age of seventy-five years before the end of his term, he shall cease to hold his office longer than the first day of January next after he shall so arrive to the age of seventy-five years.

Mr. BAKER—This is the same amendment I offered in the Committee of the Whole, on which I stated that I would like to have the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Baker, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Archer, Baker, Beals, Chesebro, Grant, Hale, Hammond, Hardenburgh, Ketcham, Kinney, Krum, Landon, M. H. Lawrence, Pond, Rumsey, Schell, Stratton, Tucker—18.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Ballard, Axtell, Barker, Beckwith, Bergen, Bickford, Bowen, E. Brooks, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Cassidy, Cheritree, Cochran, Colahan, Cooke, Corbett, Curtis, Daly, C. C. Dwight, Eddy, Ely, Evarts, Farnum, Field, Folger, Fowler, Fuller, Garvin, Gould, Graves, Hadley, Hand, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Houston, A. Lawrence, Lee, Livingston, Ludington, Magee, Mattice, McDonald, Merrill, Merritt, Merwin, Miller, Monell, Morris, Murphy, Opdyke, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, Potter, President, Rathbun, Reynolds, Robertson, L. W. Russell, Seaver, Silvester, Sheldon, Spencer, Tappen, S. Townsend, Van Cott, Wakeman, Williams—73.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I propose an amendment to be added at the end of the section in order to perfect what I suppose is meant.

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

Amend the section by adding thereto the following:

"But if, when the State shall be so divided, the number of justices then resident in any district shall be less than the number herein specified, one or more judges for such district shall be elected to make up the required number; and if at such time the number of justices so resident in any district shall be greater than herein specified, a reduction to the number required shall take place as soon as may be by the expiration of the official term of any such justice or justices."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote last taken.

Objection being made to the immediate consideration of the motion to reconsider, it was laid upon the table.

Mr. RUMSEY—I offer this amendment to the sixth section.

Digitized by Google

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

Amend the section by striking out all after the word "law," in line three, and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "The Legislature shall divide the State into eight judicial districts, to be bounded by county lines. The city and county of New York shall form one district. There shall be thirty-four justices of the supreme court, six thereof in the city and county of New York, and four in each of the other districts. But the Legislature shall have power to provide for an additional justice in any of said districts."

Mr. RUMSEY—I offer the amendment for the purpose of avoiding the difficulty that has been adverted to in dividing the State into departments. This amendment divests the case of all trouble in the selection and location of justices of the supreme court. The Legislature may provide, or we may provide in the section, for making one, two, three, four or five general terms as is thought best; and it provides for the selecting of justices from the various districts, as the Legislature shall direct.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Rumsey, and it was declared lost.

There being no further amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read section 7 as follows:

SEC. 7. The Legislature shall have the same power to alter and regulate the jurisdiction and proceedings in law and equity as they have heretofore possessed.

There being no amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY read section 8 as follows:

SEC. 8. Provision shall be made by law for designating from time to time the justices who shall hold the general terms, and also for designating from their number a chief justice of each department, who shall act as such during his continuance in office. Four justices in each department shall be designated to hold general terms, and three of them shall form a quorum, and the justices so designated may sit at general term in any district, except as the Legislature may otherwise provide. It shall be competent for any one or more of said judges to hold special terms and circuit courts, and to preside in courts of oyer and terminer in any county as the Legislature may by law direct.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I now propose to move as a substitute for that section the section I read a few moments ago. In rising to make this motion, it is proper for me to say that I do it with a great deal of reluctance, and I would not have adverted to it had it not been that the Convention in a very great degree so marred the scheme of harmony in that report as, in my judgment, necessitates some change in the section. I do not know that the section I propose is perfect; I do not suppose it is. But I propose it because the plan is perfectly simple and flexible. As I said before, we have bound up the State, and compelled judges to sit in localities where half the time they are not needed. We have taken away from the Legislature the power of sending them where they are needed. The scheme I propose has elasticity. The Legislature can provide for as many more than three general terms as are necessary. And then they may chose, also, a member of each, who shall act as chief justice; and the only remaining provision is that any three of them may hold the court. That is simple. As I said a moment ago, it has no confusion about it. It is a court of the State. If you want a general term in one portion of the State where it is needed, you can have it. And I call the attention of the committee to the thirteenth section, which completely answers every objection that has been urged. The thirteenth section of the article of the committee says: "The times and places of holding the terms of the court of appeals and of the general and special terms of the supreme court within the several departments and districts, and the circuit courts and courts of oyer and terminer within the several counties, shall be provided for by law." Now, with this section 8, as I propose to have it incorporated into this article, you will have three, four or five general terms provided for by your Legislature—three at least; and then the law is to provide when and where they shall be held, and how often, and by whom, just as in your present system, in a more moderate degree. The justices of each judicial district may, every two years, by the judiciary act of 1846, select the judge, appoint the place and the time when each circuit in the district shall be held, and, carrying out that principle, I desire that the same thing shall be done in the State at large. Every one perceives the advantage of this in the district system, enabling the justices to appoint more circuits in one county than they do in another; and so in the State they will be enabled to appoint more general terms in one district than in another. Three general terms, I think, will do all the business of the State. But, then, I may be mistaken, and therefore I leave it again to the system plastic in the hands of the Legislature. And also, I want vested in them the power to send these general terms where they are needed, and that they shall be general terms of the State, and not of any particular locality. That gives them power. That gives them consequence, and the suitor or his lawyer will hesitate to go to the court of appeals after the judgment or the decision of such a tribunal. The trouble now is that the general term, located in a district, is a mere conduit—the lawyer only stops there until he can obtain the decision and then he goes to the court of appeals. I think a system of this kind will vastly decrease the business in the court of appeals, because the lawyers and suitors will rely upon the decisions of the general term more than they do now in the system that we have here. But I rely upon it more in consequence of its flexibility. If I am wrong in the details the Legislature can correct them, which is not the case with any other system that has been proposed here. A plan was proposed by some gentleman, the main feature of which is that the people should elect the general term judges. But there is this objection: the people cannot select which of these judges is best to do general term business so well as the Senate of the State can do it, or the Legislature can do it. Their term of office is the same; their salaries and emoluments are the same.

Here the gavel fell, the speaker's time having expired.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I would like to have five minutes more.

Objection was made.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the substitute offered by Mr. Hardenburgh, which was read by the Secretary as follows:

SEC. 8. The Legislature at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall provide for the creation and organization of three or more general terms of the supreme court; and provision shall be made by law for designating ten or more of the said justices of the said supreme court, who shall hold the same; and also for designating from such number a chief justice for each of said general terms, who shall act as such during his continuance in office. Only three or more of the said justices so designated may hold such general terms.

Mr. BARTO demanded the ayes and noes on the adoption of this amendment.

A sufficient number not seconding the call they were not ordered.

Mr. SILVESTER—I move to strike out the word "three" in the last clause and insert "four," if that amendment is in order.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I only desire to say a word. I think that three is sufficient to hold a court, and the Legislature can increase that number if it is thought best. And in this connection, if I am in order, I desire to say a word more in support of the proposition precisely as it is. I think the stumbling block in the Committee of the Whole—and I think the members of this Convention will agree with me in this respect—was, how we should create this general term. The gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], seeking for an absolute divorce of the general term from the circuit, and other members opposing it, and other schemes being proposed for the election of the general term judges by the people, and the committee claiming that it should be selected or designated by the Legislature. Now then, the proposition I have made, if it is clearly understood by the Convention, will be found to answer all the objections made to both these schemes. The Legislature, when they meet under this Constitution, if we are fortunate enough to have it adopted by the people, designates out of the whole college of judges ten men, if there are three courts, and more if there are more; but they designate at their first session a sufficient number of men to work these general terms of the State. What follows? I speak this to those who are in favor of the absolute divorce which has been rejected by this body, and I say to those friends, that if the Legislature nominates—designates these men to hold general terms, what earthly inducement is there for them to change them to the circuits, unless it work badly. If it works badly, I still leave in the Legislature the power to return to the present system. But if it works well, any one knows they never would do it. If it seems best that they should alternate, as the gentleman from New York suggested, from the circuit to the general term, the power lies in the Legislature to provide for that also. It is the flexibility and elasticity of this system that I present here, over all others, that recommends it to me. It is more plastic. The people can change it. Nothing is stubborn about, it except the materials out of which they are to build their structure. And that is what is wanting in every other scheme. That is what is the difficulty with the scheme under which we have lived for twenty years. You cannot transfer your general term from one geographical division of the State to another where it is wanted. I am very sorry this amendment could not have been introduced earlier when it could have been printed, read, and thought of by the members. It comes up here suddenly, and men hesitate to adopt a proposition that they cannot look over and con over, in the place of a solemn report made by such distinguished and able gentlemen as have presented this report to the Convention. And that is the difficulty under which we all labor.

Mr. SILVESTER—I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the amendment of Mr. Hardenburgh.

Mr. SILVESTER—I demand the ayes and noes.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I rise to a point of order. The ayes and noes were asked for and refussd.

Mr. SILVESTER—Pending that call I offered an amendment.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—They were called for by the gentleman from Tompkins [Mr. Barto], and thirteen was the count of the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Hardenburgh, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 48 to 48.

Mr. SILVESTER—I call for the ayes and noes.

The PRESIDENT—They have been asked and refused.

Mr. SILVESTER—I move a reconsideration of the vote.

Objection being made to the immediate reconsideration of the motion, it was laid on the table under the rule.

There being no further amendment offered to the section, the SECRETARY proceeded to read section 9 as follows:

SEC. 9. No judge of the court of appeals, or of the supreme court at general term shall sit in review of a decision in which he formerly participated.

No amendment being offered to the section, the SECRETARY proceeded to read section 10 as follows:

SEC. 10. Where a vacancy shall occur in the office of justice of the supreme court three months prior to a general election, the same shall be filled at such election, and until any vacancy can be so filled, by the advice and consent of the Senate, if the Senate shall be in session, or if not in session the Governor alone may appoint to fill such vacancy. Any such appointment shall continue until the first day of January next after the election at which the vacancy can be filled.

Mr. BICKFORD—I move to strike out "three" in the second line, and insert "two." There is no difficulty at all in filling a vacancy which shall occur within one month before election, and certainly not if it occurs two months before. The district conventions are held in September, and if the vacancy occurs before the first of September there is no difficulty in filling it. If it occur in August, as it now stands, a judge would hold nearly a year and a half under the appointment by the Governor. If the vacancy is to be filled by an election by the people I insist that it is fair that they should have a chance of filling it whenever they are able to do it.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Bickford, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COMSTOCK—This section was drawn by myself, and I do not know but it needs a slight amendment in order to remove any doubt as to its interpretation. I propose, therefore, to insert after the word "election," in the third line, the words "for a full term," so that the election shall not be for the unexpired term of his predecessor, but for the constitutional term of office.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

Mr. COMSTOCK—As there seems to be no objection, I will ask unanimous consent to make a similar amendment in the section in regard to filling vacancies in the court of appeals in the fifth section, third line.

The PRESIDENT—No objection being made, the amendment will be made by the Secretary.

Mr. CHESEBRO—What does the gentleman propose to do with the words that follow, "and until any vacancy can be so filled;" will he leave those?

Mr. COMSTOCK—The appointment will continue "until any vacancy can be so filled"; until the election of the following year, unless the vacancy happens within three months of an election.

Mr. FOLGER—I would ask the gentleman whether he means that it shall be for fourteen years?

Mr. COMSTOCK—Yes, sir. The full term of office, so as to preclude the idea of electing for short, unexpired terms; I mean, that in all cases an election by the people shall be for a full term.

Mr. FOLGER—The language fails to convey that idea.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The full term is fourteen years. I believe the language conveys the idea expressly.

Mr. FOLGER—The evidence that it does not is in my asking the question. I did not know whether the gentleman meant for the full residue of the unexpired term, or for the full term of fourteen years.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I simply mean, that, when a judge dies or resigns, his successor shall be elected by the people for a full term of fourteen years.

There being no further amendment offered, to the section the SECRETARY proceeded to read section 11 as follows:

SEC. 11. At the general election in the year 1873 there shall be submitted to the people, in such manner as the Legislature shall provide by law, to be determined by the electors of the State, the question: "Shall vacancies as they occur in the office of the judges and justices mentioned in sections 2, 6, 15 and 18, of article VI of the Constitution be filled by appointment?" And if the majority of all the electors voting on such question at such election shall vote that such vacancies shall be so filled, then thereafter all vacancies in the office of judge of the court of appeals, justices of the supreme court, judges of the superior court of the city of New York, and of the court of common pleas of the city and county of New York, and of the superior court of the city of Buffalo, and county judge, shall be filled by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: or if the Senate is not in session, by the Governor, but in such case the term of office shall expire at the end of the session of the Senate next after such appointment.

The PRESIDENT—Are there any amendments to this section?

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I move to strike out that section. In my judgment, when so important a change as that of appointing judges of the court of appeals, justices of the supreme court, and of the various courts in the city of New York and Buffalo, and county judges in every county in the State by the Governor and the Senate, instead of electing them by the people—when a question of that importance is agitated by the people, it will be one of sufficient importance to justify an amendment of the Constitution in the usual way, and not to have the question brought up under a provision of this character, contained in the Constitution itself, which may be insufficiently brought before the attention of the people, and perhaps, inadvertently, a change may be wrought which will not be in accordance with their deliberate judgment, and different from that result which would have been reached under the usual proceeding to amend the Constitution.

Mr. MURPHY—The question, I understand, is on the adoption of this section.

The PRESIDENT—The question is upon striking out the section.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I demand the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. E. A. Brown, to strike out the section, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. N. M. Allen, Axtell, Baker, Barlard, Beals, Bell, Bergen, E. Brooks, E. A. Brown, Cassidy, Cochran, Colahan, Cooke, Corbett, Field, Flagler, Fuller, Goodrich, Grant, Graves, Hadley, Hammond, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Kinney, Landon, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Livingston, Ludington, Mattice, McDonald, Murphy, Nelson, Pond, Sckell, Schumaker, Spencer, Tappen, S. Townsend, Tucker, Wakeman, Young—43.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Barker, Barto, Beckwith, Bickford, Bowen, Case, Chesebro, Comstock, Curtis, Daly, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Eddy, Ely, Evarts, Farnum, Folger, Fowler, Garvin, Gould, Hale, Hardenburgh, Hatch, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Krum, A. Sheldon, Smith, Stratton, Van Campen, Van Cott, Williams—56.

Mr. MURPHY—Amendments are in order I believe in this section?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair holds that amendments are not in order. The Chair called for amendments before putting the motion to strike out. The negative on striking out is equivalent to the affirmative on agreeing. But no objection being made the amendment will be received.

Mr. MURPHY—I move to strike out in the tenth, eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth lines, the following:

"Judges of the superior court of the city of New York, and of the court of common pleas for the city and county of New York, and of the superior court of the city of Buffalo and county judge."

I do that, sir, as a matter of principle. I object, as I have repeatedly, upon this floor, to this discrimination between different parts of the State, one against the other. We have a court in the city of Brooklyn called the "city court." It has causes as important, judges as learned, and it does as much business as any court in any city in the State. I suppose the same fact exists in regard to other cities. I think if we are to adopt any principle, it should be one to apply equally to all parts of the State. I propose to strike out these local courts that are mentioned here, inasmuch as they do not mention all the local courts, and confine it to judges of the court of appeals and judges of the supreme court. It should apply to all parts of the State equally.

Mr. ALVORD—I wish to ask the gentleman a question; whether he begins far enough back in this matter? The courts of the city of New York and the city of Brooklyn, and the city of Buffalo and courts named here are courts which the other counties of this State cannot have.

Mr. MURPHY—The gentleman is mistaken; he is pretty accurate generally, but he is mistaken. The city of Brooklyn is not named in the section.

Mr. ALVORD—I see I am wrong in regard to the city of Brooklyn.

Mr. MURPHY—I am sorry to say that I see in this article the influence of members of this Convention in that committee. I see reservations in favor of certain cities which are not extended to others. I do not wish to be invidious here and mention names, but to me it is perfectly apparent that the influence of individuals has perverted this section from what it ought to be. I seek to have a general principle adopted in this Constitution wherever it can be, and I am not willing that there should be provisions made here of a constitutional character in regard to courts in the smaller city of Buffalo which are denied the courts in the city of Brooklyn, containing nearly a half million of people.

Mr. VAN COTT—If amendments are in order I move to insert in the thirteenth line after the word "Buffalo," the words "and of the city court of Brooklyn," which will obviate this difficulty.

The PRESIDENT—The amendment will be received by unanimous consent.

Mr. EVARTS—The gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] will see that it is necessary for the completion of his amendment that the numbers "fifteen" and "eighteen" should be stricken out in the fifth line; otherwise we shall have asked the people to say, by their vote on the question, whether the judges of the superior court of New York and the common pleas of that city, and the superior court of Buffalo and county judges should be appointed or elected, and they shall have voted in favor of appointment, and notwithstanding this decision, the gentleman's amendment, as he offers it, would provide that they should continue to be elected. Now, the clause as reported by the Judiciary Committee was intended to cover all the constitutional courts of record. The addition of the county judges was inserted by the Convention in Committee of the Whole. I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] will not prevail. He will see at once that he needs to strike out "fifteen" and "eighteen" if he presses his amendment.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Van Cott, and it was declared carried.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. Murphy.

Mr. MURPHY—I do not wish to trespass much on the time of the Convention, but it seems to me more proper, instead of naming the city court of Brooklyn, to say "the judges of all city courts, which shall be recognized by law as having jurisdiction."

The PRESIDENT—Does the gentleman move that as a substitute for his motion to strike out?

Mr. MURPHY—I do, sir; I am desirous that the people should vote on this question with some kind of uniformity.

Mr. COOKE—I would propose this further amendment to that of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy]; that we strike out the specification of the courts altogether, and let it read "all vacancies in the office of judge and justice of all courts of record." I move to strike out after the word "judge" in line nine down to and including the word "judge" in the thirteenth line.

Mr. MURPHY—I accept the amendment.

Mr. COMSTOCK—As a substitute I move to strike out all the enumeration of courts except the court of appeals, and the justices of the supreme court. I think it desirable to take the expression of the people, for or against the elective principle, in such a manner that the result will be free from the influence of locality. Now, the judges of the superior court and court of common pleas of New York, and the superior court of Buffalo, and of the counties in the State, are all elected by localities, and you would never get a perfect expression in that way, of the views of all the people of the State upon the question of electing or appointing their judges. I therefore think that we had better consult the people only in regard to their judges, who are chosen by the votes of the whole people of the State, and then we shall get an opinion from them free from special circumstances and local influences. And if, on the whole, the verdict of the people shall be, on such a submission, in favor of the appointive principle, it can be afterward carried, by constitutional amendments, to localities.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be upon the substitute proposed by Mr. Comstock.

The ayes and noes were called for. There not being a sufficient number to second the call they were not ordered.

The question was then put on the adoption of the substitute proposed by Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

Mr. BARKER—I move a reconsideration of the last vote.

Objection being made to its immediate reconsideration, the motion was laid upon the table under the rule.

Mr. BERGEN—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Bergen, and it was declared lost.

Mr. FOLGER—I move that this article be the special order for to-morrow on the same order of business on which it was taken up to-day—as unfinished business

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

Mr. BERGEN—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Bergen, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 19, 1867.

The Convention met at ten A. M., pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by Rev. J. T. PECK, D. D.,

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. GOULD asked leave of absence for the remainder of the week for Mr. C. L. Allen of Washington; also for Mr. Hale of Essex.

Mr. ANDREWS asked leave of absence for Mr. Rogers of New York, until Wednesday morning of next week.

There being no objection, leave of absence was granted in each case.

Mr. OPDYKE presented the memorial of George M. Rose relative to suffrage in the city of New York.

Which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAND presented the memorial of C. O. Root, clerk of Broome county, and twenty-seven prominent citizens of Binghamton, asking for a uniform system of licensure of medical practitioners and the establishment of proper pharmaceutical regulations, and asked for a select committee of three to whom the memorial should be referred.

Mr. COLAHAN presented a memorial from Dr. Burnett and twenty-five other medical men in Westchester county, asking for a uniform system of licensure of medical practitioners and the establishment of proper pharmaceutical regulations.

Also, the memorial of citizens of Gardner, Ulster county, for the same.

Also, the memorial of citizens of Pomfret, Chautauqua county, for the same.

Also, memorials of citizens of Wayne county, for the same purpose.

Mr. COLAHAN—I ask that these memorials be laid upon the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT—They will lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from A. G. Johnson, in relation to the report made to the Convention by a committee of the Regents of the University, which was read by the Secretary.

Mr. BALLARD—I move that the communication be printed for the use of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—That motion will be referred to the standing Committee on Printing.

Mr. STRATTON, from the select committee to report what accommodations could be provided in the city of New York or elsewhere for the sessions of the Convention after the 1st of January next, without expense to the State, submitted the following report:

The committee appointed by a resolution of the Convention to ascertain and report what accommodations can be provided in the city of New York, or elsewhere, for the sessions of the Convention after the first of January next, without expense to the State, submit the following report:

Your committee, in the discharge of its duty, visited the city of New York, and made an examination of several rooms recommended to the committee as proper and convenient for the meetings of the Convention. The rooms thus inspected are under the supervision of regiments of the national guard, and have been fitted up by the authorities of that city for armories. One of these rooms, that of the Seventh regiment, has already been generously tendered for the use of the Convention by Colonel Clark It is situated over Tompkins market, on the east side of Third avenue, at the junction of Third and Fourth avenues with the Bowery. The main hall is 185 feet by 95 feet. It is situated on the third floor, is easy of access, and is well lighted. Other rooms on the floor below the one last mentioned were also examined by your committee, one 40x60 and another 80x60. The room of the Twenty-second regiment armory, on Fourteenth street, near Sixth avenue, is about 110x80, and central in location. That of the Thirty-seventh regiment armory is situated at the intersection of Broadway and Sixth avenue, at Thirty-fifth street. The room is about 65x40, is well lighted and arranged. These several rooms are connected with others which could be used to facilitate the business of the Convention, and would, if properly furnished, answer the wants of the Convention as a place of meeting. Your committee called upon the mayor of the city of New York, and stated to him the object of your committee's visit to that city. He expressed a desire that the Convention should adjourn to New York, but regretted that the city had not the power or authority to offer to the Convention the facility that would be required by way of furnishing the rooms necessary for the wants of the Convention, in the transaction of its business. In response to a cordial invitation from the mayor of the city of Troy, your committee yesterday visited that city, and were generously received on their arrival by the mayor and a committee of the common council of that city. The municipal authorities of Troy, extended, through your committee, to the Convention, an earnest and hearty invitation to hold its sessions in that city, after the present month. They proffer to us, free of expense to the State, a large and commodious hall, 84x36, with a room adjoining, 45x36, together with other rooms in the same building, which they place at the disposal of the Convention. These rooms they propose to furnish and arrange in any manner the Convention may desire for its convenience. The building in which these rooms are situated is in the heart of the city, and convenient to the principal hotels. In the building is a well selected library of seventeen thousand volumes, and a large and commodious reading room in which are the leading newspapers and periodicals of the day. Your committee made diligent inquiries in regard to the accommodations at Troy for the comfort and convenience of the members of the Convention in case of the acceptance of their offer. There are three good and commodious hotels in near proximity to the hall tendered your committee. These hotels have every accommodation for the comfort and convenience of their guests, and which are offered at prices which your committee think reasonable. In addition to these, there are other hotels and numerous first-class boarding-houses, at which members could be accommodated at rates even less than those at the three hotels named. The authorities of Troy express a strong desire to have the Convention adjourn to that place, and your committee have no doubt but that in the event of an adjournment to that place, every facility would be extended, calculated to promote the business of its sessions, as well as the personal comfort of its members. Your committee refrain from making any recommendation, and submit the foregoing for the information and consideration of the Convention.

Respectfully submitted,

NORMAN STRATTON,
T. T. FLAGLER,
TRACY BEADLE,
E. P. MORE,
Committee.

ALBANY, December 19, 1867.

Mr. STRATTON—I would say in this connection, that the other member of the committee, Mr. A. R. Lawrence, of New York, was with the committee in their examinations in New York, and also at their interview with Mayor Hoffman. I now ask the Secretary to read the communication from the Mayor of Troy.

The SECRETARY read the communication as follows:

MAYOR'S OFFICE.
TROY, N. Y., Dec. 19, 1867.

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION:—I am requested by the Common Council of this city, and by numerous citizens, to say to you, that should you see fit to adjourn the sessions of the Convention to Troy, that the hall of the Young Men's Association will be arranged for your use under your directions, and that the large picture gallery and the offices of the mayor and city clerk, adjoining the same, are at your disposal for committee rooms, or such other use as your business may require; and that every effort will be made by our authorities and citizens generally, to make your sojourn here comfortable and pleasant.

Very respectfully,
JOHN T. FLAGG,
Mayor of Troy.

Mr. STRATTON—I think I ought to state one thing further, in connection with that report, for the information of the Convention. Communications were received by your committee from the proprietors of two of the principal hotels in Troy, stating their terms. At the Troy House they offer first-class rooms, with fire, at twenty-five dollars per week; and second-class rooms from eighteen to twenty dollars per week. At the Mansion House they offer first-class rooms, including fire, at two dollars and a half per day; and second-class rooms for two dollars per day.

Mr. FLAGLER—While, as one of the committee, I refrained from recommending any particular place for our sessions, yet, as a member of the Convention, I embodied the opinion which I have on that subject in the resolutions that I send to the Chair.

The SECRETARY read the resolutions as follows:

Resolved, That this Convention accept the offer of the municipal authorities of the city of Troy to provide rooms suitably fitted up and furnished for the future sessions of the Convention.

Resolved, That this Convention will adjourn on Friday, December 20th, at 12 o'clock noon, to meet on Tuesday, January 14, 1868, at 10 o'clock A. M., in the hall tendered them by the authorities of the city of Troy, for the deliberations of the Convention.

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to arrange with the mayor and common council of Troy for placing said rooms in such order as will adapt them to the uses of the Convention.

Mr. FLAGLER—I appreciate and share in the universal desire of the members of this Convention to finish its work at the earliest practicable moment. We must soon yield our present place of meeting to one branch of the Legislature. An adjournment until the final adjournment of the Legislature restores to us the occupation of this chamber, is open to serious objections which I will not take time to recapitulate. The choice is offered to the Convention of meeting either in Albany or Troy (after a recess for the holidays), for the completion of our labors. After a careful examination of the relative advantages and disadvantages involved in the propositions of these two cities for the accommodation of the Convention, it is my decided conviction that it is preferable to accept the kind and hearty offer of the city of Troy, for the following among other reasons, viz.:

1. While the rooms offered by these two cities are not in either case equal to those now used by the Convention, those proffered by Troy are the most spacious, are eligibly located in a central part of the city, are near the principal hotels of the place, are in immediate proximity to a reading room and extensive library which are placed at the service of the Convention, and will, when arranged and furnished as proposed, quite as well or better accommodate the Convention as those which the city of Albany offers to supply.

2. Troy can at all times be reached from all parts of the State by members as well as Albany.

3. The personal convenience and comfort of members will be promoted in that Troy has three large and well-kept hotels and numerous excellent boarding-houses, which will enable them to select and make satisfactory and reasonable arrangements for board and lodging, which will hardly be the case if they are compelled to compete and scramble with members of the Legislature and others for the meager but costly accommodations of Albany.

4. There are ample facilities in Troy for doing the printing required by the Convention, or it may with very little inconvenience or delay be sent to Albany for execution under the existing arrangements.

5. By holding its sessions in Troy the members of the Convention will avoid being connected with the numerous local projects which engross so large a share of the time of the Legislature, and may quietly and without any interruption prosecute their labors to a close.

6. Albany is, and long has been largely favored with public patronage incident to its being the capital of the State. Troy, to say the least, is equally deserving, but what has she ever received?

7. Troy offers this Convention a hearty welcome, and her public spirited authorities, and enterprising and large-hearted citizens will spare no pains to insure the comfort of it members, and facilitate the dispatch of its business; can the Convention afford to decline their kind and generous proposals?

My first choice then, Mr. President, is to hold the future sessions of the Convention in Troy; my next, as an alternative, to meet in this chamber after the final adjournment of the Legislature; and last and most objectionable of all, to holding our sessions in this city simultaneous with the sitting of the Legislature.

Mr. BELL—I move to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Niagara [Mr. Flagler] by substituting the resolution of the committee first chosen, who reported in favor of adjourning the future sessions of this Convention to the City Hall in Albany. I have no doubt that the authorities and citizens of Troy would do every thing in their power for the comfort and convenience of this body, should we decide to adjourn to that city; but it does seem to me, sir, that the difference between the size of the room which they offer us, and the size of the one which we can obtain in Albany, is so immaterial that it would not warrant the adjournment of this Convention to the city of Troy. If I understand the report that was read this morning it stated that the room in Troy is only ten feet longer and four wider than the common council chamber in the City Hall in Albany; and really, the extra room that that would afford is entirely immaterial, for it has been ascertained that the common council chamber of this city is sufficiently large to accommodate all the members of this body, so that the surplus room there could be only used for spectators and visitors. There are many reasons that will occur to every member of this Convention, why we should remain in Albany; and I cannot see that we gain any important advantage by this proposed change. With our records here, and our contracts for printing, and various other things, it would be a great detriment to the future progress of the business of the Convention to leave this city; and looking the matter all over, and considering it as well as the opportunity will permit, I am decidedly in favor of the resolution recommended by the committee, of which the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt] is chairman.

Mr. ALVORD—Without intending to express at this time my own desire in reference to the place of our future meetings, I would like to amend the resolution under consideration by striking out "twelve o'clock noon, Friday," and inserting "Friday, after the evening session;" and by striking out "the fourteenth of January" and inserting "the seventh of January."

Mr. MORRIS—Mr. Chairman, among the rooms described by the committee which has just reported is that room of the Twenty-second national guard regiment, on Fourteenth street, near Sixth avenue, New York. Its size is 110 feet by 80 feet—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair must ask the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris] to speak to the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord].

Mr. MORRIS—Then I will reserve my remarks upon that subject until that motion is voted down. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRITT—It seems to me that after an examination of the halls offered in New York—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair must remind the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt] that he can only speak to the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord].

Mr. MERRITT—Do I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] was a complete substitute, or only a motion to amend?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understands it not to have reference to the place of meeting.

Mr. ALVORD—My motion had reference to the original resolution, and it has reference to that resolution, whether we meet at Albany or at Troy, or elsewhere. I moved to amend the resolution by changing the adjournment to Friday after the evening session, and the time for re-assembling to Tuesday, the seventh of January.

Mr. MERRITT—Well, sir, if we shall have gone through the judiciary article by noon tomorrow, I see no objection to our adjourning at that hour, and I am in favor of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Niagara [Mr. Flagler], as to the time of re-assembling; and for these reasons: I would be very glad to meet here on the seventh day of January, but it would be generally inconvenient for members to get together at that time. It is well known that the Legislature will meet here on the seventh of January, and in the confusion which will arise at that time, from the coming of the Legislature and the influx of persons not directly connected with the Legislature, I feel that we should hardly make much progress with our work; but as is usual, after the reorganization of the Legislature, this crowd will leave the city; and, therefore, I think it would be better for us not to meet before the fourteenth. If we were to meet in Troy, I would be in favor of meeting on the seventh; and I hope that this question of time will not be decided until we have fixed on the place of meeting.

Mr. BARKER—I call for the previous question, and a division on the resolution.

Mr. MURPHY—Would that preclude any further amendments?

The PRESIDENT—It would.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Baker, and it was declared lost.

Mr. MERRITT—I ask the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] to withdraw his amendment until after we have voted upon the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell].

Mr. ALVORD—There is no difficulty in the gentleman's calling for a division of the question so as to decide in the first instance the question whether we will meet at Albany or Troy, irrespective of my amendment, so that there can be no possible necessity for withdrawing it.

Mr. MERRITT—If the gentleman [Mr. Alvord] will allow a vote to be taken upon the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell] first, I have no objection.

Mr. ALVORD—I desire, sir, that this should follow the usual rule in reference to this matter. I wish to answer the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt], in regard to the time of reassembling. If you meet here in Albany instead of Troy, I see a great propriety in meeting on the seventh instead of the fourteenth. We are here now for the purpose of re-framing the Constitution of the State, and we have been working very considerably for the last four or five months undertaking to cure the evils of corruption in the Legislature. Now I am afraid—I won't say that the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt] will be there—but I am afraid that if we defer our meeting until the fourteenth many members of this Convention will come here just before the seventh in order to manage the election of officers in the Legislature; and if they are here in this body in the discharge of their legitimate duties they will be out of the reach of that difficulty. [Laughter.]

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Without, at this moment, undertaking to say any thing as to where this Convention had better meet after the proposed adjournment, I wish to make this suggestion, that if new rooms are to be fitted up for our accommodation in New York, or in Troy, or in Albany, three weeks may be a better period for adjournment than two, because rooms cannot be fitted up for our accommodation without considerable work by the carpenter. I make that suggestion because I think that the longer period would be better whenever we adjourn, if we go to any other place than this hall.

Mr. EVARTS—An additional reason why a recess until the fourteenth rather than the seventh would be more suitable may be found in the suggestion that the labors of the Committee on Revision and the printing of the Constitution, so far as it has received the action of this Convention, can be more surely and more thoroughly completed by the fourteenth than by the seventh. In regard to the place of meeting, Mr. President, I had occasion to say, when the subject was up last week, that, as between sitting in Albany or in New York, I preferred the city of New York. If accommodations could not be had there, or the Convention should not so remove, or shall find it necessary to sit in Albany, I propose an adjournment until May. I have a great repugnance to attempting a resumption and completion of our labors at this place during the presence of the Legislature. I am afraid that every article from the first to the last would be reopened, redebated, reconsidered by the new influx of wisdom that would come from the assembling of the Legislature, and no man could tell at the end of our labors what part was done by us and what by the Legislature. Yet there are many reasons why we should not postpone the completion of our labors as late as the month of May. I hope, therefore, in the same spirit with which the invitation has been given it will be accepted.

Mr. HATCH—Is an amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT—It is not in order. There are two amendments pending.

Mr. HATCH—At the proper time, if nobody else does, I shall move an amendment to go to the city of New York. As I understand the report in relation to these different places—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman will please confine himself to the pending question. The Chair must restrict the debate to the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord], which has reference simply to the time of convening the Convention.

Mr. HATCH—I thought from the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts], that the whole subject was open.

The PRESIDENT—It is not so.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Alvord and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 31 to 69.

Mr. BELL—I only intended by my amendment to designate the place for the future meetings of the Convention, without regard to the time of adjournment.

Mr. BICKFORD—I offer the following as a substitute for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Niagara [Mr. Flagler].

Mr. FLAGLER—I rise to a question of order. I would inquire of the Chair whether a substitute is in order while a previous substitute is pending?

The PRESIDENT—It will be read for information.

The SECRETARY read the substitute as follows:

Resolved, That this Convention will, on Monday, December 23d, 1867, at nine o'clock P. M., take a recess until Thursday, January 2d, 1868, at seven o'clock P. M.; and that the Committee on Revision be instructed to make their final report at the time last named, and that on all subjects on which the Convention shall not then have acted, the said committee incorporate in their report the provisions of the Constitution of 1846; and that this Convention will adjourn sine die on Thursday, January 7th, 1868, at eleven o'clock, A. M.

The PRESIDENT—Not being germane to the subject under consideration, this substitute is out of order.

Mr. ALVORD—I propose to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Niagara [Mr. Flagler], by constituting a committee of three.

Mr. FLAGLER—I will accept the amendment.

Mr. COLAHAN—I move to amend the resolution so as to make the time of adjournment of this Convention Monday evening instead of Friday morning.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Colahan, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Bell.

Mr. FLAGLER—I will suggest to the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell], that he may attain his object by striking out "Troy" and inserting "Albany" in the resolutions I have submitted.

Mr. BELL—I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Niagara.

Mr. MERRITT—I suppose the alteration will make it consistent with the report of the comittee which was presented to the Convention the other day. I wish to say, in relation to this matter, that the gentlemen appointed upon that committee had no other desire than to select such accommodations as the Convention required. The room proposed by the city of Albany would answer the purposes of the Convention. One of the committee [Mr. Morris] reserved the right of voting in favor of going to New York, in case that proposition should be submitted. Since the appointment of the other committee, another visitation has been made to the hall, and one or two other rooms have been suggested in the city, as being more capacious and otherwise better suited to accommodate the Convention, than the one which was fixed upon. The committee did not deem it necessary to visit any other hall than the one reported. As I understand their opinion, in case it was thought best to remain in Albany, the rooms recommended would answer the requirements. It would not be expected by this Convention that we can get a room fitted up for a large deliberative body unless it is made for that purpose. We may have to suffer some inconvenience, but I imagine it will be of short duration, for we are not to remain in session a great while longer. Deeming the city of Albany the most appropriate place for the meeting of the Convention, and not fearing the bad results and influences, suggested by other gentlemen, growing out of the meeting of the Legislature, I still adhere to the report made by this Committee. If, however, the Convention decide to go to Troy, which is much preferable to going to the city of New York, we can have our printing done and sent to us from Albany. I make these remarks simply that the question may be taken, not upon the conveniences which we can command, but upon the question of leaving the city of Albany, and that we shall not go away from the city with the idea that we have not proper conveniences for the sessions of the Convention.

Mr. MORRIS—Is a substitute in order?

The PRESIDENT—A substitute by way of amendment is in order.

Mr. MORRIS—I offer this resolution:

Resolved, That this Convention adjourn at nine o'clock to-morrow evening to meet at noon on the second Tuesday of January next in the city of New York at the armory of the Twenty-second regiment national guard on Fourteenth street.

The room to which I refer in that resolution has been placed at our disposal. The same expense will be incurred in lighting and warming wherever we may hold our sessions. There is a contingent fund which I think it would be proper to draw upon to furnish the members with chairs and tables, which is all that they would require in order that they may transact their business in a proper manner. In consideration of the many advantages of going to New York, and also the centrality of its location, I beg that the members will take into consideration this matter before deciding upon Albany or Troy.

Mr. HATCH—I desire to say that the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris] has anticipated the motion I intended to make. I am decidedly in favor of accepting the proposition to go to New York, for the reason, too, that I believe we should get a better attendance of the Convention there than we can at any other place. I think it is a great deal better for the Convention, even if the individual members should have to pay the expense of fitting up a room, which could not cost over three or four hundred dollars, than to go to Troy or any of the other places which have been mentioned. They certainly could place themselves in as convenient a condition, so far as comfort is concerned, as the members of the British Parliament. I am in favor of going to New York

Mr. FLAGLER—if I understand the motion of the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris] it is to adjourn this Convention to one of the armories in New York on Fourteenth street. I have this to say, that as a member of one of the committees, with them I enjoyed an excellent opportunity to see the outside of that building, but there were no means by which we could see the interior [laughter], I think it would be hardly safe for this Convention to adjourn to that place without knowing whether they could get into the building. [Laughter.] I may say in regard to those armories, that, while they are arranged very nicely, they are illy adapted to any such purpose as this Convention requires. Take the Seventh regiment armory—the room itself is one hundred by two hundred feet, in the third story, is immediately under the roof, without a single thing in the general arrangement that would make it pleasant or desirable for the sessions of this Convention. The same is true, measurably, I suppose, in regard to the armory the gentleman suggests; but, as I said before, we did not have the pleasure of seeing the inside of the building.

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared carried.

The question was then put on the amendment of Mr. Morris, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Bell to insert the word "Albany" and strike out the word "Troy" wherever the word occurred in the resolutions of Mr. Flagler.

Mr. MERRITT—On the question before the Convention, I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. BICKFORD—I move to lay this subject on the table.

The PRESIDENT—The motion is out of order.

Mr. FOLGER—Can there be a division, and can a vote be taken upon the second proposition first?

The PRESIDENT—If there be no objection, the course will be pursued as suggested by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger].

Mr. E. BROOKS—I submit that the previous question having been ordered, it is too late.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair does not understand that the rule precludes a division of the question, even after the main question is ordered. But it must take the questions in their order, if there be no objection.

Mr. FOLGER—I ask that the second resolution be put first, so as to vote on coming to Albany without designating any particular place.

The PRESIDENT—That order will be observed if there be no objection.

There being no objection the question was put on the branch of the resolution calling for the meeting of the Convention in Albany, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, N. M. Allen, Andrews, Ballard, Barker, Beadle, Bell, Bergen, Bickford, E. P. Brooks, Case, Cassidy, Chesebro, Colahan, Curtis, Daly, C. C. Townsend, S. Townsend, Tucker, Van Cott, Wakeman, Williams, Young—63.

The question recurred on the resolutions offered by Mr. Flagler.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—On the question before the Convention I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. BELL—I move a division of the question, so that the vote shall be direct in regard to meeting at Troy.

The PRESIDENT—That is the question.

Mr. BELL—I would inquire of the Chair if it involves any of the other propositions as to adjournment?

The PRESIDENT—The question involves the entire series of resolutions.

Mr. BELL—Then I move to divide the question so the vote will be direct in regard to re-assembling at Troy, and without regard to adjournment or assembling.

The question was put on the resolution, accepting the offer of the municipal authorities of Troy to provide rooms for the meetings of the Convention, and it was declared adopted by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Alvord, Andrews, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Ballard, Barker, Barto, Beals, Beckwith, Bowen, E. Brooks, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Cheritree, Comstock, Cooke, Corbett, Curtis, Daly, Duganne, C. C. Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, N. M. Allen, Beadle, Bell, Bergen, Bickford, Cassidy, Chesebro, Colahan, Eddy, Folger, Garvin, Hammond, Hardenburgh, Harris, Hatch, Houston, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Merrill, Merritt, Monell, Murphy, Nelson, A. J. Parker, Potter, Rathbun, Robertson, Schell, Seaver, Spencer—31.

The PRESIDENT—If there be no division called for, the vote will be taken upon the remaining resolutions, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY read the resolutions as follows:

Resolved, That this Convention will adjourn on Friday, December 20th, at twelve o'clock M., to meet Tuesday, January 14th, 1868, at ten o'clock A. M., in the hall tendered by the authorities of the city of Troy for the deliberations of the Convention.

Resolved, That a committee of three, together with the Secretary of this Convention, be appointed to arrange with the mayor and common council of Troy for placing said rooms in such order as will adapt them to the uses of the Convention.

Mr. KINNEY—Are we under the operation of the previous question?

The PRESIDENT—We are.

Mr. BARKER—I presume the Convention will consent to a viva voce vote?

Objection was made.

Mr. BELL—I would like to inquire what room this is.

Mr. COMSTOCK—It is the Young Men's Association room.

The question was put on the two remaining propositions.

The SECRETARY proceeded with the call of the ayes and noes, and the resolutions were declared adopted by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Archer, Armstrong, Axtell, Ballard, Barker, Barto, Beadle, Beals, Beckwith, Bell, Bowen, E. Brooks, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Noes—Messrs. Bergen, Bickford, Chesebro, Colahan, Folger, Garvin, Harris, M. H. Lawrence, Livingston, Ludington, Merrill, Monell, Murphy, Rathbun, Schell, Seaver, Stratton, Verplanck—17.

Mr. MERRITT—I move to reconsider this last vote for the purpose of meeting on the 7th in Troy, instead of the day fixed in the resolution. I am informed that a necessity for time will not exist so far as Troy is concerned.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I move, with the consent of the Convention, that the question may be taken now so as to settle it at once.

Objection being made to its immediate consideration, the motion of Mr. E. Brooks was laid on the table.

Mr. FLAGLER—I desire to ask the consent of the Convention, to make a verbal change in the first resolution, to which there will be no objection. It is to insert before the word "invitation" the words "courteous and cordial."

The being no objection the resolution was so amended.

Mr. MURPHY—I move a reconsideration of the resolution fixing Troy as the place of meeting.

The PRESIDENT—That motion has already been received and entered for consideration.

Mr. MURPHY—The motion referred simply to the time of meeting.

Objection being made, the motion of Mr. Murphy was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT announced the following committee under the resolutions of Mr. Flagler, just adopted: Messrs. Flagler, Francis, S. Townsend, and the Secretary of the Convention.

Mr. FLAGLER—My residence being a distant part of the State, it will interfere with the attention to which the duties of the committee are entitled. The committee should be local. I respectfully ask to be excused from serving.

No objection being made, Mr. Flagler was excused.

The PRESIDENT appointed Mr. Hitchcock in the place of Mr. Flagler.

Mr. BICKFORD—I move to reconsider all the votes by which the resolution has been adopted.

Objection being made, the motion was laid on the table.

Mr. EDDY—I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this Convention are tendered to the mayor and city authorities of the city of Albany for their very liberal proposition in their invitation to the Convention to finish up its labors in this city.

Mr. MORRIS—I move to amend the resolution by including the city of Troy.

A DELEGATE—That has already been done.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Morris, and it was declared lost.

The question was put on the resolution of Mr. Eddy, and it was declared adopted.

Mr. VAN CAMPEN—I offer this resolution.

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be instructed to amend section 1 of the article on corporations, other than municipal, by striking out the words "No consolidation of railroad corporations shall be authorized by the Legislature where the aggregate capital shall exceed twenty millions of dollars," and insert "The Legislature shall not authorize the consolidation of the New York and Erie railroad company with the Hudson River, Harlem and New York Central railroad companies, or with either of them, nor of railroad corporations owning parallel or competing lines" And that said section, so amended, shall be reported by the committee when the said committee shall make their report to the Convention.

Mr. ALVORD—I should like to know whether that is by way of instruction to the Committee on Revision.

The PRESIDENT—It is.

Mr. ALVORD—Then I hope it will lie over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT—There being objection made, the resolution must lie on the table.

Mr. GRAVES—I offer this resolution.

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Convention, it is the duty of the Legislature at its next session to provide a permanent place to be called "The Soldiers' Home," for disabled soldiers and sailors of the State of New York.

Mr. GRAVES—I offer this resolution because I learn that the place where the soldiers and sailors' home is now located belongs to the city of Albany.

Mr. FOLGER—I rise to a point of order. This resolution is not debatable. The gentleman is speaking to it, and I suppose it must lie over.

The PRESIDENT—It is not debatable. If gentlemen desire to debate it, it must lie over.

Mr. ARCHER—To meet a question which seems to be a public one, I offer the following resolution:

The SECRETARY read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to prepare the several articles adopted by the Convention, and referred to the Committee on Revision, as a separate document, and that the same be printed.

Mr. ARCHER—This document, when prepared and sent out, will show the public that this Convention has not been remiss in the discharge of its duty; that many valuable improvements have been made in the present Constitution.

Digitized by Google

Mr. FOLGER—I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman is debating the resolution. It must lie over under the rule.

The resolution was referred, under the rule, to the Standing Committee on Printing.

Mr. SEAVER—I ask leave to say that the Committee on Printing have had that resolution under consideration and they are prepared to recommend its adoption.

Mr. E. BROOKS—The Committee on Revision have in course of preparation for printing all articles as fast as they are acted upon.

Mr. FOLGER — I rise to a point of order. There is no question before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BECKWITH—I offer the following resolution:

The SECRETARY read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be authorized to meet during the adjournment of this Convention.

The question was put on the resolution of Mr. Beckwith, and it was declared adopted.

The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the Convention again proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, as amended and reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The SECRETARY read the twelfth section as follows:

SEC. 12. The judges of the court of appeals and the justices of the supreme court shall not hold any other office or public trust. All votes for either of them for any elective office, (except that of justice of the supreme court or judge of the court of appeals), given by the Legislature or the people shall be void. They shall not exercise any power of appointment to public office, except as is herein specifically provided.

Mr. GRAVES—Do I understand that all further amendments are precluded to section 11?

The PRESIDENT—That section was passed last evening.

Mr. GRAVES—I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair invited amendments to the eleventh section, which were not made: the motion was then made to strike out the section, which was negatived. Therefore, no amendments are now admissible.

Mr. SILVESTER—Is it in order now to move a reconsideration of the vote taken last evening upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh]?

The PRESIDENT—It is in order; that motion will be entertained under the head of amendments generally.

There being no amendments offered to the twelfth section the SECRETARY read section 13 as follows:

SEC. 13. The times and places of holding the terms of the court of appeals and of the general and special terms of the supreme court within the several departments and districts, and the circuit courts and courts of oyer and terminer within the several counties, shall be provided for by law. But provision shall be made for holding general terms of the supreme court in each of said districts.

There being no amendments offered to the thirteenth section, the SECRETARY proceeded to read section 14, as follows:

SEC. 14. Judges of the court of appeals and justices of the supreme court may be removed by concurrent resolution of both houses of the Legislature, if two-thirds of all the members elected to the Assembly and a majority of all the members elected to the Senate concur therein. All judicial officers, except those mentioned in this section, and except justices of the peace and judges and justices of inferior courts, not of record, may be removed by the Senate on the recommendation of the Governor. But no removal shall be made by virtue of this section unless the cause thereof be entered on the journals, nor unless the party complained of shall have been served with a copy of the complaint against him, and shall have had an opportunity of being heard in his defense. On the question of removal the ayes and noes shall be entered on the journal.

No amendments being offered to the fourteenth section, the SECRETARY proceeded to read section 15, as follows:

SEC. 15. There shall be in the city and county of New York, the superior court of the city of New York and the court of common pleas of said city and county. And there shall be in the city of Buffalo the superior court of said city. The said courts shall severally have the jurisdiction they now severally possess, and such other original and appellate civil and criminal jurisdiction as may be conferred by law. There shall be six judges of the superior court of the city and county of New York; six judges of the court of common pleas of the said city and county of New York, and three judges of the superior court of the city of Buffalo. The judges of said courts, respectively, shall designate one of their number as chief justice, who shall act as such as long as he continues in office. Vacancies in said courts shall be filled by election by the electors of said cities respectively at the general election next after the vacancy shall occur. And until such general election in the same manner as vacancies in the office of justice of the supreme court, as is hereinbefore provided. It shall be competent for the Legislature to provide by law for the detailing of one or more judges of the superior court or of the court of common pleas of the city of New York to hold circuits or special terms of the supreme court in the city and county of New York from time to time, as the exigencies of judicial business in that city and county may require. The judges of the courts mentioned in this section shall be paid, and the expenses of said courts defrayed in the manner provided by law.

Mr. MURPHY—This section constitutionalizes certain local courts. I think that uniformity should prevail in all parts of the State; and I therefore propose the following amendment to this section, which I think meets the approbation of the Committee on the Judiciary:

Digitized by Google

After the words "city and county," in the third line, insert the following: "There shall be in the city of Brooklyn the city court of Brooklyn, with such further jurisdiction as may be determined by law." And after the words "New York," in the tenth line, insert the following: "One or more judges of the city court of Brooklyn, not exceeding three, as may from time to time be fixed by law."

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Murphy, and it was declared carried.

Mr. BARKER—I desire to call the attention of some of the Judiciary Committee, who live in the city of New York, to the question whether this section provides for the additional judges required for the court of common pleas—the three new judges that would go into this court. This question I submit to members of the committee from that city.

Mr. GARVIN—The present number of judges in the court of common pleas consists of three; and this section provides for six.

Mr. MILLER—I offer the following amendment: Insert in line twenty-five, after the word "defrayed," as follows: "by the localities wherein said courts are respectively located." These courts that are mentioned in this section are purely local. They exist now under legislative enactment. and the salaries of the judges and the expenses of the court are borne by the locality in which the court is established. Now, I am of the opinion that, if we allow this section to remain without such an amendment, we shall say, by implication, at least, that the expenses of these courts are to be borne and paid by the State. I notice in the article, wherever we have intended that the expenses of local courts shall be paid by the locality, we have provided that the salaries shall be fixed by the local authorities and, whenever we have intended that the expenses should be borne by the State, we have provided that the salaries shall be fixed by law—precisely the same language that is used in this section. I offer this amendment so that it may appear that, while we make these courts constitutional courts, we yet regard them as local courts, and intend that the expenses shall be borne by the locality in which they are established, and not by the State.

Mr. BERGEN—In my judgment, sir, the salaries of these judges in these courts should be a State charge, and justly, too. The State furnishes supreme court judges, who, in nine-tenths of the counties in this State, in fact nearly the whole, perform these duties—all the necessary duties of these courts in those counties—at the expense of the State. I have no doubt that in the county which the gentleman [Mr. Miller] represents, the judge of the supreme court, who is paid by the State, performs all the duties which properly belong to a supreme court, or to a court of high jurisdiction, for that county. Now, in the city and county of New York, in the county of Kings, and other localities of the State, the supreme court judges cannot, on account of the increase of population and business, perform all those duties for those counties; and the gentleman now proposes that we shall have additional judges at our own expense, to perform those duties which the State pays for performing in his county.

Mr. MILLER—In this article we provide additional supreme court judges for that district, to do this additional work.

Mr. BERGEN—The question is whether one additional supreme court judge in the city and county of New York can perform all the duties which the supreme court has to perform. They can only add one, that is all. There is great injustice in the system that is provided, I mean under the Constitution of 1846, and if the Convention is just—if we deal out justice equally to all parts of the State—we will provide that the State shall pay the salaries of these judges in the localities referred to, for performing the same kind of duties which the State pays for performing in other localities. If the gentleman desires justice done he will not object to the State paying these salaries.

Mr. MILLER—When this question was under consideration, it was claimed by the representatives from that locality that they were local courts and to be paid for by the localities.

Mr. BERGEN—They are local courts, I grant, but they perform the duties which the supreme court cannot perform in consequence of an insufficient number of judges. You have compelled, or are trying to compel those localities to pay out of their own pockets for performing duties which the supreme court performs, at the expense of the State, elsewhere. The gentleman's locality pays for performing the duties which the inferior court performs. We do the same, and do not object to paying for inferior courts. When you ask us, and compel us, in fact, to find additional judges, at our own expense, to perform the duties of the supreme court, giving them the powers of the supreme court, in their locality and other localities, you ask what is unjust and unfair and which no fair man ought to require from us. The rule should operate equally. If the State pays for performing that service in the gentleman's county and in nine-tenths of the counties of this State, they should pay for it in the county of Kings and the county of New York. That is what I ask; and I hope the gentleman's proposition will be voted down, and that we may have justice done by this Convention. Injustice was done by the Convention of 1846, and I hope this body is more generous, more willing to do what is right, and make a Constitution that will operate equally upon all portions of the State.

Mr. GRAVES—I am a little surprised at the view of this matter by my friend from Kings [Mr. Bergen]. When this question was up the other day, and when the construction of this language was discussed in this Convention, gentlemen from New York, or some of them at least, avowed upon this floor that it had been the custom in the city of New York to pay their own officers and that they had a law regulating the payment of salaries there and that they were not paid by the State of New York; but when the amendment is offered here by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. Miller], the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Bergen] rises at once and gives a construction to this language, or rather seeks to enforce upon this Convention, the propriety of the State paying the fees or salaries of the local officers in the city of New York. Now, sir, we have in the city of New York supreme court judges who are paid by the State. I ask why should the city of New York be favored any more in this respect than the city of Buffalo or the city of Rochester, or any other city in the State? All these officers are local officers and should be paid by their localities. I hope the amendment presented by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. Miller], will prevail.

Mr. BECKWITH—I, also, hope this amendment will prevail. I think there should be no doubt upon this question. When it came up in Committee of the Whole, several gentlemen insisted that the provision, as it now stands, would not throw upon the State the expense of supporting the local courts. I do not suppose that the city of New York wishes the State to defray the expense of their local courts, and leave the rural districts to support their own local courts. The county courts of the several counties in this State, in which original jurisdiction is given, as contemplated by this article, will have to be supported by the counties; and to compel the rural districts, as a part of the State, to support the local courts of the city, seems to me is unjust. Those local courts are organized for their special benefit, and therefore, they should defray the expense; and I think there should be no doubt in the language of the Constitution upon this question.

Mr. EVARTS—It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that there should be no objection on the part of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Bergen] to this amendment. It is certainly very proper that we should bear the extraordinary expenses of our extraordinary courts.

Mr. VERPLANCK—I feel a little delicacy in saying a word in reference to this question. But I wish to call attention to the fact that each locality pays the expenses of courts, with the exception of the salary of judges, and I submit that it is fair that the State should pay the salaries of the judiciary throughout the entire State.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. Miller] will not prevail, but on the contrary, that this class of officers in the city of Buffalo and New York, and in the county of Kings and some other parts of the State, may be embraced under the same arrangement as the class of officers that do the supreme court business, and may be paid by the State. As the gentleman from Erie [Mr. Verplanck] has just said, the larger portion of the expenses of the State, except the salary of the judges is now paid by the locality The discussions of this Convention have shown us the fact that, a very large portion of the general business of the State is concentrated in the city of New York. For some reason or other, the profession choose to carry their cases there, which is complimentary, undoubtedly, to the judiciary of those localities. Last evening, in some very interesting and impressive remarks, the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh], in enforcing his amendment, which was lost only by a tie vote, said that five-sixths of the higher class of jurisprudence in this State was done along the banks of the North river. I do not wonder that the tax payers in two of those counties, Kings and New York, resist the further continuance of a system of that kind; for upon those counties is impressed a jurisdiction and litigation that does not fairly belong to them, and that class of jurisdiction they are required to pay for, while the other fifty-eight counties have their charges paid out of the general State treasury. These are unfair conditions which ought not to remain, but they undoubtedly do exist in the city of New York. I took occasion to state, some days ago, with regard to the returns of the jurisprudence of New York, that I saw an item of over a half million of dollars charged upon county expenses; what portion of that is for the salary of judges I am unable to say. I hope this amendment will not prevail, but that we shall retain the section as it is, and in retaining it, we should affirm the position of my friend from Kings [Mr. Bergen], that, if that class of officers is to be constitutionalized, their salaries shall be charged upon the treasury of the State.

Mr. MURPHY—It is undoubtedly true, as said by my colleague [Mr. Bergen], that these local courts in the county of Kings do an amount of business that would otherwise devolve upon the supreme court of the State. That court also does a great deal of business that might be done by the county court, which is undoubtedly a tribunal of great convenience to the city and county. I do not know that there has been any objection on the part of the people of the city of Brooklyn or the county of Kings to the payment of these salaries out of the local treasury. There are reasons to my mind why they should be so paid. I think we will find difficulty, under the system of salaries that exists in the State at large, to find gentlemen of proper ability and learning to take the position of judges in that court. I therefore hope the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. Miller] will be adopted in order that all doubt which may exist may be removed.

Mr. BERGEN—May I ask the gentleman a question?

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman has spoken once upon this question, and cannot speak again without unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Miller, and it was declared carried.

Mr. FOLGER—I offer the following amendment: In line five, after the word "jurisdiction," insert the words "and powers." This is to supply a mere clerical omission.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move to strike out the word "vacancies," in the thirteenth line, and all that follows it, down to the word "provided," in line eighteen, and insert these words: "The provision for filling vacancies in office made by section 10 of this article shall apply to the courts and judges named in this section." I do not know whether I need explain it. Any one will perceive that a vacancy happening under the section as it now reads—a vacancy happening to-day may be filled at the election to-morrow—and you may have a hostler or a cobbler for a judge of the superior court. I have framed the provision as it has been adopted in relation to the other courts.

Mr. RUMSEY—That provision is in there already, in line sixteen: "And until such general election, in the same manner as vacancies in the office of justice of the supreme court, as is hereinbefore provided."

Mr. COMSTOCK—No, sir; it is not there. It reads, "Vacancies in said courts shall be filled by the electors of said cities, respectively, at the general election next after the vacancy shall occur."

Mr. RUMSEY—Read right on the next sentence.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The vacancy may happen to-day and the general election to-morrow. I intend to provide that the vacancy shall happen three months before the general election. That we have adopted in regard to the other courts; so that it cannot be filled at the next election, unless three months shall intervene.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried

Mr. LAPHAM—I offer the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "provided" in line eighteen to and including the word "or" in line nineteen, and insert these words: "the Governor may from time to time designate." It will be seen, as the section now reads, that it authorizes the Legislature by a permanent act to designate one or more of the judges of each of the courts to hold special terms and circuits of the supreme court. The Legislature, under the language of this section, may make a permanent provision that A B, or C D, of those courts, shall be competent to hold circuits and special terms without limit. My proposition is to leave that power as it now is, with the Governor, with regard to extraordinary courts, leaving it for the Governor to designate, if there is a public necessity, instead of providing it by a legislative act.

Mr. BARKER—I hope this amendment will prevail. I have very great doubt as to the wisdom of the provision that any judge of this local court shall be entitled to have the power to take a seat in the supreme court. It certainly has the effect to take away from the suitor that power of election which he ought to have, to plant his suit in a court where he knows the character, the standing, the partialities and prejudices of the judges who are to preside. This, as it now reads, leaves it to the Legislature, as my friend has truly said, to mingle these jurisdictions; and I think if they ever sit in the supreme court, it should be by a special commission from the Governor.

Mr. FOLGER—The provision of the section as it reads, leaves this matter flexible. The Legislature may provide by law for detailing a judge to hold the circuit or special terms of the supreme court. It leaves it so that it can be changed from time to time. If you adopt the provision of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] you have an iron rule which cannot be changed. By it, no one but the Governor can detail the judge. The gentleman from Chautauqua [Mr. Barker] seems to misapprehend the language of this amendment. It is not to strike it out altogether, but it is to provide that one single person, for all time, the Governor, shall have the power of detailing the judge. The provision of the section leaves it so that the Legislature, from year to year, may change and provide, as they see fit.

Mr. EVARTS—The proposition in the section now sought to be thus amended was introduced by myself, and was received with general consent. I never intended to carry it further than to make it competent for the Legislature, if in their wisdom they see fit, to declare by law. In their law thus declared, they may provide that the Governor should have this power of detailing a judge. This limitation is proper. The Legislature can readily change this, if it is found not to work well. They can modify it if occasion requires. Certainly I have no desire to put into the Constitution an enabling authority for these judges so to act, but leave it for the Governor to determine whether they shall or not, in order to provide for clearing the calendars of the supreme court, should it become necessary, by a proper arrangement of this kind.

Mr. LAPHAM—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman having spoken once on this question cannot speak again without unanimous consent. No objection being made the gentleman can proceed.

Mr. LAPHAM—I wish to say but a single word. Under this provision, as it now is, the Legislature may pass a law that, the moment the judges are elected in the common pleas and superior courts, they may, by law, determine which of them shall sit in the supreme court and which of them hold other courts; and that is a permanent provision. The power is given.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Lapham, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 25 to 56.

Mr. POND—I offer the following amendment as a substitute for section 15.

The SECRETARY read the substitute, as follows:

"All local courts established in any city or village, including the superior court, common pleas, sessions and surrogates' courts of the city and county of New York, and the superior court of Buffalo, shall remain, until otherwise directed by the Legislature, with their present powers and jurisdiction; and the judges of such courts, or any clerks thereof, in office when this Constitution shall be adopted, shall continue in office until the expiration of their term of office, or until the Legislature shall otherwise direct."

Mr. POND—The proposition which I have submitted, and which I propose to have substituted for this section, is, in substance, section 12 of article 14 of the present Constitution. For one, I think the propriety of constitutionalizing these local courts is very questionable. If it is necessary, while they exist, I think the better way would be to abolish those courts entirely, and to provide a sufficient number of supreme court judges to do the entire business of those cities. By constitutionalizing those courts, I think we, perhaps, in a measure recognize an obligation on the part of the State to pay the judges of them. And especially, if we finally adopt the provision which seems just now to have been approved by the committee, allowing the Legislature to call upon them to perform the duties of our supreme court judges in those cities. It strikes me that we had better get rid of this difficulty; and inasmuch as there have been no objections made and no questions raised as to the propriety of the existence of these courts, and no evils growing out of the system inaugurated under or continued under the Constitution of 1846, it seems to me we are not called upon to inaugurate a new system in reference to those local courts. We, by adopting this substitute, get rid of this question presented by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Bergen], as to the obligation, on the part of the State, to pay the salaries of these officers.

Mr. AXTELL — I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared carried.

The question was then put on the adoption of the substitute of Mr. Pond, and it was declared lost.

Mr. SPENCER—I move to amend by inserting after "possess" in line six these words: "until otherwise provided by law." My object in offering this amendment is that these courts may not be bound down by a positive provision of the Constitution to the jurisdiction they now possess, because it may be desirable, in the progress of time and events, that the jurisdiction which they have shall be modified, or, perhaps, some of it taken away. To illustrate: The court of common pleas now has, I believe, appellate jurisdiction in cases arising in inferior courts. And it may become desirable to transfer that jurisdiction to some other tribunal, or, at all events, to modify it. Under the provision as it now stands, it can neither be taken away, transferred or modified. I have introduced this amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the Judiciary Committee and of those who are interested in these courts to this subject.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope that the amendment will not prevail for this simple reason: If it does prevail, the Legislature can take away all the jurisdiction of those courts, and that would accomplish the object indirectly sought to be attained more directly by the proposition which has just been defeated. There is no public mischief in permitting these courts, by the Constitution, to retain the jurisdiction which they now have. I have never heard any objection to the nature, character or extent of the jurisdiction which they now enjoy under the laws of the State. I think, therefore, that there may well be an irrepealable jurisdiction, and that it would be unwise to subject these courts wholly to the caprice or the will of the Legislature.

Mr. POND—I would like to hear the amendment read, and I call for the ayes and noes.

The amendment was read by the Secretary.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, the ayes and noes were not ordered.

The question was then put on the amendment of Mr. Spencer, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HADLEY—I have heard no good reason for constitutionalizing these courts, and I therefore move to strike out this section.

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared carried.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND demanded the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number not seconding the call, they were not ordered.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Hadley to strike out the section, and it was declared lost by a vote of 30 to 52.

Mr. POND moved a reconsideration of the vote upon the substitute offered by him.

Objection being made to the immediate consideration of the motion, it was laid on the table under the rule.

Mr. ROGERS—There was no quorum voted.

The PRESIDENT—A quorum did vote, according to the mathematics of the Chair. [Laughter.]

There being no further amendment offered to section 15, the SECRETARY proceeded to read section 16 as follows:

SEC. 16. Justices of the supreme court shall be elected by the electors of their respective districts judges of the superior court of the city and county of New York, and of the court of common pleas of the city and county of New York, by the electors of that city and county; and judges of the superior court of the city of Buffalo, by the electors of that city. The said justices and judges elected under this Constitution shall hold their offices for the term of fourteen years. The justices and judges of the present supreme and superior courts and courts of common pleas, shall be justices and judges of the said courts hereby established during the terms for which they were respectively elected.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I offer the following amendment, upon which I demand the ayes and noes: "Strike out 'fourteen' and insert 'eight,' in line 8, reducing the term to eight years."

Mr. COLAHAN—I move the previous question.

Mr. MURPHY—I would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. COLAHAN—I withdraw my motion for the previous question, to enable my colleague [Mr. Murphy] to offer his amendment.

Mr. MURPHY—I offer the following amendment to this section to make it conform to the amendment already adopted: To insert in line 4 the words, "and the judge or judges in the city of Brooklyn," and to amend the sixth line so as to read, "of these cities respectively."

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy] that his amendment is not germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown], and cannot be considered until that proposed by the gentleman from Lewis shall have been disposed of.

Mr. COLAHAN—I renew my motion for the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Colahan, and it was declared lost.

Mr. ROGERS—I call for the ayes and noes on the amendment.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. E. A. Brown, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. N. M. Allen, Archer, Axtell, Ballard, Bell, Bickford, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, Cheritree, Cooke, Eddy, Field, Goodrich, Grant, Graves, Hadley, Hammond, Hand, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Landon, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Ludington, McDonald, Merwin, Murphy, Nelson, Pond, Potter, Prindle, L. W. Russell, Schumaker, Seaver, Sheldon, Smith, Spencer, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Wales, Williams, Young —43.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barker, Barto, Beadle, Beckwith, Bergen, Bowen, E. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Chesebro, Colahan, Comstock, Corbett, Curtis, Daly, Duganne, C. C. Parker, President, Prosser, Rathbun, Reynolds, Robertson, Rogers, Rumsey, Schell, Silvester, Tappen, Van Campen, Van Cott, Verplanck—65.

Mr. COOKE—I offer the following amendment—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will inform the gentleman that we are still under the operation of the previous question. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy], which will be read for information.

The SECRETARY read the amendment.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Murphy, and it was declared carried.

Mr. SMITH—I move to strike out "fourteen" in line eight, and to insert "twelve" in lieu thereof, and upon this I demand the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The SECRETARY proceeded with the call of the roll.

The name of Mr. Murphy was called.

Mr. MURPHY—I ask to be excused from voting, for these reasons: I was in favor of what is called the "independence of the judiciary," though in favor of the election of judges by the people. I was, therefore, in favor of the long term of fourteen years for the judges, without then being eligible to re-election; but, as the Convention, in its wisdom, has thought proper to strike out the clause which provided for their non-re-eligibility in the election of judges, and as I feel it to be my duty to vote for the shortest term in order that the judges may be under the control of the people, I have voted for eight years and I will now vote for twelve, that being the fewest number of years. I therefore withdraw my request to be excused.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman cannot withdraw it without the consent of the Convention.

The question being put on excusing Mr. Murphy from voting, and it was declared lost by a vote of 45 to 53.

Mr. MURPHY—I vote "aye."

The SECRETARY proceeded with and concluded the call of the roll on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Smith, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. N. M. Allen, Archer, Axtell, Baker, Ballard, Bell, Bickford, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, Cheritree, Cooke, Eddy, Field, Fuller, Goodrich, Grant, Graves, Hadley, Hammond, Hand, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Kinney, Landon, A Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Ludington, Mattice, McDonald, Merwin, Murphy, Nelson, Pond, Potter, Prindle, L. W. Russell, Schumaker, Seaver, Sheldon, Smith, Spencer, Stratton, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Wales, Williams, Young—48.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Andrews, Barker, Barto, Beadle, Beckwith, Bergen, Bowen, E. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Chesebro, Colahan, Comstock, Corbett, Curtis, Daly, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Endress, Evarts, Farnum, Ferry, Flagler, Folger, Fowler, Francis, Garvin, Gould, Gross, Hardenburgh, Hatch, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Krum, Lapham, Livingston, Magee, Merrill, Merritt, Miller, Monell, More, Morris, Opdyke, A. J. Parker, C. E Parker, President, Prosser, Rathbun, Reynolds, Robertson, Rogers, Rumsey, Schell, Silvester, Tappen, Van Campen, Van Cott, Verplanck—61.

Mr. COOKE—I now offer the following amendment to section 16: strike out in lines six and seven the words "and judges elected under this Constitution," and insert "of the supreme court;" and after the word "years" in line eight insert "and the judges of local courts provided for in section 15 of this article, shall hold their offices for eight years respectively." It will be seen that this amendment proposes to discriminate in respect to the term of office between the justices of the supreme court and the judges of these local courts. It does seem to me to be taking a pretty long stride to create by constitutional provision, these several local courts, including the courts of common pleas and the superior court of the city of Buffalo, and the city court of Brooklyn, and give the judges this long term of office. I have not heard any argument advanced in favor of long terms for the higher judges that can apply to these courts. It has seemed to me from the beginning, that if we increase the term of office of the judges of the court of appeals to fourteen years, or for life, which would have suited me better, and then have terms of office of the justices of the supreme court and of the minor local courts eight years, the system would be harmonious and satisfactory, and proper, in regard to justices of the supreme court who are elected by districts. Where one district has a right to elect a judge to exercise jurisdiction and power throughout the entire State, it seems to me that it violates the principle of the people's choosing their own judges, to have the judges elected for these long terms, and placed entirely beyond the people's reach or control. If there is any thing at all in the idea of the people selecting their own judges, it would seem to require that the people should keep their judges in hand—keep them where they can exercise some discretion in regard to their continuance in office. But the sense of the Convention is that justices of the supreme court, as well as judges of the court of appeals, shall hold office for fourteen years. Now, I propose by this amendment to see whether the Convention also think it best to have the judges of these local minor courts elected for a like term, and if so, I do not know why we should not carry out the system down to county courts or even justices' courts.

Digitized by Google

Mr. MERRILL—I move the previous question.

Mr. EVARTS—Will my friend do me the favor to withdraw his motion for the previous question for a moment?

Mr. MERRILL—I withdraw it.

Mr. EVARTS—I cannot think, Mr. President, that the Convention should make the distinction which is proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke]. Certainly it is a question which belongs much more to the communities where the courts are constituted and are to exercise their jurisdiction than to the rest of the State. The gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] is in error in speaking of them as inferior courts, in comparison with the supreme court, as respects their jurisdiction, or as respects appeals from their judgments. The appeal from them lies directly to the court of appeals, and their jurisdiction is equally extensive with that of the supreme court.

Mr. COOKE—Is it not true that their jurisdiction depends—

Mr. BERGEN—I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Cooke] has already spoken once upon this question.

The PRESIDENT—The point of order is well taken.

Mr. EVARTS—These judges are also elected by a constituency larger in the number of voters than the constituency electing the supreme court judges under the provisions now adopted by the committee. Let us, then—for I believe the judgment is nearly unanimous in those parts of the State where these courts are to exercise their jurisdiction—have a more firm and stable tenure of office for these judges, as has been established, I think wisely, for the judges of the supreme court. We do not find that changes in the judges necessarily improve the character of the incumbents; and we are not desirous of frequent repetitions of elections; and whether the judges are wholly satisfactory or not, the longer their tenure lasts the better they are.

Mr. MERRILL—I renew the motion for the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Merrill, and it was declared carried.

Mr. COOKE—I call for the ayes and noes on this amendment.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll of Delegates.

The name of Mr. M. I. Townsend was called.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I desire to be excused from voting. If I understand the question, in a section already adopted, discriminations have been made between the judges of the local courts that have been referred to and the judges of the supreme court as to their tenure of office. The judges of these local courts discharge, in the localities, the same duties as the judges of the supreme court; and I do not see why a distinction should be made; and, although I am in favor of eight years tenure, I am still more strongly in favor of a rule which shall apply to all men alike in similar positions, without unjust discriminations.

The question was put on excusing Mr. M. I. Townsend from voting, and it was declared lost.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I vote "no."

The SECRETARY completed the call of the roll, and the amendment of Mr. Cooke was declared lost, by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Archer, Ballard, Bell, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, Cooke, Eddy, Goodrich, Grant, Graves, Hadley, Hammond, Hand, Hitchcock, Ketcham, Kinney, Krum, M. H. Lawrence, Mattice, McDonald, Merwin, Murphy, Nelson, Pond, Prindle, Rathbun, Sheldon, Stratton, S. Townsend, Wales, Williams—31.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barker, Barto, Beadle, Bergen, Bickford, Bowen, E. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Cheritree, Chesebro, Colahan, Comstock, Corbett, Curtis, Daly, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Endress, Evarts, Farnum, Ferry, Folger, Fowler, Fuller, Garvin, Gould, Gross, Hatch, Houston, Hutchins, Landon, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Livingston, Ludington, Magee, Merrill, Merritt, Miller, Monell, More, Morris, Opdyke, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, President, Prosser, Reynolds, Rogers, Rumsey, L. W. Russell, Schell, Seaver, Silvester, Spencer, Tappen, M. I. Townsend, Van Campen, Van Cott, Verplanck, Wakeman—64.

Mr. PRINDLE—I offer the following amendment, to be inserted at the end of the section: "But no person shall hold the office of judge of the supreme court longer than until the first day of January next, after he shall have arrived at the age of seventy years." We have already, by a large majority, adopted this provision in regard to the judges of the court of appeals, and I suppose the same reasons apply to the justices of the supreme court, and perhaps with greater force.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Prindle, and it was declared carried.

Mr. STRATTON—I move to strike out in the second line the word "districts," and to insert next thereto the word "departments." This Convention came to the conclusion, some time ago, that in the election of officers we should get better men—men of greater capacity—when they were elected from the large constituencies; and it is with that view, and for the purpose of getting the better class of men for judges, that I move this amendment.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I do not propose to discuss that question. It was reconsidered in committee, and by a very decided vote we determined to elect the judges by districts, for reasons that the committee no doubt deemed entirely satisfactory. I can only say that I should regard it as a great misfortune if this amendment should be adopted, and I ask for the ayes and noes upon it.

Mr. EVARTS—As I understand the proposition, it is that the election of the judges shall be by departments, as provided in the Judiciary Committee's report.

Mr. STRATTON—It is.

Mr. EVARTS—I hope, notwithstanding what

Digitized by Google

may have been done in Committee of the Whole, the Convention will determine that the election shall be by a large constituency rather than by a smaller.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was then put upon the amendment of Mr. Stratton, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Andrews, Bell, Comstock, Cooke, Corbett, Curtis, Daly, C. C. Dwight, Eddy, Ely, Evarts, Farnum, Ferry, Folger, Fowler, Garvin, Gould, Gross, Hiscock, Hutchins, Ketcham, Kinney, Krum, A. Lawrence, Magee, McDonald, Merritt, Miller, Monell, Morris, Opdyke, President, Rathbun, Reynolds, Rogers, Silvester, Stratton, Van Campen, Wakeman—39.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Archer, Baker, Ballard, Barker, Barto, Beadle, Bergen, Bickford, Bowen, E. Brooks, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, W. C. Brown, Case, Chesebro, Colahan, Endress, Fuller, Goodrich, Grant, Graves, Hadley, Hammond, Hand, Hardenburgh, Hitchcock, Houston, Landon, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Livingston, Ludington, Mattice, Merrill, Merwin, More, Murphy, Nelson, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, Pond, Prindle, Prosser, Robertson, Rumsey, L. W. Russell, Schell, Schumaker, Seaver, Smith, Spencer, Tappen, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Van Campen, Van Cott, Verplanck, Wales, Williams, Young—60.

Mr. KINNEY—Since the long term of fourteen years has been retained, I propose to limit the election of judges to a single term, and I therefore offer the following amendment, and call for the ayes and noes upon it. In the eighth line after the word "years" insert "but shall not be elected for a second term."

Mr. RUMSEY—I rise to a point of order. That question has been distinctly passed upon already.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair thinks the point of order well taken.

Mr. EVARTS—With great respect to the Chair I would inquire in what way has this question been passed upon in reference to these courts? It has been passed upon in reference to the court of appeals, but never in Convention in regard to these courts. We have a right to have the ayes and noes upon this question.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair was under the impression that it had been passed upon last evening; but the gentleman from New York [Mr. Evarts] is correct.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Having decided against ineligibility in regard to the court of appeals, I think it will be found difficult to point out any reason for discriminating between the court of appeals and the supreme court, and the other courts here mentioned. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment now offered.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Kinney, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. N. M. Allen, Bell, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, Case, Colahan, Curtis, Daly, Ely, Evarts, Farnum, Ferry, Gould, Hammond, Houston, Hutchins, Ketcham, Kinney, M. H. Lawrence, Ludington, Merritt, Miller, Morris, Murphy, Nelson, Opdyke, A. J. Parker, Prindle, Schell, Schumaker, Smith, Stratton, Van Cott, Williams, Young—35.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Andrews, Archer, Baker, Ballard, Barker, Barto, Beadle, Beckwith, Bergen, Bickford, Bowen, E. Brooks, Chesebro, Comstock, Cooke, Endress, Folger, Fowler, Fuller, Garvin, Goodrich, Grant, Graves, Gross, Hadley, Hand, Hardenburgh, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Landon, A. Lawrence, Lee, Livingston, Magee, Mattice, McDonald, Merwin, Monell, More, C. E. Parker Pond, President, Prosser, Rathbun, Reynolds, Robertson, Rumsey, L. W. Russell, Silvester, Spencer, Tappen, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Verplanck, Wakeman, Wales—57.

Mr. A. F. ALLEN—I move the previous question on the adoption of this section.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. A. F. Allen, and it was declared carried.

The question was then put on the adoption of section 16, and the section was declared carried.

Mr. McDONALD—I move to reconsider the vote by which this section has been adopted, in order to substitute twelve years for fourteen.

The PRESIDENT—The motion will be received, and will lie on the table under the rule.

The SECRETARY read section 17 as follows:

SEC. 17. All the judges and justices of the courts of record, hereinbefore mentioned in this article, shall receive at stated times for their services, a compensation to be fixed by law, which shall not be diminished during their respective terms of office.

Mr. KETCHAM—I move to amend by striking out the word "hereinbefore" in line two, and all after the word "law" in line three.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Ketcham, and it was declared lost.

Mr. BICKFORD—It strikes me that there should be an amendment, so that the compensation of the judges of the local courts should not be fixed by law, but should depend upon the boards of supervisors or some other local authority.

Mr. FOLGER—This section only applies to courts of record.

Mr. BICKFORD—Are not the courts of common pleas courts of record?

Mr. FOLGER—Yes, but the gentleman spoke of "superior courts."

Mr. GRAVES—I ask that the words "or increased" may be inserted after the word "diminished," in the fourth line.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Graves, and it was declared lost.

There being no further amendments to section 17, the SECRETARY read section 18 as follows:

SEC. 18. There shall be elected in each of the counties of this State, except the city and county of New York, one county judge, who shall hold his office for four years. He shall hold the county court and perform the duties of the office of surrogate. The county court as at present existing shall be continued with such original and appellate jurisdiction as shall from time to time be conferred upon it by the Legislature. The county judge with two justices of the peace, to be designated according to law, may hold courts of sessions, with such criminal jurisdiction as the Legislature shall prescribe, and perform such other duties as may be required by law. The county judge shall receive an annual salary, to be fixed by the board of supervisors, which shall not be diminished during his continuance in office. The justices of the peace for services in courts of session shall be paid a per diem allowance out of the county treasury. In counties having a population exceeding forty thousand the Legislature may provide for the election of a separate officer to perform the duties of the office of surrogate, whose term of office shall be the same as that of the county judge, and all surrogates in office when this Constitution shall take effect shall hold their respective offices until the expiration of the terms for which they were respectively elected. Inferior local courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction may be established by the Legislature.

Mr. KETCHAM—I move to strike out all after the word "judge," in line seven, to the word "may," in line eight, and to strike out all after the word "office," in line thirteen, to the word "in," in line fifteen. This amendment simply does away with the office of justice of the sessions. I have nothing to say on that subject in addition to the remarks I submitted when this subject was under consideration in Committee of the Whole. The proposition then seemed to excite some dislike and opposition on the part of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Bergen] because of an apprehension that the full management of the judiciary was going to be given to the lawyers—the fear that they were going to "monopolize" it, as he said. Being myself a farmer, I should be very unwilling to see any such monopoly as that; but while we have juries in criminal trials who are made by law the judges of the facts in each case, I do not see how there can be any such danger from abolishing this office. In a former discussion on this subject, two or three uses were suggested to which these justices might be put. One was that the presiding judge could consult them as to who should be appointed foreman of the grand jury. Now, sir, when there is any doubt upon that subject in the mind of the judge, the district attorney, or the sheriff, or the county clerk is apt to be consulted, and I think very properly, and either of these officers can probably give as good advice in regard to the matter as these justices can. Another use to which it was suggested they might be put, was with reference to influencing sentence in criminal cases. Now, sir, I did know of a case where these justices did interfere in fixing the sentence of a criminal. A man was indicted for assault and battery with intent to kill, but was convicted simply of assault and battery. The case was a very aggravated one; the proof showed that the prisoner had inflicted seven wounds by stabbing, one of which must necessarily have proved fatal had not medical attendance been at once procured; but the justices of the sessions overruling a justice of the supreme court, I think, imposed a fine upon that man of six cents! I know another case where the expense of supporting a child was sought to be imposed upon a man other than the husband of its mother—the husband and wife the whole time residing in the same neighborhood. In this case the resemblance of the child was made a ground by the associate justices, of overruling the county judge and reversing the Revised Statutes, and subjecting the defendant to the expense of a certiorari to the supreme court. I never heard of but one instance of a justice of the supreme court at oyer and terminer, or of a county judge at the sessions, supposing he was in any manner aided or assisted by the associate justices in the discharge of any duty whatever, and that was stated by the honorable gentleman from Herkimer [Mr. Graves]. It was made a subject of gratulation by the Convention of 1846, that they had abolished a great number of useless offices, and they deserve some credit for it: but they abrogated none, in my judgment, more useless than this one which they did not abrogate. But one gentleman thinks they should be retained to prevent a tie in the decision of questions on the bench. It seems to me that with but one judge on the bench, the decisions would be ordinarily pretty unanimous. [Laughter.] I do not think he would be very apt to tie. No sir. It is an office awarded for a little political service or influence, with really no duties attached except to look wise and draw pay. The retention of the office is the source of considerable expense to the State, and for which no service whatever is rendered. Nor is the expense of the office covered by the per diem and mileage paid to them, because by their ruling against the presiding judge, as in one case to which I have referred, and another to which I might refer in Dutchess county, the State and parties are subjected to a large expense in being compelled to go through with the farce of a new trial. Could I see the side justices done away with and abolished, and the salary of the county judge fixed by the Legislature instead of the board of supervisors, and their jurisdiction extended and the term of office prolonged, as I proposed in the Committee of the Whole, I should feel as though we had done much to increase the dignity and enlarge the usefulness of the county courts.

Mr. HAND—I hope this amendment will be adopted. We have listened with a great deal of attention and instruction to the accounts that have been given us of the glories of this "independent judiciary" away up where mere laymen can hardly dare to look at it, above all popular influences, just like the governments we read of away back in the dark ages. Now, I should be sorry to mar the beauty of this picture by introducing some farmer from the backwoods who had never seen a law book, and have him step upon the stage of action and overrule some member of this glorious, immaculate, never-to-be-touched-or-looked-at-judiciary, [laughter], so exalted above very influence from the people! I would be sorry, I say, to have this picture marred by the introduction of any such popular element, and I therefore hope this amendment will prevail.

Mr. BERGEN—I hope, sir, that this amendment will not prevail. The effect of it will be, as I understand it, to prevent justices of the peace from sitting in criminal courts. Now, sir, in the criminal courts of this State, since the first settlement of the State, justices of the peace have had a place on the bench with the presiding magistrates. That has been the system since the foundation of our government, and under the old Constitution, instead of two justices, there were some half dozen or more associated with the judge upon the bench. In nearly all the States of the Union, or at all events, in several of them, and perhaps in all—for I have not examined the subject—justices of the peace have seats upon the bench in criminal cases, and, in my view, the provision is a wise one. The association of these justices with the judges of these courts has given satisfaction to the people, and, as I said before, it is necessary, in fixing the sentences of criminals, that several individuals should be consulted, instead of having the sentence determined by the arbitrary opinion of one man. No man is convicted of any serious crime without the intervention of a jury of laymen who have to decide the question of his guilt or innocence, and it is a wise provision that in fixing upon the punishment, the opinions of more than one individual should be taken. This one individual may be prejudiced, and I have known cases where the presiding magistrate was prejudiced, and where, if he had been allowed to act alone in the matter, his prejudices would have swayed his judgment, and an unjust punishment would have been the consequence. And, sir, I hold that the interests of the people of this State require that the opinions of more than one individual shall be taken in determining the extent of the punishment to be given to the criminal. And if this innovation should be adopted, I am satisfied that evil consequences would result. These justices are not the ignorant individuals that some persons here think them to be. They are not so in my portion of the State, and I doubt whether they are in any other portion of the State. Justices of the peace are, generally, men who are selected, in the first place, by their localities, in consequence of their qualifications, and elevated to the office of justice, and then justices of the sessions are selected by the whole county from the body of justices, and, under the present system, one of each political party is placed on the bench, so that, in case political prejudices should have any effect upon the mind of the presiding judge, the opposite party has a representative upon the bench, in a measure to thwart the effect of those prejudices. Gentlemen of the legal profession, and perhaps gentlemen of the medical profession, may have objections to laymen setting upon the bench; but I believe that the mass of the people of this State, who do not belong to what are termed the learned professions, think differently.

Digitized by Google

Mr. HAND—I would ask the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Bergen] what becomes of the independence of the judiciary if we permit the introduction of this lay element? [Laughter.]

Mr. BERGEN—This element, sir, has been upon the bench from the foundation of our government, and formerly to a larger extent than it is now, and it has always given satisfaction. We have lived under it for a long time, and what evil has resulted from it? None. Why then should we undertake an experiment from which evil may possibly result? We know that from the system as it has been in operation no evil has ever resulted. I say, sir, that we had better continue a system which has operated so satisfactorily rather than adopt another, the operation of which we know nothing.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I hope that the large majority that decided this question the other night will hold to the same opinion they have expressed. I would again remind gentlemen that any reflection upon these side justices, who should be the best men, selected from the whole number of the justices of the peace of the State, must affect the six thousand justices of the peace in this State. Again, the professional gentlemen upon this floor ought to remember that, by reason of the characteristics of this class of officers, a very fine opening may be found here for young men—an opening which might exercise a sort of educational influence—somewhat of a legal West Point influence—in fitting them for the duties of the higher courts. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Ketcham, and it was declared lost.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the Convention took a recess until seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven o'clock P. M.

Mr. SEAVER—I ask leave to submit two reports from the Committee on Printing.

No objection being made, the SECRETARY read the first report as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the resolution of Mr. Archer, directing the Secretary to cause to be bound the debates of the Convention, respectfully recommend the adoption of the resolution.

In pursuance of the authority granted on the 23d of June, the committee further recommend that the copies of the debates remaining after complying with the rules of the Convention, be bound under direction of the Secretary, and that one copy thereof be given to each member and officer; and that the Secretary also cause to be bound in like manner for the members, the files of the debates. J. J. SEAVER, Chairman.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I would like to have the chairman of the committee explain to us why it is desirable to bind the debates before they are completed? That will necessarily entail upon us a very great expense. It seems to me unnecessary if they are ultimately to be bound when completed.

Mr. SEAVER—Perhaps it is not necessary, at this time, to bind the debates; but the resolution was referred to the committee and we wish to get it from our hands. Last June the Committee on Printing recommended this disposition of the debates, and asked leave to make the report, and therefore we do so now. The action of the Convention does not necessarily involve the immediate binding of the debates.

The question was put on agreeing to the report of the committee, and it was agreed to.

The SECRETARY then read a second report from the Committee on Printing, presented by Mr. Seaver, in favor of printing the several articles of the Constitution as perfected by the Convention.

Mr. ALVORD—I trust that report will not be adopted.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I object to its being received.

Objection being made to the report it was not received.

The Convention again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary as amended in and reported from the Committee of the Whole. The section under consideration being the eighteenth.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I desire to submit to the Convention this amendment to the eighteenth section.

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

Strike out all after the word "continued" in line five to and including the word "Legislature" in line seven, and insert in lieu thereof the words "and shall have original jurisdiction in all cases where the parties reside in the county in which the damages claimed shall not exceed $1,000, and also such appellate jurisdiction as shall be provided by law; subject, however, to such provision as shall be made by law for the removal of causes into the supreme court, and for limiting appeals from said county court to the supreme court."

Mr. CHESEBRO—It will be seen by the members of the Convention that this amendment I have offered embraces substantially the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. C. L. Allen], who is not now in his seat. I promised him I would submit the amendment proposed by him, which was subsequently amended on the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], extending the jurisdiction of the county court and giving it original jurisdiction to the extent of one thousand dollars. But upon a conference with some gentleman, it has been deemed advisable, and I concur in that opinion, that it is better not to designate the particular actions in which county courts shall have jurisdiction, as was proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Washington, but that the court shall have jurisdiction in all cases to the extent named in the amendment. The objection, as I understand it, to this amendment, is the giving of the county courts original jurisdiction to the extent named. It strikes me, and it is in my experience, and I have no doubt whatever in the experience of every gentleman who has had occasion to do business in that court, that it is better we should recognize that court in the Constitution, and give to it original jurisdiction for the purpose of elevating its character. This amendment, if adopted, will have this effect. In the first place it will relieve the supreme court from the trial and adjudication of a great class of cases which ought not to be tried in justices' courts, and yet ought not to be brought into the supreme court. It will give this court jurisdiction in a class of cases that ought to be brought in some tribunal intermediate between these two courts. It will serve to elevate the character of the court by giving it original jurisdiction in all cases up to the amount named in the amendment. I trust it will receive, although it did not in the Committee of the Whole in the form in which it was drawn by the gentleman from Washington, the approbation of this Convention.

Mr. FERRY—I had supposed it was pretty well understood that the question of conferring jurisdiction upon the county courts would be left open to be acted upon hereafter by the Legislature as circumstances should show to be necessary and wise. Now I hope that we may adopt a system of that character which will enable the supreme court to do the large mass of its business, if not the whole of it, and with reasonable dispatch and to the satisfaction of the public. I would say to the gentleman [Mr. Chesebro] and to the argument he has advanced, that it would be better to wait until time shall demonstrate the necessity of conferring this jurisdiction upon the county courts. One court is better than two, if one court can do the business; and if it shall become necessary hereafter, the Legislature can supply what courts are needed. It is better, inasmuch as the Legislature has full power over the subject, that we should wait and see what experience may show to be the wisest course to adopt.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—I am not favorably disposed toward the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro]. If he will take the trouble to look at the original law conferring original jurisdiction upon the county courts, which to some extent was held to be unconstitutional, he will find that the exercise of power on the part of the Legislature in that respect has been reasonable and has given as much jurisdiction to these courts as they ought to have. The proposition as made extends the jurisdiction to cases of one thousand dollars. That will embrace a very large class of cases. And while it may be very desirable for the plaintiff to select the court in which he may desire to have his action brought, it should be remembered that there is another party to every action who does not have any choice before him. He is elected to go into a county court when there may be reasons sufficient in his mind for him to desire his case to be tried in some other court.

Mr. CHESEBRO—The amendment I have suggested was intended to meet precisely the objection mentioned by the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown], and the one suggested by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], that when a case is brought in a county court by the plaintiff, the defendant may, upon the showing of sufficient cause, remove it by certiorari or otherwise into the supreme court.

Mr. E. A. BROWN—If it is in the option of a defendant to take a case into the supreme court, we only incur the additional labor and additional expense which is liable to be incurred in any and every case under the proposition made by the gentleman. It has been well suggested that the organization of the supreme court was intended to cover substantially all the business of this character, which it was proposed to confer upon county courts. In nineteen-twentieths of the counties of the State, the supreme court is abundantly competent to transact all of its business and in a manner generally more satisfactory to parties than it will be likely to be done in the county courts. But, in these nineteen-twentieths of the counties of the State, I do not think there would be any relief afforded to the supreme court in respect to this class of business. It is a relief that they do not need. If the supreme court is of the high character it is supposed to be, or if the county court is of the character it is supposed to be, then all the parties should have a right in the first instance to a trial in that court. I do not think in that respect a relief is needed. In another respect, the supreme court instead of being relieved would be embarrassed by the additional business growing out of appeals which would be multiplied in this class of cases. Because, it is not to be disguised nor can it be denied, that, if this jurisdiction is conferred in the Constitution, beyond the power of legislative control, a large class of cases that never would find themselves placed upon the calendar of a court of record will be brought into it from the county court. It will thereby create appeals to the general term, and they will be more likely to occur than from the circuits. I think it will be eminently wise, as has been suggested, to leave this matter entirely to the Legislature. And, if it is ascertained that the jurisdiction, as now conferred, is too much or too little, it is in the power of the Legislature to lessen that jurisdiction or to increase it. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—As I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro], it simply provides that in cases where more than one thousand dollars are involved, the county court shall not have jurisdiction. I think all difficulty is avoided at once, for a party, who commences proceedings, knows the law as well as we do, and he can select the court in which to present his claim for adjudication. I do not understand there is any fault to be found with this. If his claim is more than a thousand dollars, he can go to another court. There is no difficulty about the matter. I cannot see now why any such limitation should be made, but I rather favor the amendment of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro].

Mr. CHESEBRO—I should like liberty to say a few words. I do not propose to consume any of the time of the Convention. The principal object I had in making this amendment is, as I said in Committee of the Whole, to give to these county courts a degree of respectability to which they really are entitled. I would like to know, and I would like to ask any gentleman who is opposed to this amendment, what objection there is to conferring upon the county courts of any of the counties of this State, a jurisdiction to the extent named by this amendment? There is none whatever. There can be none. We all know that there is selected, in each of the counties of the State, as presiding judge, a lawyer who is generally as competent to decide cases of that character as the judge of the supreme court; and to give him this authority, this power, and this jurisdiction, is simply to relieve the supreme court of a class of cases that never ought to be brought in that court. Look at the calendars of the supreme court in the State of New York. I take my own county as a sample, and I am sure that it is only a sample of the rest. It is incumbered to-day with a class of cases for assault and battery, false imprisonment and malicious prosecutions, which really ought to be tried in the county court, before a judge of the county, who is as competent to preside in the trial of cases of that character, with a jury, as the supreme court judge. Why should the supreme court calendar be lumbered with this class of cases, when there is a court below of competent authority and power to try them? The only objection urged by the gentleman from Lewis [Mr. E. A. Brown] that I can understand, is that the supreme court has the same power. I admit it. But take the different counties of the State and you will see that their calendars are now lumbered up with cases of this description, that really it would be better to have tried in an inferior court, if we may so term it—in a justice's court. These cases are brought to the supreme court simply because the county court has no original jurisdiction. We should make the county court a court of competent jurisdiction to try such cases. I do not know of any reason suggested by the gentleman from Lewis that should inhibit this court from the trial of such cases. If a case is commenced in the county court of a magnitude sufficient to justify its being brought in the supreme court, the defendant has a right to have it so brought, and the amendment I suggest authorizes the Legislature to provide that the case may be taken by certiorari or other process, into the supreme court. Therefore, whatever difficulty might be suggested as to bringing that class of cases in the county court is obviated by the fact that it may be transferred into the supreme court.

Mr. GRAVES—In the opinion of the gentleman [Mr. Chesebro] would that cover about one-half the cases which are pending upon the calendar of the supreme court?

Mr. CHESEBRO—I do not know whether it would cover one-half the cases or not. It is very difficult for any body to determine; but it will cover a large class of cases that ought to be brought in a court different from the supreme court. Beyond desiring to relieve the supreme court from the trial of a class of cases which ought not to be brought before it, and which ought not to incumber its calendar, I desire to elevate the county court. I want it should have original jurisdiction in this class of cases, for the very reason that it will compel the electors of the State to select for the office of county judge a man who is qualified to preside, in not only that class of cases, but cases which necessarily belong to that court—criminal cases of great importance. As the county court is now organized, it is not much more than a higher justice's court. I can see no reason why we should not put into the Constitution this provision. I say we are just as competent to decide what class of cases, and what jurisdiction should be conferred upon the county court, as any Legislature that can be organized; we are just as competent to decide that in regard to county courts, as we are in regard to the supreme court. I know of no reason for referring this question to the Legislature any more than I do the question of the jurisdiction that they shall exercise in cases which should be called in the supreme court. I trust the Convention will give to this court a degree of respectability by conferring upon it this original jurisdition, to which it is really entitled, and thus elevate its character.

Digitized by Google

Mr. A. J. PARKER — I must oppose this amendment, as I opposed it in Committee of the Whole. I believe it would be very injurious to the public interests to adopt it. The mover [Mr. Chesebro] says he wishes to elevate the character of the county court. If it cannot be elevated in any other way, I think we had better leave it where it is. This is too expensive a process—too expensive to suitors, to counsel and to the people. I do not believe the public can be brought to approve of an organization of two courts of original jurisdiction in a county. There can be no necessity for it so long as one court is competent to hear all the cases. You give to each county two or three circuits each year. You can give each as many circuits as are necessary. There is no restriction upon the number of courts that may be held, as to the length of time they may be occupied. The supreme court is organized for the very purpose of trying just such cases as these. The gentleman [Mr. Chesebro] says that the calendar of the circuit is lumbered up with cases of assault and battery, of false imprisonment and malicious prosecutions. I should like to know if there are any more important cases that can be tried than actions of this same class to which he refers. Is there any more important case to be tried than an action for slander or libel, which involves the reputation of a citizen? Is it not quite as important that they should be tried by a judge of the supreme court as it is that a mere claim for money should be thus tried? Does the mover of this amendment think that actions for false imprisonment are a trifling matter, and that they can be tried by some justice of the peace?

Mr. CHESEBRO—Does the gentleman [Mr. A. J. Parker] ask me the question with the desire that I shall answer it?

Mr. A. J. PARKER—Certainly.

Mr. CHESEBRO—If I understand the amendment, it limits the amount of damages claimed to one thousand dollars, and if any body chooses to bring an action in a county court in which he does not claim beyond that amount, he may do so; but he is not inhibited by the amendment from bringing his action in the supreme court if he chooses.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—The amount the amendment names is larger than the majority of recoveries; but the cases are none the less fundamental in their character. A man's character may be vindicated with much less damages than that, upon a full and fair trial before the public, where there is an opportunity of showing that the charge is unfounded. Most of the actions for assault and battery recover, perhaps, less damages than the amount specified in the amendment, but is that a reason for saying the case shall be tried by an inferior magistrate? Is that a reason that the person, which has been deemed sacred, is not to be protected, and his rights tried before a judge in the highest court of original jurisdiction? I confess I look very differently upon this class of cases from the mover of this resolution. If we wish to make a distinction at all, I would give the lower magistrate cognizance of cases for money. Cases for the recovery of damages, for false imprisonment and for the protection of the person from any legal assault are higher cases, they belong to the circuit judge, and they should be brought in the supreme court and should be tried there. I do not like to hear gentlemen of the profession speak of "lumbering" up the calendar of the circuits with cases like these. That is the place for them. They should be brought there; and I, for one, shall vote against this amendment. I prefer to leave it to the Legislature, hereafter, to give jurisdiction to the county court if they shall find it necessary. But I do not think it will be found necessary. I believe that we simplify the system, having but one court of general jurisdiction to hear and determine all these cases.

Mr. GRAVES—The gentleman who has submitted this amendment has done so, I have no doubt, desiring that the jurisdiction of county courts should be enlarged to facilitate the administration of justice. But I must say, that I believe the gentleman has not taken into consideration the amount of labor that now devolves upon the county courts of this State. It will be remembered by this Convention, those of us at all events who are familiar with the duties of the county courts, that all the criminal matter connected with the supreme court within the jurisdiction of the county court, are thrown off by the supreme court upon and are discharged by the county court. In addition to that, recently, there has been a statute passed which permits the county court to try and retry cases which have been brought in justices' courts where the amount claimed exceeded fifty dollars, and where the recovery in the justice's court was fifty dollars. That throws upon the county court an additional amount of labor to that which it has performed heretofore. As the county courts are instituted, and as they do their work, they are in session a longer time than are the circuit courts in the several counties of the State. Circuit courts usually close their labors in one week, and it is not uncommon now that the county courts are in session in the trial of criminal and other cases for two weeks. In addition to that they have a large amount of review or appealed cases that are to be brought upon argument and not before a jury. In addition to that, there are judges in a very great number of the counties of the State who are surrogates—and those two duties put together require the undivided attention of the county judge. So that, unless there is a clear and absolute necessity for taking away business from the supreme court and giving it to the county court, that power should not be granted to them—because the county judge has more work to do in criminal business, appealed business and surrogate business than is done by any one of the supreme court judges at their circuits. In my judgment there is no necessity now for an enlargement of that power. As I said in Committee of the Whole, if the time comes that it should be necessary to enlarge the powers of the county judges, then the Legislature has, of course, under the present sections of this article, power to enlarge the jurisdiction of these county courts, and thus meet the necessity if any exists. I therefore hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. RUMSEY—I think every gentleman who recollects the practice in the courts before the Constitution of 1846 was adopted, will remember that the old court of common pleas was one of the most respectable courts in the State. It had, I believe, original jurisdiction to the amount of two thousand dollars. The judge of that court was almost invariably a good lawyer, and in that court was tried a very large class of cases, not trifling in their character, but important in principle and amount. The result of the existence of that court was that we had very essentially diminished the amount of business in the supreme court circuits, and they were not lumbered up, as they are now, with business that is referred, from time to time, in almost every instance, to the county judge of the county where it exists. Not only that, but the county court, as it is now organized, deals with the liberty and very nearly with the life of individuals, because it has a criminal jurisdiction that influences the liberty of the individual for a large number of years. These interests are quite as important as those which the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] is unwilling to trust to the county courts. If we may trust with them the power of sending persons to the State prison for from five to ten years, we can trust with them the power of trying questions which involve simply the characters of persons. There is no difficulty about it. Such cases can be tried as well in the old court of common pleas as they are tried at terms of the supreme court circuits. In my judgment one of the most efficient means we can find for the purpose of enabling our courts to do up their business regularly will be the conferring of this original jurisdiction upon county courts. Every lawyer familiar with the practice knows that, of the great multitude of evils which has resulted from the Constitution of 1846 one of the greatest was the depriving the court of common pleas of original jurisdiction. From that day to this, the supreme court calendars have been lumbered up more than ever before—and there will be no more effectual way, in my judgment, to relieve that court than by returning this jurisdiction to the county courts. Almost invariably the judges of the county court are good sound lawyers—men whom the people will trust, men who are almost invariably selected as referees in cases where, by reason of the press of business in the supreme court, they cannot be tried at circuit. Will any gentleman say that these men are not competent as judges to try cases which they tried as referees?

Mr. CHESEBRO—On the amendment I presented I ask the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Chesebro, and it was declared adopted by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, N. M. Allen, Axtell, Baker, Beadle, E. Brooks, E. P. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Chesebro, Corbett, Corning, Curtis, Daly, Duganne, C. C. Dwight, Eddy, Farnum, Field, Fowler, Fuller, Garvin, Gould, Hammond, Hand, Hardenburgh, Hatch, Hitchcock, Kinney, Lapham, A. Lawrence, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Ludington, Magee, Mattice, McDonald, Merritt, Monell, Opdyke, Potter, President, Prindle, Robertson, Rumsey, Schell, Smith, Stratton, S. Townsend, Van Cott, Verplanck, Wakeman, Williams —52.

Noes—Messrs. Alvord, Andrews, Archer, Ballard, Beals, Beckwith, Bell, Bergen, Bickford, Bowen, E. A. Brown, Colahan, Comstock, Cooke, Ely, Ferry, Flagler, Folger, Goodrich, Grant, Graves, Hadley, Houston, Ketcham, Krum, Livingston, Merwin, Miller, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, Pond, Rathbun, Reynolds, L. W. Russell, Seaver, Silvester, Spencer, Van Campen—38.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I move a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

Objection being made to the immediate consideration of the motion it was laid on the table.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I now move to strike out in the twelfth line the words "fixed by the board of supervisors" and insert the words "established by law." It is still more evident from the vote which has just been taken in this Convention that these county courts are to become very important tribunals in our jurisprudence. The vote of the Convention has just conferred upon them by constitutional law a jurisdiction in all cases where the amount claimed does not exceed one thousand dollars. That limitation will be found to embrace a very large proportion of legal controversies. I need not enforce the importance of raising up, so far as we can, the character of these courts, and I am sure I need not undertake to show this Convention how much the dignity and the standing of these tribunals will depend upon the compensation to be attached to the office of judge. The Legislature is eminently the proper authority to establish a rate of compensation. It concerns all the counties alike and it concerns alike the people of the State. I commend, therefore, this change in the Constitution to the consideration of the Convention. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MAGEE—I rise to give briefly the reasons why I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock]. It is hardly necessary for me to say that the boards of supervisors are constantly changing. Take them as a whole, so far as the levying of taxes is concerned, they are very capricious. I wish to see the county court elevated to the standard as near as may be of the supreme court. I want the best class of lawyers in the State to occupy the county benches, and I think we cannot expect that, unless we place the matter in such a position that they will be independent of the caprice of the boards of supervisors. I hope the amendment will be adopted, that we may get rid of such a case as we may suppose, where a judge in the county of Onondaga receives a compensation of a thousand dollars, while a judge in another county, performing the same duties, will receive only five hundred dollars, owing to the caprice or misjudgment of the boards of supervisors, or owing perhaps to political considerations.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared adopted.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to strike out in the sixteenth line the word "forty" and insert "sixty," so that the power to separate the office of county judge and surrogate shall only exist in counties which have sixty thousand population instead of forty thousand. This is an amendment in the same direction as that which has just been adopted—an amendment which will tend to increase the character and respectability of that court.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Folger, and it was declared adopted.

Mr. AXTELL—I move to strike out in the fifth line the words "as at present existing." These words are surplusage. They amount to nothing, and therefore should not be there.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared lost.

Mr. KETCHAM—I move to strike out the word "may" in the sixteenth line and insert the word "shall."

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Ketcham, and it was declared lost.

Mr. M. H. LAWRENCE—I move to strike out the word "diminished," in the twelfth line, and insert in lieu thereof the word "altered," so that it will read "shall not be altered during his continuance in office." I attach great importance to this county court; and I offer this amendment so that when a judge accepts the office it shall be with the understanding that he does it for so much money during his term of office, and that he shall use no effort to increase his salary by making compensation to any one. I should like to have the same rule apply to justices who have been so much criticised and the subject of so many witticisms in this Convention. I believe that some of the purest and best men in this State occupy the bench by the side of those county judges.

Mr. AXTELL—I move the previous question on this section.

Mr. BECKWITH—I wish to move a reconsideration of the vote taken adopting the word "sixty" in place of "forty," on the motion of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger].

The immediate consideration of the motion being objected to, it was laid on the table.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Axtell, and it was declared lost, and the previous question was refused.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I cannot bring my mind to believe that this amendment ought to be adopted. By a vote of the Convention we have just said that we will leave this whole subject to the Legislature. An amendment like this in principle has been proposed in reference to other courts, and has been very decidedly rejected. I am not aware of any reason for inhibiting the Legislature from changing the rate of compensation of county judges by a uniform general law.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. M. H. Lawrence, and it was declared lost.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I move to strike out in the third line the word "four," and insert the word "six," so that the section will read "one county judge, who shall hold his office six years." I do it in conformity with the system which has been adopted by the Convention with regard to the other courts. I think the term of office as provided in this section, should be at least six years.

Mr. BERGEN—I demand the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Chesebro, and it was declared carried by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Alvord, Andrews, Axtell, Baker, Beckwith, Bergen, Bowen, E. Brooks, E.P. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Chesebro, Colahan, Comstock, Corbett, Daly, C. C. Dwight, Farnum, Field, Folger, Fuller, Garvin, Gould, Hadley, Hardenburgh, Hatch, Hitchcock, Ketcham, Kinney, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Livingston, Magee, McDonald, Merritt, Miller, Monell, Opdyke, Potter, President, Prindle, Reynolds, Rumsey, Schell, Seaver, Silvester, Smith, Spencer, S. Townsend, Van Campen, Van Cott, Verplanck—51.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, N. M. Allen, Archer, Ballard, Bickford, E. A. Brown, Cooke, Eddy, Ely, Fowler, Goodrich, Grant, Graves, Hammond, Hand, Houston, Krum, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Ludington, Mattice, Merwin, A. J. Parker, Pond, Rathbun, L. W. Russell, Stratton, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—30.

Mr. GRAVES—I move to reconsider the vote on the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], taking the power from the board of supervisors and giving it to the Legislature, to fix the salary of the county judge, and ask that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT—It will lie on the table under the rule.

Mr. LAPHAM offered the following amendment:

Add at the end of the amendment offered by Mr. Chesebro as follows:

"And it shall have such other original jurisdiction as shall from time to time be conferred upon it by the Legislature."

Mr. LAPHAM—It may seem heretical in me to say it, but I believe the Convention of 1846, in taking away from the jurisdiction of the county courts committed a very grave error. The Legislature the very next year after the adoption of that Constitution undertook to confer upon those courts original civil jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction was exercised until, by the decision of the court of last resort, it was determined that the Legislature had no power to confer it. Now, the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. Chesebro], which has been adopted, provides that general jurisdiction—original jurisdiction in cases between citizens residing in the county to the amount of a thousand dollars shall be conferred upon those courts. It provides also the cases in which appellate jurisdiction may be conferred upon those courts, but it leaves no power in the Legislature to add cases of original civil jurisdiction. There is a large class of cases involving a mere prosecution of demands for money such as have been referred to by the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], which, with entire propriety, may be conferred upon those courts. There are cases between suitors only one of whom resides in the county, which may, with entire prepriety, be conferred upon those courts. If I were to have the exercise of my choice and were to abolish either of the two courts, I would abolish the circuit court and make the county court the entire court of civil and original jurisdiction for the trial of causes at nisi prius. But that does not meet the view of the majority of this Convention. The amendment which I propose will enable the Legislature, from time to time, as may be found necessary, to enlarge the jurisdiction of this tribunal, and thus relieve the circuit calendars from the onus which has been thrown upon them by the course taken by the Convention of 1846. There has hardly been a circuit calendar in the State where there has not been an almost ruinous accumulation of causes, compelling suitors from term to term to go and stay a week, two weeks, and sometimes three weeks, and then go home without a trial of their causes.

Mr. BERGEN—I hope this amendment will prevail. The Convention of 1846, especially the legal members of it, were against giving civil jurisdiction to the county courts. In those days, especially in the western part of the State, they were viewed as "one-horse" concerns—as useless, and unworthy of being preserved. Under the Constitution of 1821, they had civil original jurisdiction. They had what we are about conferring upon them now, and, as a member of the Convention of 1846, I, for one, was in favor of continuing that jurisdiction in the county courts. In the county which I, in part, represented, they had always been good courts, and given satisfaction. I rejoice to see, after twenty-one years' experience, that gentlemen have come to the conclusion that the jurisdiction given in the Constitution of 1821 was more correct, operated better and gave more satisfaction than that in the Constitution of 1846, and they are now willing to return to the old system. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will prevail.

The question was then put on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. Lapham, and it was declared carried.

Mr. KRUM—I move to strike out of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro] that portion of it which leaves the power in the Legislature to limit the right of appeal from the county courts to the supreme court. I have not the amendment before me and cannot state the words, but that is the idea. I think that when we have given the county courts jurisdiction to the amount of a thousand dollars we have done enough, and there should be no restriction to the right of appeal from that court to any other court.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I should like to hear the amendment read, that we may see whether there is any restriction.

Mr. CHESEBRO—There is no restriction. It simply provides that the Legislature may in its wisdom restrict the appeals from the county courts.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the amendment as follows:

To strike out "and for limiting appeals from the said county courts to the supreme court."

Mr. COMSTOCK—That does not limit the right of appeal from the county courts, except as it gives to the Legislature authority to regulate these appeals, which I am sure is very proper.

Mr. KRUM—It was not thought advisable—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman having spoken once upon this question, cannot proceed without unanimous consent.

No objection was offered.

Mr. KRUM—I will not trespass upon the attention of the Convention long. It was not thought advisable to leave it discretionary with the Legislature to confer upon the county courts original jurisdiction. It has been deemed advisable, by the vote of this Convention, to confer this original jurisdiction in the Constitution. Now, when this Convention have seen fit to confer that original jurisdiction by the Constitution itself, I think it is not safe to trust the Legislature with the discretionary right of limiting the appeals from those courts; but I insist that when they have the original jurisdiction to the amount of one thousand dollars, the right to appeal from the judgments rendered in that county court should be limited by no power upon earth. Every individual, every suitor, should have the right to appeal from the judgment of this local tribunal.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—Is an amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT—It is.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I move to strike out the word "limited" and substitute "regulated."

Mr. ANDREWS—As I understand it, there is no right to appeal at all, except by force of some statute; and if this provision were entirely omitted, it would be left to the Legislature to say whether the right of appeal from the judgment rendered in the county courts should or should not exist.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Livingston, and it was declared lost.

The question was then put on the amendment offered by Mr. Krum, and it was declared carried.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I would like to inquire what the Secretary regards as the amendment of the gentleman from Schoharie [Mr. Krum], what he strikes out?

The SECRETARY—Strike out the words "and for limiting appeals from said county court to the supreme court."

Mr. KRUM—I desire to move a further amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. Chesebro, by striking out "one thousand," and inserting "five hundred."

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Krum, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 38 to 43.

There being no further amendment offered to section 18, the SECRETARY proceeded to read section 19 as follows:

SEC. 19. The county judge of any county may preside at courts of sessions or hold county courts in any other county (except the city and county of New York and the county of Kings), when requested thereto by the county judge of said other county.

There being no amendment proposed to section 19, the SECRETARY proceeded to read section 20 as follows:

SEC. 20. The Legislature may, on application

f the board of supervisors, provide for the elec-f local officers, not to exceed two in any to discharge the duties of county judge surrogate, in cases of their inability or of and to exercise such other powers in cases as may be provided by law.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I desire to ask unanimous consent that section 18 may be amended by striking out the sentence, "all surrogates in office when this Constitution shall take effect shall hold their respective offices until the expiration of the terms for which they were respectively elected," for the reason that we have inserted that amendment in section 31, where it is conceded by all that it properly belongs; and it would save the printing of this long sentence when this amended article is printed.

There being no objection, the amendment was made.

There being no amendment offered to section 20, the SECRETARY proceeded to read section 21 as follows:

SEC. 21. The Legislature may reorganize the judicial departments and districts at the first session after the return of every enumeration under this Constitution, in the manner provided for in the — section of sixth article, and at no other time. But the Legislature shall not increase the number of the departments or of the districts.

No amendment was offered to the section.

Mr. SILVESTER—I call up for consideration the motion which I made last evening for the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] was lost.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I desire to say to the members of the Convention, in regard to the proposition that I had the privilege of submitting as a substitue, that, it being a matter of some importance, I hope the Convention will grant me a reconsideration of that vote, so that we may have a deliberate determination of the question. I have no pride about this thing. I think it is simple and I think it will work well. It has a flexibility about it which I think no other system which has been presented to us has, and I ask the indulgence of the Convention in consenting to a reconsideration of this vote.

Mr. MERRITT—Last night, when this proposition was up, I voted against it. I have given it some consideration since, and I shall vote in favor of it.

The PRESIDENT—The Secretary will read the substitute for the information of the Convention.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the substitute, as follows:

"The Legislature, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall provide for the creation and organization of three or more general terms of the supreme court, and provision shall be made by law for designating ten or more of the said justices of the said supreme court who shall hold the same; and also for designating from such number a chief justice for each of said general terms, who shall act as such during his continuance in office. Any three or more of said justices so designated may hold such general terms.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I voted for that proposition last evening, but I have since discovered a weakness in it which induces me to hesitate. It was the purpose of the Judiciary Committee to change the character of these general terms, to have fewer of them than now exist, and therefore the committee proposed to divide the State into departments for the purpose of having four departmental courts instead of eight district courts. The merit claimed for this substitute of my friend from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] is its great elasticity. He tells us and tells us truly, that it may be molded by the Legislature into any thing, and accordingly the language of the proposition is that one or more of these courts may be established; one or more chief judges may be made; and ten or more judges may be assigned. It is so exceedingly elastic that the Legislature may make eight general terms just as we now have, and I am afraid that under it we should get back practically into the precise state of things of which we now complain.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Mr. President —

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman can only speak by unanimous consent. No objection being made, the gentleman can proceed.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—The objection which the gentleman makes to the section that I offer as a substitute for the section of the committee, has been made to me by two or three gentlemen, and I have thought it over before presenting my amendment. The objection raised by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] which is the only one I have found raised by any member of this Convention to the proposition I have introduced as a substitute for the eighth section of the majority report, is that it may and does give to the Legislature the power to bring us back precisely to the present system; that under it the Legislature may create eight general terms; and that if the Legislature does see fit to create eight general terms then we will be just where we are now. I think I am able to answer that objection. I admit that under my proposition the Legislature can give us eight general terms, can give us ten, or any number that can be made up from thirty-four judges; and with each general term be manned by three judges, they can give us eleven, and that is the only limit I have given to the Legislature. But I desire to call the attention of this committee to this inquiry: what earthly object would the Legislature have in giving us eight general terms if three can do the business? I was answered by some gentleman with whom I have been in conversation yesterday evening and to-day that the lawyers in the Legislature would desire general terms for their districts and that it would come right back to this system. That is a mistake. The lawyer of every district wants a general term in his district, but it makes no difference to him how many you have, whether you have four general terms or twenty; all he wants is a session of those terms in his district. By the thirteenth section of the article under consideration, as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, it will be found that the Legislature is to determine the time and place of holding these general terms. That is right, and I agree to it. The difficulty that I want to avoid is this: under the department system, although I admit it is better than the present district system, the city of New York, connected as it is with Brooklyn and that section of the State, has no more judges to hold general terms than the fourth or the seventh. Now under the system of the committee you have bound the judges by geographical lines, so far as the general terms are concerned, in a part of the State where they are not wanted. As I said before, I desire them to be under the control of the people, not to be elected by the Legislature, but that the Legislature shall designate, and under the thirteenth section, appoint the time and place where those judges are to hold general terms. If three are sufficient no lawyer will complain, if there is a sufficient number of sessions of that general term within the limit of his travel. No one will ever come to the Legislature and ask for additional general terms. They do not want that. They want a session of that term whether it is three, four or five—

Digitized by Google

Mr. POND—Can the gentleman [Mr. Hardenburgh] not put a prohibition in his amendment limiting the number of terms to four, if necessary?

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I can, of course, put in a prohibition, but I like to have the system somewhat flexible. The difficulty that I think we have been laboring under in all our troubles here, is that, we do not leave any thing to the servants of the people. I want at least this intermediate stepping-stone under the control of the people themselves. I say, let us have three or more general terms; and if, in the progress of time, it becomes necessary to have another general term, I would like to know what member of this Convention would deny the people the right to have it, or compel them to go through the form of having another Constitutional Convention to obtain it? It is for its flexibility, as I have said over and over again, that I claim for this proposition the favorable consideration of this Convention. You will observe that the system under which we are now living, judges are selected for the districts and there they remain, with no commander to send them where they are wanted. The fourth district does not, of course, want as much local judicial force as the third even, certainly not as much as the second or the first, and I desire—

Mr. FOLGER—Where does the gentleman find, either in the eighth section, or in the law as it exists now, any prohibition upon the Legislature from sending the judges of the eighth district down to New York to hold general term?

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I do not find any.

Mr. FOLGER—And let me ask the gentleman another question. Is the present system not flexible? Cannot the Legislature now move judges from the eighth district, or any other district which has a superabundance of judges, to the first district, or any other district where there is not a superabundance?

Mr. HARDENBURGH—That they may do. But you make your judges departmental, and I question very much whether you can take them from their departments.

Mr. FOLGER—That is just the query which I wish answered. Where does the gentleman find any thing which raises that question?

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I find it really in the question which the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] puts me. He has raised the question now. If there was no question about it it would not have been asked. I simply say the other objection which I have to it is that you have confined it, and bound it in a straight-jacket by having four general terms. It may be, and I claim that now three will do all the general term business of this State.

Mr. FOLGER—The question I wish to ask is, where is the "straight-jacket?" Where is the language which sews together the straight-jacket? [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDENBURGH—You cannot have more than four general terms under your system.

Mr. FOLGER—I say that you can.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Under the report of the majority of the committee?

Mr. FOLGER—Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I will pause a moment and ask the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] to show me where it can be done. It says a general term shall be held in each department.

Mr. FOLGER—The assertion is made by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] that you cannot change them. I call upon him to tell me where is the language which shows they cannot be changed, and that puts a "straight-jacket" upon the Legislature?

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I have just called upon the gentleman to answer that. You can not have more than four general terms by your proposition and you cannot have less.

Mr. FOLGER—You can have less if you choose.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I would like to see where you could get less.

Mr. FOLGER—I was asking a question to this point. The gentleman has argued forcibly and at some length that the force of judges of the supreme court ought to be distributable through the State—that they ought to be as an army, as he says, and that the commander, whoever he is, should have the power to dispose of this force, or direct it to a certain place or locality as he saw fit. I say there is nothing in the law as it exists to-day, under our present Constitution, and there is nothing in the report of the Judiciary Committee, which forbids the commander, whoever he may be, from taking his surplus force from one part of the State and applying it to a point where it is needed in another part of the State.

Mr. HARDENBURGH — The distinguished gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] has not answered the proposition that I put to him. I decline to answer his because I do not know but what the gentleman is right—that they may do it. But, however that may be, they do not do it. But he passed from that and asked where there was any more flexibility in my proposition than in his. I say—

Mr. McDONALD—I call the attention of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] to the eighth section, where the provision is that "four justices in each department shall be designated to hold general terms." Does that limit them to their holding four general terms?

Mr. HARDENBUGRH—That is what I say. I had approached that subject after I had declined to answer the question of the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], because I rather think he may be right. They may do it, but they do not do it. We do put the Legislature in a strait-jacket when we provide that they shall have not more than four or not less than four, and it is in that respect alone that my proposition differs from the proposition of the majority report.

The gentleman's time having expired, the gavel fell.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll on the motion of Mr. Silvester to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of Mr. Hardenburgh was lost.

The name of Mr. M. H. Lawrence was called.

Mr. M. H. LAWRENCE—I ask to be excused from voting because I have paired off with Judge Barker.

No objection being made, the gentleman was excused.

The name of Mr. Livingston was called.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I will vote for the reconsideration, but do not want to be understood as committing myself to vote for the proposition. I vote aye.

The name of Mr. Van Cott was called.

Mr. VAN COTT—I voted against this proposition last evening and Mr. Hale voted for it. I have paired off with him on the question to-day, and therefore ask to be excused from voting.

No objection being made, the gentleman was excused.

The SECRETARY proceeded with and completed the call of the roll, and the motion to reconsider was carried by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Axtell, Ballard, Beadle, Beals, Bell, Bergen, Bickford, Bowen, E. Brooks, E. P. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Case, Chesebro, Colahan, Comstock, Cooke, Corning, Duganne, Eddy, Ferry, Field, Flagler, Fowler, Fuller, Gould, Grant, Graves, Hammond, Hand, Hardenburgh, Hatch, Ketcham, Krum, A. Lawrence, Lee, Livingston, Ludington, Magee, Mattice, McDonald, Merritt, Miller, Monell, Opdyke, Pond, Potter, President, Prindle, Rathbun, Robertson, Rumsey, Schell, Silvester, Smith, Stratton, S. Townsend, Van Campen, Verplanck—58.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Archer, Baker, Beckwith, E. A. Brown, Corbett, Daly, C. C. Dwight, Ely, Farnum, Folger, Garvin, Goodrich, Hadley, Hitchcock, Houston, Kinney, Lapham, Merwin, A. J. Parker, Reynolds, Seaver, Spencer, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—28.

The PRESIDENT—The question now recurs on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I suppose the eighth section is now under consideration, so that an amendment may be in order.

The PRESIDENT—Amendments generally are in order.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Is an amendment to the eighth section now in order?

The PRESIDENT—An amendment will only be in order to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh], that being the pending question.

Mr. McDONALD—I move to amend by inserting, instead of the words "organization of three or four or more," as follows: "An organization of not less than three or more than five."

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. McDonald, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I offer now, as a substitute for the substitute of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] the printed section number 8, with a slight change in it, which I will now propose. After the words "four justices of each department," insert "including the chief justice," so that it shall read, "four justices of each department, including the chief justice." In my provision we designate the chief justice also.

The amendment was read by the SECRETARY as follows:

SEC. 8. Provision shall be made by law for designating, from time to time, the justices who shall hold the general terms, and also for designating from their number a chief justice of each department, who shall act as such during his continuance in office. Four justices in each department, including the chief justice, shall be designated to hold general terms, and three of them shall form a quorum, and the justices so designated may sit at general term in any district, except as the Legislature may otherwise provide. It shall be competent for any one or more of said judges to hold special terms and circuit courts, and to preside in courts of oyer and terminer in any county as the Legislature may by law direct.

Mr. ANDREWS—The Convention, in my judgment, by the vote which has just been taken, has seemed to favor a more radical change in the judiciary system of this State than any that has heretofore been proposed to this Convention. They have not only obliterated the districts and departments, but they have provided, in my judgment, for an entire separation, practically, of the duties of the trial judge from those of the appellate judge. Because, if the view of the mover of the amendment which has been passed shall prevail, it provides that there shall be, within the State, three general terms, composed of three judges each, to do all the appellate business of the State. It is very clear, I think, that the selection of these nine or ten judges from a body of thirty-four judges in the State is, practically, to devote those persons selected simply and solely to general term duty, while it leaves the remainder of the judges to perform solely and alone circuit duty. If this is not so—

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Where does the gentleman find in the proposition that I submitted any thing which will lead him to say there is an absolute divorce of the general term from the circuit?

Mr. ANDREWS—I have not said that the substitute so declares it, but that this will be the practical and necessary result, in my judgment, of the operation of the system.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Will the gentleman allow me one more question?

Digitized by Google

Mr. ANDREWS—Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Does the gentleman suppose, therefore, or does he assume, or does this Convention assume to itself, to decide that the divorce of the system is better for twenty or thirty years to come than the other plan which has been proposed, or whether or not that it would not be better to take the middle course and let the Legislature or the people decide from time to time?

Mr. ANDREWS—The gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] does not declare by the amendment he proposes that these two jurisdictions shall be divorced; but I insist upon it that the practical operation of this section is to create just as absolute a divorce between these two different branches of duty as though you so declared in the amendment which has just been proposed. For it will be seen that there will be only nine or ten judges in the State devoted to general term duty. As a matter of necessity, the balance of the judges, for the time being, must be remitted to circuit duty, and it will be impossible that the entire body of judges shall in turn, for any considerable period of time, be able to act as one of the force of nine judges doing general term duty in the State. Moreover, the friends of this present system, whom I have heretofore supposed to have been a majority in this Convention, lose sight, it seems to me, of another thing. Under the present system the districts mean something. In the first place they are electoral districts for the election of judges within their boundaries, and in the next place they are provided for the purpose of organizing eight general terms, from those judges to do duty within the districts. But here there is an entire separation between the judges of a particular district and the general term which may act within that district. In other words, the persons who are to form and constitute the general term are judges outside of the districts in which they are to hold them; as it cannot be possible that, at most, more than one of the judges of each district can form one of the bench of the general term within that district. Now I do not particularly object to this proposition of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh]; but it seems to me that if we are to favor the union of these two duties in the judiciary, then we should oppose the proposition of the gentleman. As I have attempted to show, this proposition is, practically and in substance, the same as the one proposed by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle]. If we desire to preserve the districts as district, and the action of the judiciary within the districts as district, then the proposition should be opposed, because it provides that persons holding the general terms shall be, of necessity, persons who are not judges of the district where the general term may be held. Will the gentleman say that general terms can be held in all the districts as now, although there are but three branches of the general term? As we all know there is, practically, only a portion of the year in which general terms can be held at all. During the summer months and during other parts of the year, duty of this kind is practically suspended, so that there are scarcely to exceed six months in the year in which general term duty can be performed and benches of the general term held. Now, let us see. There are, in the eight districts, at least thirty-two general terms held in each year and these, if they are held a single week at a time, will consume thirty-four weeks. But, for the purpose of doing this duty, instead of the number of the benches at general term we now have, the three benches will have to do it entirely, and it will be impossible, in my judgment, to give effect to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh], that these general terms can be held as now conveniently within each district of the State.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—How many does the Judiciary Committee organize in their scheme—only four?

Mr. ANDREWS—Yes.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—And the gentleman thinks that four can certainly do it, but doubts whether three can?

Mr. ANDREWS—I think that four is the least number that can do that work in this State.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Then I will get rid of all that argument by accepting four in my proposition.

Mr. ANDREWS—Then it is the proposition of the Judiciary Committee in their report, but the committee preserve the identity of the departments by organizing in each of the departments a general term; whereas the proposition of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] ignores that division and separation.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I have yet to learn a reason for it.

Mr. BALLARD—If I understand the effect of the section adopted—section 8—while it organizes four departments, it yet does not dispense with the judges sitting in each of the districts as now organized. Now, the difficulty with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] is the one that has been so well stated by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews]. The amendments subsequently proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] is that four justices in each department, including the chief justice, shall be designated to hold the general term. Now, as I understand the effect of that, it is to confine the system to four general terms only, for the reason that there will be but four presiding justices.

Mr. COMSTOCK—That is the object

Mr. BALLARD—Then that strikes directly at this feature of the system which requires and allows a general term to be held in each district.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Oh, not at all. There are to be four and only four courts in banc, but they may, and by the thirteenth section they are required to sit in each district of the State. My proposition only goes to the constitution of the court in banc, not at all to the place where it sits.

Mr. BALLARD—Then this chief judge—

Mr. COMSTOCK—He is to go with his court and hold courts in banc in the different districts, as by law provided.

Mr. BALLARD—That, then, is the question, whether the Convention is prepared to adopt that system as applied to our supreme court. This one bench must visit the eight judicial districts of the

Digitized by Google

State with the same presiding judge in every one of the districts.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Under our former judicial system we had but one supreme court, but it sat in different places holding courts at different times and at convenient points designated by law; but by the rapid growth of the commerce and business of the State, it has become impossible for one supreme court to do all the business, and it was proposed that there should be a division into four courts in banc, with a chief justice in each. I do not know how it may be with others, but it has been my steady purpose to exclude from the system we are now creating these six or eight district courts which we now have. I admit and declare that that was my object, and the object of the Judiciary Committee, if it had any definite purpose in creating these departments. Now, my objection to the plan of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] is its exceeding elasticity, under which the Legislature may remit us to the same district courts which we had under the Constitution of 1846. It has seemed to me wiser, and I suppose that was the idea of the Judiciary Committee, to have four departments in the State, with a chief justice in each, and a court organized for each out of the whole bench of the judges of the State, constituting only four courts in banc within the supreme court, but requiring them by law to hold their sessions wherever convenience should require. That has been my idea of the system we are trying to create, and therefore I offered this amendment, to which I call the attention of the Convention, in order that that idea may be more and more, and with less and less ambiguity, fixed in the system which we are about to establish.

Mr DALY—My experience upon this subject has been the same as that of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock]. The first impression which I received from the proposition of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] was favorable, but the subsequent consideration of it satisfied me that it would destroy the whole system which has been proposed by the committee and acted upon by the Convention. I called the attention of the Convention some days ago to the fact that nothing received, in the Convention of 1846, more general approval, as an existing necessity, than the territorial division of the supreme court; and that, in its practical operation, so far as the inquiries of the committee extended, nothing had been more satisfactory. The Judiciary Committee had seventeen plans proposed to them, and out of those seventeen plans they constructed what they regarded as a symmetrical system of judiciary for the State—a system in accordance with the fundamental principles upon which the Convention of 1846 acted, and in accordance with the division into districts and departments in other States of the Union. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] is to break up this symmetrical division and leave it entirely to the Legislature to determine what general terms beyond three in number shall exist, where they shall be located, and how they shall act. In other words it is taking the control of the symmetry of the system out of the hands of the Convention and giving it into the hands of the Legislature. So far as the elasticity and flexibility of it is concerned it will certainly be flexible enough in that respect; but I apprehend, as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has apprehended, that the practical working of this system would bring it back to the permanent general term sitting in banc, composed of judges distinct from the circuit judges; and I wish to say, as I said before, that, after twenty-one years' experience of a plan which had never been tried before, a plan which does not now exist in any other State of the Union, or in any other country where there is a system of jurisprudence, the plan of having one body of judges act as circuit judges, and another body of judges to review their decisions in banc, the public sentiment of this State was unanimous for its abolition. I say unanimous, because no gentleman in the Convention of 1846 referred to it (and it was referred to by many) without giving expression to the general judgment of the people that the system was a failure, and should be abolished. I apprehend that the practical operation of the plan proposed by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] would be the same, and now at the close of this session, after the Judiciary Committee have been for nearly two months engaged in the laborious investigation of this subject, after the elaborate discussions on the subject that have taken place upon this floor, I call upon this Convention to hesitate and not to hastily discard this plan for the mere suggestion of the gentleman from Ulster. I make the remark with the highest regard for the gentleman and for his experience and ability, but I call upon the Convention not to reject the plan of the committee for his plan without giving the subject that full and deliberate consideration which so important a change should receive.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I am a little sorry that the members of this committee are so sensitive on the idea that any one should suggest a thought upon this subject, in even the remotest degree, differing from their own. Now, my friend from New York [Mr. Daly] says that his experience of twenty-one years has taught him the effect of a system of this kind—

Mr. DALY—I beg to correct the gentleman. I said that the experience of the people of this State for twenty-one years had taught them that the system was a failure.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Then I beg to call to the gentleman's memory the fact that he said the other day that there was only a page and a half of the debates of the Convention of 1846 devoted to this subject.

Mr. DALY—I beg leave again to correct the gentleman. I stated that there were only two pages of those debates devoted to the subject of the judicial tenure of office, but there are nearly three hundred pages of the debates on the general question of the organization of the judiciary.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I wish to say to the members of the Convention that the scheme I propose differs in no way or degree from the scheme of the committee, except in relation to its flexibility. If gentlemen think it is too flexible, I will put in it, if it will suit them better, that there shall not be less than three nor more than four. It is not on that point that I differ with my friends. I want to know where we are to stop here in curtailing the powers of the Legislature. If you are going to construct your courts entirely here, you had better make your decisions here also. Give the people material out of which they are to construct the courts, constantly keeping in view the division of our government into three grand departments, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial, and then I think you have done your duty in the matter. But instead of that, you sit here, hedging around and hemming in the Legislature, as if you were the people themselves. I have found fault with that spirit in this Convention before. I find fault with it now. I tell you, you should give to the people a college of thirty-four judges, and then say to them in plain Saxon, "out of this college of judges—out of this judicial force you can select ten or more to form three or more general terms, to do the business of the State." When you have done this you have done your duty. That is the idea I am after. I do not want to bind up the people in a straight-jacket for twenty years, with only four general terms. Now, my friend from New York [Mr. Daly] says that the Judiciary Committee labored for two months upon this plan. That committee was a large one, composed, I may say, of the talent of this Convention. They divided the State into four departments, and they came in here with this avowed object—my friend from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews] declared that to be their object—to have a larger area out of which they could select the judges; and yet, in the very article which they submitted, they said that four judges should live in the district in which I live! That is what the committee did after two months of deliberation. They did that at the suggestion of somebody, I suppose, and I find no fault with it; and I do not interfere with their department scheme. But what is there left of it? There is nothing but a name and a shadow left of that scheme since the adoption of this report. In the report, there is provision for four departments; but now there is nothing left of that departmental scheme except the name. My friend from Onondaga [Mr. Andrews] says that my system practically makes a divorce, as the amendment of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle] sought to do, between the circuit and the general term. It is not so, sir. I steered directly between the two rocks, upon which, in my opinion, those other propositions split. I say I will leave that question to the people. If they select and designate the judges who are to hold these general terms, and the system works well, the people will keep it so; but if they finally conclude that it is better to interchange between circuit and general terms, why then the people can provide for their doing it; and I submit that it is not our business here to fix a stubborn, unchangeable rule, so that the people will have to go to the trouble of calling another Convention to alter it. I trust the people upon this subject; and if you put the plain proposition to them, I have no doubt they will agree with it.

Mr. WAKEMAN—This subject has been talked about more or less for two weeks. Various plans have been proposed, a plan by the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], one by the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh], one by the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale], and another by another gentleman in the Convention; and of all the plans proposed, I believe, the last one is the worst. All these several propositions except the last, have been voted down. Now, let us look back and see where we started from. I ask gentlemen here, whether the people of this State have complained of the present arrangement of the courts, and so far as the business of the courts is concerned?—whether it has not been convenient for every portion of the State and entirely satisfactory to the people? To be sure they have complained of one point—the multiplicity of the general terms and the consequent conflict of decisions. What have the committee sought to do? They have combined two districts in one and required the judges of the department to hold general terms in the districts as they now exist, the chief justice to be chief justice in both, so as to diminish the chances of conflicting decisions by one half. The proposition of the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] sweeps entirely away the whole of the system that has been adopted heretofore by this Convention. Are we prepared to do this when it is evident that the people of the State are wholly satisfied with the present system, if the conflict of decisions can be done away with, and if judges can be prevented from sitting in review of their own decisions?

Mr. HARDENBURGH—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WAKEMAN—Certainly.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—What does my proposition sweep away? Your object is to get fewer general terms. Well, I make fewer than the report of the committee does. I do not see what it is that I sweep away.

Mr. WAKEMAN—In my judgment, the conflict of opinions under the gentleman's plan would be much worse than it is now. Under the plan of the committee we shall have something settled in the decisions of the courts—something, at least, that may be regarded as settled until the court of appeals shall have overruled it; but if you allow the courts to perambulate through the State, you will have nothing settled in any department whatever. As I understand the proposition, these courts are to designate who shall hold the circuits; and it is said that every justice may be designated to hold circuits. Very likely. But can you adopt a system by which every justice shall have his turn in the general term, as under the proposition reported by the committee? If it is important and right that the justice who sits at general term shall also hold the circuits, why not establish the principle here, to make it certain? Otherwise, I much prefer the plan of the gentleman from Chenango [Mr. Prindle], divorcing entirely the general terms and the circuits. Now, inasmuch as we have voted down all the other propositions so far, and have adhered all the way through to the system, substantially, as reported by the committee, it seems to me that, to pass this proposition would be, at this late hour in our session, to undo all that we have done, and I really hope it will not prevail, because I am entirely satisfied with the system as it now exists, and the people of the State are well satisfied with it. The next best thing, or perhaps better still, is the department system reported by the committee, and I hope we shall consider well before we adopt any other.

Mr. MERRITT—I move the previous question.

The PRESIDENT—To what extent?

Mr. MERRITT—On the whole proposition.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Merritt, and it was declared carried.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll.

The name of Mr. A. F. Allen was called.

Mr. A. F. ALLEN—I have paired off with Mr. Flagler on this question.

The SECRETARY completed the call of the roll.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I desire to call the attention of the President to the fact—

The PRESIDENT—The result of the vote has not been announced.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I know that; but I want to know whether any vote can change the result when the question has been decided before?

Mr. FOLGER—It is too late to raise that point.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I raised the point before —

Mr. FOLGER—Mr. President, is this discussion in order under the operation of the previous question?

The PRESIDENT—It is not.

Mr. SILVESTER—Is it too late to raise a point of order?

The PRESIDENT—It is too late after the vote has been taken.

Mr. C. C. DWIGHT—I would like to have the name of Mr. Frank called again. [Laughter.]

The SECRETARY called the name of Mr. Frank, but he did not respond.

Mr. SEAVER—I rise to a question of privilege. The rule of this Convention requires that every member within the bar of the house when his name is called shall vote. I desire that the name of Mr. Frank be called again.

The PRESIDENT—The question of privilege is well taken. The Secretary will call the name of Mr. Frank again.

Mr. ALVORD—I rise to a question of privilege. I move that Mr. Frank be excused from voting.

Mr. MILLER—I would suggest that it is understood that Mr. Frank has a scriptural excuse. [Laughter.]

The question was put on excusing Mr. Frank from voting, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The substitute offered by Mr. Comstock was declared adopted by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. N. M. Allen, Alvord, Andrews, Archer, Baker, Ballard, Beadle, Beckwith, Bergen, Bickford, E. Brooks, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, Comstock, Corbett, Daly, C. C. Dwight, Eddy, Farnum, Folger, Garvin, Goodrich, Hadley, Hitchcock, Houston, Kinney, Lapham, A. Lawrence, Livingston, Merwin, Monell, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, President, Reynolds, Robertson, Seaver, Spencer, Stratton, Van Campen, Wakeman, Wales, Williams—43.

Noes—Messrs. Axtell, Beals, Bell, Bowen, W. C. Brown, Case, Chesebro, Cooke, Corning, Duganne, Ferry, Field, Fowler, Fuller, Gould, Grant, Graves, Hammond, Hand, Hardenburgh, Hatch, Ketcham, Krum, Lee, Ludington, Magee, Mattice, McDonald, Merritt, Miller, Opdyke, Pond, Prindle, Rathbun, Rumsey Schell, Silvester, Smith, S. Townsend, Verplanck—40.

Mr. SILVESTER—I move to reconsider the vote which has just been taken.

The PRESIDENT—That motion will be received and laid on the table under the rule.

Mr. RUMSEY—I move that this Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Rumsey, and, on a division, it was declared lost by a vote of 40 to 48.

Mr. WALES—I move the previous question on the adoption of the article.

Mr. FOLGER—Does the gentleman mean on the section or on the article?

Mr. WALES—On the article.

Mr. FOLGER—I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion. There are other amendments yet to be offered.

Mr. WALES—I withdraw it.

Mr. FOLGER—I am requested by an absent delegate to offer the following amendment, as a separate section:

"That the courts of special sessions shall have such jurisdiction of offenses, of the grade of misdemeanor, as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I wish to offer an additional section. It is the section which was number 10 of the present Constitution. "The testimony in equity cases shall be taken in like manner as in cases at law." I deem it very important that this provision shall be retained in the Constitution. The Constitution of 1846 united the administration of law and equity in the same tribunal. It accomplished it, first, by abolishing the court of chancery and committing both to one court, and secondly, by this provision, that the testimony should be taken in equity cases in like manner as in cases at law—that is to say, that the witnesses should be examined before the tribunal that has to decide the case, instead of the testimony being taken before an examiner, as was the practice in the court of chancery. I do not know what objection there can be to this provision, and I trust there will be none made, because it is a very important provision.

Mr. DALY—There is no objection, I think, to inserting that provision in the Constitution. The reason that the committee omitted it was the fact that, under our law, the system has become so thoroughly established that it was not thought necessary to insert a provision for it here. Our statutes provide so effectually for this that the committee thought it unnecessary to provide for it in the Constitution.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—But those statutes may be repealed.

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I wish to ask the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] if we are to put into this Constitution every thing that the Legislature can possibly touch? Suppose they do repeal those statutes? They can re-enact them if it is best that they should be re-enacted. This idea of putting every thing into the Constitution is utterly erroneous. The power lies in the people and in their representatives in the Legislature, and all we can do is to restrain and regulate the exercise of that power.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. A. J. Parker, and, on a division, there were ayes 49, noes 26; no quorum voting.

Mr. RUMSEY—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Rumsey, and it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 20, 1867.

The Convention met at ten o'clock pursuant to adjournment, Mr. FOLGER, President pro tem., in the chair.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. Dr. SPRAGUE.

The Journal of yesterday was read by the SECRETARY and approved.

Mr. HAND—I present a memorial from over forty citizens of Owego, asking for the establishment of a board of medical examiners.

Which was laid on the table until the appointment of a select committee.

Mr. BELL—I ask that the resolution of Mr. Murphy, calling for a reconsideration of the vote by which the place for holding the future sessions of the Convention was fixed at Troy, be taken from the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—The Chair is of opinion that the motion would more properly come under the head of resolutions.

Mr. BELL—I will defer to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. KINNEY—I offer the following resolution:

The SECRETARY read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster of this Convention be directed to forward to the members any mail matter which may arrive during the recess.

The question was put on the resolution of Mr. Kinney, and it was declared adopted.

Mr. BELL—I now move to take from the table the resolution of Mr. Murphy, to reconsider the vote by which the place of our future meetings was fixed at Troy. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee which visited that place.

The SECRETARY read the report as requested.

Mr. E. BROOKS—In order that this Convention may not appear to vacillate like the waves of the sea, and undo to-day what it did yesterday, and to test its determination to be consistent in its action, I move that the motion to reconsider lie upon the table.

Mr. BELL—I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion for a moment. I simply want the Convention to understand the accommodations we will have at Troy. I called for the reading of the report that we could understand the size of the room.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I would rather not withdraw, under the circumstances.

Mr. BELL—I am sorry the gentleman will not withdraw and allow us a fair description of the room.

Mr. E. BROOKS—We have had a report from the committee which has given us the exact dimensions of the room at Troy and the dimensions of the room at the City Hall, and all the information we can possibly obtain. I move to lay the report upon the table.

Mr. BELL—Upon that motion I call for the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call the ayes and noes were ordered.

The question was put upon the motion of Mr. E. Brooks, and it was declared lost by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. Alvord, Andrews, Archer, Armstrong, Beckwith, Bowen, E. Brooks, W. C. Brown, Comstock, Cooke, Corbett, Curtis, C. C. Dwight, Eddy, Farnum, Ferry, Field, Flagler, Fowler, Francis, Goodrich, Hammond, Hitchcock, Ketcham, Landon, A. Lawrence, Ludington, Magee, McDonald, Merwin, Miller, More, Opdyke, Prindle, Prosser, Roy, Rumsey, L. W. Russell, M. I. Townsend, S. Townsend, Van Cott, Verplanck, Wales, Williams, Young—46.

Noes—Messrs. A. F. Allen, Axtell, Baker, Ballard, Barto, Beadle, Beals, Bell, Bergen, Bickford, E. P. Brooks, E. A. Brown, Case, Chesebro, Corning, Daly, Ely, Folger, Frank, Fuller, Garvin, Gould, Grant, Graves, Hadley, Hand, Hardenburgh, Harris, Hatch, Houston, Kinney, Lapham, M. H. Lawrence, Lee, Mattice, Merritt, Monell, A. J. Parker, C. E. Parker, Potter, Rathbun, Reynolds, Robertson, Schell, Seaver, Silvester, Smith, Spencer, Stratton, Van Campen, Wakeman, Weed—52.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. Bell to reconsider so much of the vote on the resolution of Mr. Murphy as fixed the place for the future meetings of the Convention at Troy.

Mr. BELL—I move this reconsideration because I think the action yesterday was hasty and inconsiderate; that we did not thoroughly consider the report of the committee; neither had we taken all the circumstances attending our removal into consideration. Several of the members of this Convention visited Troy yesterday afternoon; and, as far as I can learn, they were entirely disappointed in the accommodations offered by the municipal authorities of that city. For that reason, I called for the reading of the report. It will be observed that the report only gives the superficial feet of the floor of the room. It does not state that the room is up two or three flights of stairs; it does not state that it is very badly lighted, the windows being small, and only on one side, those in the opposite direction being shut up by a building that has since been built. It does not state that it is entirely defective in ventilation; it does not state that it is an entirely unsuitable room for a deliberative body. I say, from personal inspection, that it does not afford any thing like the comfort and accommodations that are afforded by the common council chamber in the City Hall of Albany. If it did not occupy the time of the Convention I would like to call for the reading of the report of the committee with regard to the common council chamber of this city. Taking all these things into consideration, it is wise that this body, notwithstanding the criticism of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], to reconsider any hasty or ill advised action. I take it that it is as fair for a body of gentlemen, as for an individual, to recede as soon as possible from any inconsiderate or wrong action. The sooner we retrace our steps in this respect the better it will be for us. I hope this resolution fixing the place of meeting at Troy will be reconsidered, and that the common council chamber in Albany will be fixed upon as the place for our future meetings. I hope this for various reasons. I will not consume our time by going over the whole field of this matter now. But I would have been very glad had every member of this Convention visited the rooms offered for our use by each city and decided for himself. I have heard it stated that certain gentlemen of this Convention were influenced in their votes on account of the contact that might take place between the members of the Legislature and the members of this Convention. I cannot see that this consideration has any weight whatever. I assume that every member of this Convention is capable of taking care of himself; and that he certainly will not be contaminated by contact with the members of the Legislature. I think I speak understandingly when I say that these bodies can properly, and without unduly influencing one another, assemble in this city and conduct their respective businesses. There is no reason for apprehending any undue influence of this kind. Neither do I apprehend that any gentleman in this Convention will lower the dignity of his position, or his self respect by becoming a lobbyist in the Legislature. I think this is an argument that has no force whatever. There are some very potent arguments in favor of remaining in this city in addition to the accommodations that are here afforded us, and the fact of this being the proper place for our sessions. We have found that it has been very difficult to secure and retain a quorum. I hope the vote of yesterday will be reconsidered. It will be observed that I have only called for the reconsideration of so much of the report as relates to the place of meeting, leaving the time of adjournment, and the time for re-assembling as it was agreed upon yesterday. I would simply change the resolution by substituting the city of Albany for the city of Troy.

Mr. MERRITT—I think it is due to my position as chairman of the committee which has made the report on this subject, and also to the statement I made to the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis] yesterday, to make a few remarks. I presumed the vote taken yesterday would be final. I said I would not oppose any further movement toward holding our future meetings in Troy. I wish to reiterate so much of what I said yesterday, to the effect that I visited the council chamber in company with the committee who visited New York. I stated to the committee that if the room at the City Hall was not sufficiently capacious, there was a room at the corner of Eagle and Hudson streets, nearly as convenient as the City Hall, with an area of one hundred and twenty by sixty feet, in the State arsenal building, well lighted, and in the second story of the building. It is a plain room, with ample gas fixtures and a first-rate system of ventilation. The room, I am authorized to say, will be at the disposal of the Convention. On the second floor of the building are several rooms fitted up as company rooms, which would be convenient for the post-office, for committee rooms and for the use of the stenographer and his assistants. The majority of the committee having decided that the common council chamber would answer every purpose, did not desire to visit any other rooms. Perhaps I ought to apologize to the gentleman from Rensselaer [Mr. Francis] for my statement yesterday, that I would not vote in favor of a reconsideration. After reflection, however, I shall feel compelled to vote for a reconsideration.

Mr. BEADLE—I believe this Convention labored yesterday under a misapprehension with regard to the report of the committee in relation to the city of Troy. I was glad to hear the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell] call for the reading of that report. I desire to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that no recommendation is contained in that report in favor of Troy or any other locality. Yesterday afternoon several members of the Convention stated that they were under the impression that the committee recommended Troy as a proper and suitable place for the holding of the future deliberations of this Convention. Being cut off yesterday morning by the moving of the previous question, I desire now to say, as a member of the committee, that I did not join in the support of the amendment of the gentleman from Niagara [Mr. Flagler]. In consultation with that committee it was agreed that the resolution should be offered, and that I should offer an amendment substituting Albany for Troy. I visited Troy with the committee the day before yesterday. When I saw the hall which it was proposed we should occupy, I felt assured, if this Convention went to that city, they would be entirely dissatisfied with their accommodations. The simple statement of the area of a room gives no adequate idea of its accommodations. The room in question in Troy is thirty-six by eighty feet, in dimensions; the height of ceiling at the highest point is twenty-three feet, with no possible means of ventilation. It was built, as I understand, with the intention of being occupied for evening lectures. It is lighted by gas, having three chandeliers pendent from the ceiling. The center room, I understand, has six burners. These are the accommodations for light, with the exception of four windows, not very large, upon one end. It would not be possible for gentlemen to read in the room as it is at present arranged. It will do very well for lectures, but it is entirely unsuited for the business of this Convention. The committee were met by a delegation from the authorities of the city of Troy, who received us very cordially: they showed us this room, and said it would be arranged in any manner desired by the Convention. That was a wholesale phrase; but I understood from one of the gentlemen who escorted us that it was rather expected we should occupy the seats already in the room. These seats were such as are usually seen in such places. I think they are not such as would give satisfaction to this Convention Not supposing it would be seriously contemplated that the Convention should occupy that hall, I visited no other public hall, as several of the committee did. In company with some twenty odd members of this Convention, I again visited Troy yesterday with a view to making arrangements for rooms and board. I went to what is said to be the best hotel in Troy, and asked the keeper of it what accommodations he could give, and how many members of the Convention he could accommodate. He replied that he thought he could accommodate twelve. Seeing I looked rather blank —"Well," said he, "possibly fifteen." [Laughter.] Said he, by way of explanation, "You will understand, gentlemen, I have my transient custom and travelers to attend to first." "Certainly," said I, "we come here second best." I did not go to any of the other hotels; but I understand their accommodations are not adequate for the comfort of one hundred and sixty or two hundred persons. They are not prepared for the accommodation of large bodies, such as usually assemble in this city, and for which this city is prepared. I desire, by these remarks, to put myself right before this Convention as a member of the committee.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I move the previous question.

The question was put upon the motion of Mr. Chesebro and it was declared lost.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Gentlemen of this Convention will bear me witness that I have neither in public nor in private, solicited this Convention, individually or collectively, to go to Troy. I have left the gentlemen of the Convention to form their own conclusions in their own way. They will also bear me witness that, neither in public nor in private have I said one word against the existing accommodations in Albany. I have nothing to find fault with; therefore I am not partisan upon this subject. Nor do I wish to say any thing with the design of inducing this Convention either to adhere to or change the vote of yesterday. As a citizen of Troy, I find some gentlemen, at least, forgetting the facts connected with the place to which this Convention was invited, therefore I wish to make this statement. The hall which it was proposed to furnish for the accomodation of this Convention has four good windows in front, adapted to the size of the room, which is thirty-six feet in breadth and twenty-three feet high. They give as much light as any architect would calculate to throw into such a room by four windows built for that purpose. These windows are at the west end of the room. Upon the south side of this room are two staircases from the second story; this room is on the third story. The staircase from the first story to the second is fifteen feet in width. There is a window opening into the room on the south side. At the east end of the room is an apartment sixty by seventy feet—the exact dimensions are stated in the report of the committee. In that room are three large windows now covered up, as they have been for a number of years. These open into the large room, which has, in addition, a skylight.

Mr. EDDY—I visited the room yesterday with the janitor, who stated to us that the windows were false; that a brick partition was on the other side of them, and that they could not be opened without taking down that partition.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—How that is I am unable to say; but the windows are covered with cloth; I did not understand that they were bricked up. If they are it is simply for temporary purposes. It was proposed by the committee of the common council that these three windows should be opened, so that the light and air would be admitted.

Mr. BELL—I made particular inquiry in regard to these windows, and was informed that they were bricked up.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Of whom did the gentleman inquire?

Mr. BELL—Of the persons there: I do not know who they were. But even if that wall could be taken down, we were informed the windows opened into another room, and not to the light of heaven.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—If my friend from Jefferson [Mr. Bell] had been as ready to receive favorable as he was yesterday to receive unfavorable information he would have noticed that I said that these windows opened into a room sixty by eighty feet, with a large skylight.

Mr. BELL—The only difficulty is that these windows do not open into a room: that they are bricked up, and this I am informed from the investigation of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I wish to say—

Mr. ANDREWS—Will the gentleman from Renesselaer [Mr. M. I. Townsend] allow me to state that Mayor Flagg informed me, yesterday, that the windows were temporarily bricked up and could be opened.

Mr. BELL—Mr. President—

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I hope my friend from Jefferson [Mr. Bell] will listen to me with patience, because I, for one, am entirely willing that he should vote in any direction upon this subject that his judgment shall dictate; but I wish to vindicate the action of the common council and the public authorities of the city of Troy, and to show that they did not ask this Convention to go up and sit where they would be deprived of all the light that certainly is necessary for the Convention to transact business. Whether these were bricked up or not, it was stated to the committee themselves, in the hall, that these windows would be opened so that there would be eight windows throwing their light into this room. I wish to state further that there never has been a thought on the part of the authorities of that city, at any moment, to confine the members of this Convention to the benches that are now in that hall, which are very good benches for sitting to hear a lecture, but are entirely unsuited for the Convention; that arrangements are already made for fitting that hall with the necessary desks, made according to the Trojan notion of meeting the wants of gentlemen who come to transact such business as we transact in this Convention; that arrangements are already in progress for putting desks in that hall, and, I presume, as good desks as the Convention could wish. Now I have put myself right I think, so far as the common council of Troy is concerned; that is, that we have offered a hall that can be abundantly lighted by the light of heaven; that we have offered a hall that is large enough to accommodate this Convention if they choose to honor us with their presence; that we have proposed to give them such accommodations as would be suitable for gentlemen engaged in the transaction of business, so far as the transaction of business is concerned. We are humble people up at Troy, living in an humble way; but I have no doubt if the members of this Convention go there, they can be furnished with as good accommodations as an humble people engaged in manufactures and industrial pursuits can supply. They are adequate for their own accommodations, and just such as we have will, undoubtedly, be furnished to the members of the Convention.

Mr. HAND—Those eight windows and sky-light, I understand, open into an adjoining room, and do not light the room in which it is proposed that the Convention shall sit.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—Four windows open to the light of heaven in front; one opens to the outer world on the south; and three windows on the east open into the room that is lighted by a sky-light, and that room is to be at the service of this Convention.

Mr. HAND—Will the light from the sky-light come in through the door?

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I think my friend from Broome [Mr. Hand] has about the same idea of Troy and Troy accommodations as several other gentleman have got, that the light that comes through the sky-light has got to go through the door before it can get into the next room. My simple appreciation is, that the light from heaven through the sky-light comes right down into the room, and as it comes down into the room, if there are windows there, and there are three windows leading into the room where it is proposed to have the Convention meet, that light will not be so fastidious as to go around through the door when it can come in through the windows. The light in Troy diffuses itself evenly in every direction. [Laughter.] Those windows are only temporary and used in connection with the association when they had a picture gallery in this adjoining room which is proposed to be put at the service of the Convention. In addition to that, I ought to state that, on the south side of this hall is another room—an adjacent room, sixty by seventy feet, lighted by this sky-light, put at the service of the Convention and proposed to be lighted and furnished with all the accommodations necessary; that there is another room offered to the Convention twenty feet square, on the south side, on the same story; that there are two large and well furnished rooms on the story below that were offered for the use of the Convention. So that there is the large room, the adjacent room sixty by seventy feet, lighted by this sky-light, and then there are two rooms upon the floor below, all offered for the use of this Convention, with the proposition to furnish as good desks as the taste of the people of our city supposes the Convention would desire for their use in the transaction of this business. I have said what I have to say in regard to the hall. If the Convention see fit to go there, our people will carry out, I have no doubt, this preparation for the accommodation of the Convention, in good faith and in a way to justify a respectable standing in the eyes of the people of the State, so far as their conduct toward public bodies is concerned.

Mr. ALVORD—I have no sort of question but what the mind of every member of this Convention now present is made up upon this question. I, for one, have no sort of feeling whether we meet in Troy or in Albany; only I desire to be consistent with my action here, and bring this matter to a vote. I think we have had discussion enough on it; it is not profitable; it will not change the mind of a single individual. I, therefore, move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. announced the question to be on the motion of Mr. Bell to reconsider.

Mr. BELL—I demand the ayes and noes.

A sufficient number seconding the call, the ayes and noes were ordered.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll on the motion of Mr. Bell to reconsider.

The name of Mr. Francis was called.

Mr. FRANCIS—I ask to be excused from voting for the reason that I supposed the question was settled by the vote of yesterday. It is generally understood in our city that it was settled by that vote, and some active measures have already been taken for carrying out the object of the resolution passed yesterday. And as the question involves, to some extent, as may be construed, self-interest, I cannot consistently, with my own views of justice, give a vote at all upon the question.

The question was put on excusing Mr. Francis, and it was declared carried.

The name of Mr. Ketcham was called.

Mr. KETCHUM—I desire to be excused from voting. I suppose the principal object of changing our position and our votes as often as we have during the session of of this Convention, undoing one day what we did the day before, is to satisfy our constituents. I suppose that is the principal object of this movement. I am satisfied that my constituents will not be troubled on that matter. I do not think I should be required to vote.

The question was put on excusing Mr. Ketcham, and it was declared carried.

The name of Mr. Krum was called.

Mr. KRUM—I voted yesterday to remove our sessions to Troy. I did so for the reason that, from what I could learn, I thought Troy would be a better place than this city. I went to Troy yesterday, after the adjournment, and examined the hall in which we are expected to meet—ex-examined it with reference to its conveniences. I became satisfied from that examination that Troy is utterly incapable of accommodating this Convention. If I should vote now, I should be compelled to vote no, and by so voting, I should be inconsistent upon the record. I desire to be excused.

The question was put on excusing Mr. Krum, and it was declared lost.

Mr. KRUM—I vote aye.

The name of Mr. Landon was called.

Mr. LANDON—I desire to be excused from voting. This Convention has, by the report of its committee, deliberately accepted the invitation of the authorities of Troy, and thanked them for their kindness and hospitality. It seems to me that to withdraw that acceptance now, would be a gross incivility; but, as other gentlemen by their votes seem to think the contrary, and as I do not wish to put myself on the record in favor of the proposition, I desire to be excused.

The question was put on excusing Mr. Landon, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 25 ayes, noes not counted.

Mr. LANDON—I vote no.

The name of Mr. McDonald was called.

Mr. McDONALD—I desire to be excused from voting. My reasons are these: As an individual, after I have made a contract with another party, and entered upon its fulfillment, I never question my duty to go ahead; and as I act as an individual, so I wish to act as a member of this body. I therefore wish to have nothing to do with this recantation of the contract.

Mr. FRANCIS—I demand the ayes and noes.

The PRESIDENT, pro tem.—A call for the ayes and noes, while the ayes and noes are pending, is not in order.

The question was put on excusing Mr. McDonald and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 44 to 42.

The name of Mr. M. I. Townsend was called.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I desire to be excused from voting for the reasons stated by my colleague Mr. Francis.

The question was put on excusing Mr. M. I. Townsend, and it was declared carried.

The SECRETARY concluded the call of the roll and the motion of Mr. Bell to consider was carried by the following vote:

Ayes—Messrs. N. M. Allen, Axtell, Baker, Ballard, Beadle, Beals, Bell, Bergen, Bickford, E. P. Brooks, Case, Cassidy, Chesebro, Colahan, Corning, Daly, Eddy, Ely, Ferry, Folger, Fowler, Frank, Fuller, Garvin, Graves, Hadley, Hand, Hardenburgh, Harris, Hatch, Houston, Kinney, Krum, Lapham, M. H. Lawrence, Mattice, Merritt, Monell, More, A. J. Parker, Pond, Potter, Rathbun, Reynolds, Robertson, Roy, L. W. Russell, Schell, Seaver, Smith, Spencer, Van Campen, Wakeman, Weed—55.

Noes—Messrs. Alvord, Andrews, Archer, Armstrong, Beckwith, Bowen, W. C. Brown, Comstock, Corbett, Curtiss, C. C. Dwight, Farnum, Field, Flagler, Goodrich, Gould, Hammond, Hiscock, Hitchcock, Landon, Ludington, Magee, Merwin, Miller, Opdyke, Prindle, Prosser, Rumsey, Silvester, Stratton, S. Townsend, Van Cott, Verplanck, Wales—34.

Mr. ALVORD—For the purpose of avoiding the possibility of having no place to meet in Albany, now that we have reconsidered this matter, I move to reconsider the vote by which we agreed to adjourn at twelve o'clock to-day, and upon that I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord, for the previous question, and it was declared carried.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Alvord to reconsider, and it was declared carried.

Mr. ALVORD—I move that the Convention do not adjourn until the place of meeting on the fourteenth of January shall be selected.

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—That is not strictly in order. The previous question cuts off all amendments. But by unanimous consent the amendment may be entertained.

Objection was made.

The question was put on the resolution to adjourn at twelve o'clock to-day, and it was declared lost.

Mr. BELL—I move a substitute for that resolution, that, when this Convention adjourns, it adjourn to meet at the council chamber in the City Hall at Albany, and on that I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Bell for the previous question, and, on a division, it was declared carried, by a vote of 53 to 29.

The question was then put on the substitute of Mr. Bell, and it was declared carried.

Mr. MERRITT—I move that this Convention do adjourn at twelve o'clock to-day to meet on the fourteenth day of January.

Mr. ALVORD—I ask the gentleman from St. Lawrence [Mr. Merritt] to give way for a moment.

Mr. MERRITT—I withdraw my motion.

Mr. ALVORD—I move that the committee originally appointed by the Chair for the purpose of selecting a place for the meeting of this Convention, in conjunction with the Secretary of the Convention, be a committee for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements in conjunction with the common council of the city of Albany for our accommodations when we shall again meet.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared carried.

Mr. WALES—I offer the following preamble and resolution and ask that they may be printed:

WHEREAS, The canals of the State of New York belong to the people of the State; and

WHEREAS, The construction of said canals, without including interest, cost about $65,000,000; and

WHEREAS, Said canals are supposed to be now worth, at the lowest estimate, $60,000,000, which, at six per cent interest, would produce an annual income to the State of $3,600,000; and

WHEREAS, The management of said canals is supposed to be a fruitful source of corruption; therefore

Resolved, That a proposition for the sale of the canals of the State be submitted to a vote of the electors of the State, subject to the following conditions, viz.:

Digitized by Google

1. That the Erie, Champlain and Oswego canals be kept up to their present capacity;

2. That the said canals be kept open during the entire season of canal navigation as public highways; and

3. That the rates of tolls on said canals shall never exceed the rates of tolls of the year 1867.

Which was laid on the table.

Mr. PROSSER—I offer the following resolution:

Resolved. That the Secretary is hereby authorized to take charge of the files and documents of members during the recess, and deliver them upon re-assembling, and also authorized to have printed any communication during the recess which may be handed him for the Convention by the canal board.

The question was put on the adoption of the resolution offered by Mr. Prosser, and it was declared carried.

Mr. LUDINGTON offered the following resolution, which he desired to be laid on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision be and they are hereby instructed to add to the fourth section of the article on the judiciary, at the end thereof, the following words and provision: "If at any time after the expiration of ten years from the adoption of this Constitution, the public necessity should require it, the Legislature may create a commission for the like purposes and with the like powers and duties of the Commission hereby established."

Which was laid on the table.

Mr. HAND moved that the Secretary be requested to make provision for the forwarding to the residence of members the Journal and Argus newspapers.

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—Provision has already been made.

Mr. BELL—I move that the thanks of this Convention be tendered to the mayor and common council of the city of Troy for their generous offer to accommodate the members of this Convention with suitable accommodations for their future session.

Mr. McDONALD—I hope we shall not add insult to injury in that way.

Mr. BICKFORD—Such a resolution was passed yesterday and remains unrescinded.

Mr. BELL—I will correct the gentleman. It was offered but not passed, and I appeal to the record.

Mr. KETCHAM—I move to amend by adding that the Committee on Contingent Expenses be directed to pay the authorities of the city of Troy for the trouble and expense they have incurred in the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—That amendment cannot be entertained under the present resolution, because the amendment is referable under the rule and the resolution is not.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move that it lie on the table. I do not think it worth while to insult the city of Troy by thanking them.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Comstock to lay the motion on the table, and it was declared lost.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Bell, and it was declared carried.

Mr. RATHBUN—I wish to give notice of a motion for reconsideration of the adoption, last evening, of the last section of the judiciary article—

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—That is not in order at this time.

Mr. AXTELL—I move that we do now adjourn.

Mr. GRAVES—Will the gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. AXTELL—I must decline to do so.

Mr. KRUM—To what day would an adjournment carry us?

The PRESIDENT pro tem.—To the 14th of January, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, at the place designated in the resolution which has been adopted.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. Axtell to adjourn, and it was declared carried by a vote of 40 to 26.

So the Convention adjourned until the 14th day of January, at ten o'clock A. M., to meet at the common council room in the City Hall in the city of Albany.

TUESDAY, January 14, 1868.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, in the City Hall, in the city of Albany.

Prayer was offered by Rev. A. A. FARR.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the Journal of proceedings of Friday, December 20th, 1867.

Mr. BELL—If my memory serves me, there is a slight error in the Journal. It is this; that after having moved to adjourn to this place, I then moved the previous question; it was the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] who moved the previous question on that resolution. I hope that the Journal may be amended accordingly.

No objection being made, the Journal was so amended; and, there being no further amendment suggested, the Journal was declared approved.

Mr. GOULD—I ask leave of absence for Mr. Mattice until Thursday morning, in consequence of the death of his father.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. GOULD—I also ask leave of absence for Mr. Bickford until the morning of the 21st, in consequence of serious illness in his family.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

The PRESIDENT announced the reception of the following communication:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE,
ALBANY, January 14, 1868.

On motion of Mr. FOLGER:

Resolved, That the use of the Senate library be, and the same is hereby, respectfully tendered to the Convention to revise and amend the Constitution. By order of the Senate.

JAMES TERWILLIGER, Clerk.

Mr. ALVORD—I move that the invitation on the part of the Senate be received, and that the Secretary be instructed to transmit the thanks of this Convention for the resolution.

The question was put upon the motion of Mr. Alvord, and it was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT also announced the reception of a communication from the canal board, in response to a resolution of the Convention, in regard to the capacity of the Erie canal.

Which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRIS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That one hundred and sixty slips of paper, numbered from one to one hundred and sixty inclusive, be placed in a hat, and that an alphabetical list of the delegates of this Convention be numbered from the first to the last by the Secretary; that the delegates then retire from this chamber, and that some person, not a delegate, be appointed by the President to draw the slips from the hat. As each is drawn, the Secretary shall read the number and call the name of the delegate opposite the number, who shall then choose a seat from among those not taken, and shall retain it until after the drawing or forfeit it. The Secretary shall keep a list of seats not taken, and absent members shall choose therefrom, should they arrive during the present week; but after that time seats shall be assigned them by lot immediately after reading the Journal at the next meeting after the present week; that a recess of five minutes be taken to enable the Secretary to prepare a list of slips.

Mr. MERRITT—I suppose that it is hardly proper that we should draw for seats at this time, as there are many absent who may not have expected this action this morning; and it would be well, I think, to postpone action on this subject until this evening. I am not particular as to the manner of selecting seats. It is well known that there are quite a number of delegates who have not attended the sessions of the Convention since the regular adjournment in the fall, and it is hardly just to delegates who are present, and I may say to those who have absented themselves, that they should have the same opportunity of choosing their seats by proxy that we have who are and have been present. There will be no seats in this hall that will not be reasonably commodious. I should be in favor of amending the proposition of the gentleman, so that a list of those who are present should be made out, and allow them to draw seats; and that only such absentees as have been excused by the Convention, or who are necessarily absent on account of sickness, should be allowed to have seats drawn for them. I move to lay the resolution on the table until this evening.

SEVERAL DELEGATES—No! No!

Mr. MERRITT—Then I withdraw the motion, and move to amend by including in the list of delegates who are permitted to draw seats, the delegates present and those absent who have been excused by the Convention.

Mr. CURTIS—It seems to me that the result could be reached in this way: Let the names be called, and those members who are not present lose the privilege of selection unless they have been excused, or are ill, in which case seats can be drawn for them.

Mr. POND—I do not recollect precisely the terms of the resolution that has been offered; but if it means to deprive all those who are not present at this drawing of having their seats drawn for them, I am opposed to it. There are gentlemen who have been in attendance upon the sessions of this Convention, who may necessarily be absent to-day, and who have not been excused. For instance, there is Judge Landon, of Schenectady, who is to-day engaged in holding a term of his court, and who requested me the other day, if present at the drawing of seats, if permitted, to select a seat for him. There may be others who may have requested that seats be drawn for them who are not present to-day, and I submit that it would not be just to have those whose engagements may not allow them to be present to-day to draw seats, to exclude them from having seats drawn for them. I hope the resolution will be so amended as to include those who are absent and requested seats to be drawn for them.

Mr. MORRIS—This resolution was drawn in such a manner as to give members who are now present the advantage over those who are absent. It will be observed that it provides that, as the names are called of members not here, they will be passed over until after the present occasion. It is very difficult to draw a distinction, and it seems to me the simplest and most appropriate plan is, at once to proceed to the drawing of seats, and give those members who are present the advantage of being here. It was natural to expect that, when we would assemble on this occasion, among the first of our official acts would be to select our seats. The method suggested by the resolution is one of the simplest that we have yet met with, and probably would occupy less time than any I am acquainted with.

Mr. POND—I move to further amend the amendment by including among those who are permitted to have seats drawn, those who have requested some member to draw for them.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I should like to ask the gentleman from Saratoga [Mr. Pond] whether or not the resolution as proposed to be amended, would cover the case of my respected friend and colleague, Judge Strong, of Suffolk, who asked that I should draw a seat for him, and also the case that was mentioned this morning of the gentleman from Greene [Mr. Mattice], who had gone to attend the funeral of his father, and of the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bickford], who asked leave of absence on account of illness in his family? I think that no gentleman would be willing to put the members I have referred to under a disadvantage.

Mr. MERRITT—Assuming that those in whose behalf these several requests have been made, intend to be present at the future sessions of the Convention, I will accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Saratoga [Mr. Pond] with this reservation: that the excuses to be presented in such cases where applications have been made shall be presented before the drawing of the names.

Mr. POND—I assent to that.

Mr. HALE—I would inquire whether the original resolution would not accomplish all that is required? The resolution of the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris] provides that the roll of members shall be called. Of course, members who are not present cannot answer to their names. If a delegate is desirous to offer a special resolution to meet special cases where persons have made requests of members present to draw for them, he may be allowed to do so. It seems to me that under the original resolution only those in fact can draw who are present, or who have representatives present to act for them.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I am opposed to the amendment in any form that it is presented, and am in favor of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris]. It is perfectly obvious that there is a great difference in the convenience of the several seats in this hall, and I know of no better way to make the selection than to allow gentlemen who are here to take their places. The suggestions made by the gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] strikes me with great force as applicable to our venerable and most respected friend from Suffolk [Judge Strong], and I think it illustrates this business of selecting seats for gentlemen who are not here better than any thing that I could say. Judge Strong did not attend the sittings of this Convention a single day during the last session of the Convention.

Mr VAN COTT—Judge Strong was excused from attending on account of sickness.

Mr. ALVORD—I made the motion myself to excuse Judge Strong indefinitely.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I am obliged to the gentlemen for their suggestions, but they are entirely foreign to the use which I designed to make of the fact. Here was a most respectable gentleman excused from attending upon the Convention, and yet, under the proposition of the gentleman from St. Lawrence, it might happen that a most desirable seat in this hall would stand empty, as having been taken for Judge Strong. If that token of respect be extended to Judge Strong, a simliar token ought to be extended to Judge Landon because he is not here, and the same token of respect ought to be extended to every other gentleman who, either by his necessities or his misfortunes, has not been present in the Convention. It seems to me that gentlemen who are present ought to have the right—aye, I think it is their duty—to have the choice of seats in this Convention for the purpose of discharging their duties. I assent with entire satisfaction to whatever seat may fall to me, but I think it is altogether unnecessary, this straining of courtesy, to give the choice of seats in the Convention to gentlemen who are not here, and who are not likely to be here. I have three colleagues from my district whom I do not meet here to-day; but I have no doubt that one of them is necessarily detained in the transaction of his law business. I have no doubt that another is necessarily detained in attending to his business as a merchant, and I have no doubt that the third is necessarily detained in the management of the very respectable public journal of which he is the editor, and I shall claim it as a duty to my colleagues if the resolution of the gentleman from Putnam [Mr. Morris], is not adopted, will be to select seats for them because they are necessarily detained from the Convention in pursuit of their profitable employment.

Mr. VAN COTT called for the reading of the resolution.

The SECRETARY proceeded to read the resolution as amended.

Mr. CURTIS—I move to amend by substituting the following:

The SECRETARY read the substitute, as follows:

Resolved, That the names of the members be put in a box and drawn therefrom, and members present be allowed to select their seats as their names are drawn, and that members excused and those who have specially requested members present to draw seats for them be allowed to have their seats thus drawn.

Mr. CURTIS—As I understand the present proposition of the gentleman, an absent member who comes in during the week can then select one of the best seats in the hall; that, it seems to me is unfair.

Mr. HATCH—It appears to me that the resolution should be so amended, that if any member should state in his place that an absent member was detained by sickness, somebody should have the right to draw a seat for him. I believe that sickness is always recognized as a sufficient excuse for the omission to discharge a public duty. I have been present myself, in the drawing of seats by a number of public bodies, and in every case when a member of the body has risen in his place and stated that a certain member was absent on account of sickness, that public body has allowed some gentleman to draw a seat for the absentee.

Mr. MERRITT—As the substitute embodies substantially the matter proposed by myself I hope it will be adopted. It is very proper that it should be limited to the extent proposed in the substitute unless there is some evidence that they—

Mr. POND—I do not see any objection to the substitute except in this, that there is an ambiguity in it, which I hope will be cleared up. It speaks of members excused. Whether that means members excused last summer or whether there shall be an opportunity for present excuses I do not know. If the substitute embraces that, to wit, that excuses may be asked, and that there may be time to present excuses for the absence of members who are not now attending the Convention, very well; but the excuses that have been already granted have expired. This is the first meeting of this Convention after a long adjournment and there has been no opportunity to give excuses. If I may be permitted to ask for an excuse for Judge Landon, who is now detained holding court for three days until he gets through—

Mr. GOULD—Why do you not?

Mr. POND—I will ask an excuse for him if it is in order pending the motion.

Mr. GOULD—Ask unanimous consent.

Mr. POND—I move that the roll of the members be now called.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will direct that.

Mr. ALVORD—I trust that nothing will be done except to permit those who are present to draw seats, except in the instances where persons have been actually excused in consequence of illness. Three of my associates from Onondaga are absent from here attending to their duties as lawyers upon a special term of the supreme court which is at present being held in that county. I would have a perfect right under these suggestions to ask that I may be permitted to draw their seats for them, just as much as Judge Landon would have the right to have a seat drawn for him because he happens to be absent in the discharge of his duty as a judge. I trust that we will narrow this matter down to a permission to those present to draw seats and those who have been excused absolutely in consequence of inability to attend upon the Convention. But I do not believe that any excuse growing out of a business position should be a sufficient excuse to entitle a person to the privilege of having a seat drawn for him.

Mr. FOLGER—I move the previous question.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

The question was then put on the substitute offered by Mr. Curtis to the resolution offered by Mr. Morris, and, on a division, it was declared carried by a vote of 42 ayes, the noes not being counted.

The SECRETARY proceeded with the calling of the roll of delegates.

The name of Mr. A. F. Allen was called.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—Before the roll is called I would like to inquire whether it is necessary to have an excuse for a member before his seat can be drawn for him, if he has already requested a person to draw a seat for him?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understands the resolution to relate to excuses hitherto made.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—Can an absent member who has made a special request of one present to draw for him avail himself of that privilege without having been first excused.

The PRESIDENT — The resolution provides for two classes of cases, one where the member's absence has been excused and where he has specially requested a member to draw for him.

Mr. GOULD—Is it necessary to give notice beforehand in the case of gentlemen who have requested that seats be drawn for them?

The PRESIDENT — The Chair understands that when names are called the fact can be stated.

Mr. COMSTOCK—Is the substitute open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT—It is not, it having been adopted by the Convention.

Mr. CHESEBRO—Do I understand that, on the present call of the roll, we are to state, when the names are called, those cases where we have been requested to draw seats?

Mr. HARDENBURGH—I was requested by Mr. Cooke to draw a seat for him, he being absent attending upon the funeral of Judge Wright, and I move that he be excused if that motion meets the case.

No objection being made, Mr. Cooke was excused.

Mr. ALVORD—I ask leave of absence for my colleagues, Messrs. Andrews, Hiscock and Corbett, in consequence of their inability to attend, they being now in attendance upon the special term of the supreme court. They will be here to-morrow.

Objection being made, the question was put on granting the leave of absence requested by Mr. Alvord, and it was declared lost.

Mr. REYNOLDS—I desire to ask leave of absence for my colleague, Judge Fuller, who is attending upon his court, he being in the same category with Judge Landon, and unable, therefore, to be here to-day; and I also ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. Ely, who will be here to-night. I have been requested to draw seats for both gentlemen when the drawing takes place.

The PRESIDENT—Then the gentleman's [Mr. Reynolds'] colleagues are already provided for by the resolution.

Mr. BELL—I ask leave of absence for Mr. Merwin, who is necessarily detained attending court.

Objection being made, the question was put on excusing Mr. Merwin, and it was declared lost.

Mr. EVARTS—I would like to inquire of the Chair, what object is to be subserved by calling the roll? As I understand it, under the present resolution absent gentlemen are entitled to have their names drawn for choice of seats in case they are represented here by proxies and have made such request.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair would inform the gentleman that the Secretary is calling the roll of delegates with a view of perfecting his list.

Mr. HALE—I would ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. Beckwith, of Clinton.

Mr. GOULD—Leave of absence has been already granted to Mr. Beckwith.

Mr. BEADLE—I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. E. P. Brooks, of Chemung, who is detained, although he has striven very hard to attend. I would call the attention of the Convention to the fact that very few members of the Convention have been more punctual in their attendance than that gentleman. He has almost constantly sacrificed business matters at home to be present at the sessions.

Objection being made, the question was put on excusing Mr. E. P. Brooks, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HALE—I would ask whether or not, in case a person is absent on leave who has not specially requested a delegate to draw a seat for him, can have a seat drawn. I am informed by the gentleman from Columbia [Mr. Gould] that he was mistaken in reference to my colleague Mr. Beckwith, in stating that he was absent with leave; I therefore ask for leave of absence for Mr. Beckwith, who lives in a remote part of the State, and can only come here by going through the State of Vermont, having a long route to travel.

Objection being made, the question was put on the motion of Mr. Hale, and it was declared lost.

Mr. A. F. ALLEN—I ask leave of absence for my two colleagues, Mr. N. M. Allen and Mr. Van Campen, for two days.

Objection being made, the question was put on the motion of Mr. A. F. Allen, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HATCH—I desire to inquire whether my colleague, Judge Masten, is among the list of the excused; I understand he is.

Digitized by Google

Mr. GOULD—Judge Masten was excused on my motion; he has indefinite leave of absence.

Mr. HATCH—I understood he was excused on account of sickness.

Mr. CURTIS—I move that no further leaves of absence be granted, except in case of sickness or personal inability to attend in the Convention; the motion only applying to this morning's session, and upon that I move the previous question.

The PRESIDENT—The Secretary will note the motion.

Mr. ALVORD—I would ask the gentleman what is meant by "personal inability?"

Mr. CURTIS—Actual incapacity to be here—for instance, the cars may have run off the track.

The SECRETARY again read the substitute of Mr. Curtis.

Mr. MURPHY—I rise to a question of order. We have determined to go into the selection of seats; any further resolution is out of order until that business has been disposed of.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I rise to a point of order: I would like to know how a resolution of this kind can tie up the votes and intentions of members for the rest of the day, unless it be by a rule of order of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will decide the point of order first taken by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Murphy]. The Chair thinks that it is in the province of the Convention to limit the excuses if it shall see fit to do so.

Mr. MURPHY—I would ask whether the resolution can be entertained until the order of business determined by the Convention, viz., that of drawing seats, has been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair rules that the resolution of the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. Curtis] is in order, being connected with the pending order of business. The resolution provides for the limiting of excuses, to prevent the recurrence of renewed applications for leaves of absence.

Mr. MURPHY—Will the Chair permit me to make a suggestion, that the language of the resolution is "already excused," and not persons hereafter to be excused?

The PRESIDENT—The Chair was inclined to put that interpretation upon it, but it understands the Convention to differ with the Chair.

The question was put on the substitute of Mr. Curtis, and it was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT—The Secretary informs the Chair that fifteen minutes will be required to prepare the list of names of members for the drawing.

Mr. M. I. TOWNSEND—I understand the Chair to state that the roll was being called to enable the Secretary to determine who were entitled to draw for seats.

The PRESIDENT—The substitute adopted does not require delegates to withdraw from the Chamber, those who are absent, and who have specially delegated members to draw seats for them, can have seats chosen. If there be no objection the Convention will take a recess of fifteen minutes.

The fifteen minutes having expired, the PRESIDENT again called the Convention to order when the drawing of seats was proceeded with, at the conclusion of which, the hour of two having arrived, the PRESIDENT announced that the Convention would take a recess until seven o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at seven P. M.

Mr. BELL offered the following resolution:

WHEREAS, Several officers and employees of this Convention have accepted positions under the Legislature now in session in this city; and

WHEREAS, By the construction and arrangement of this hall, a less number of officers and door-keepers is required than was authorized by law; therefore,

Resolved, That vacancies thus created remain unfilled, unless in the judgment of the President, the business of the Convention, and the convenience of the members require new appointments, and then, only to the extent actually required.

The question was put on the adoption of the resolution, and it was declared carried.

Mr. MERRITT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the privileges of the floor be extended to the Senators and members of the Assembly of this State, and also to the members of the common council of the city of Albany.

The question was put on the adoption of the resolution, and it was declared carried.

Mr. ARCHER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That, Frank M. Jones be appointed assistant Sergeant-at-Arms, of this Convention in place of John H. Kemper.

Mr. MERRITT—I understand that Mr. Kemper has been elected Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and therefore, this resolution is in conflict with the one just adopted.

Mr. BELL—I hope that this resolution will be withdrawn until the President can have an opportunity to look into this matter and see whether so many officers as we had before are required and also to see whether some of those already appointed as door-keepers cannot be assigned to do the duties of the assistant sergeant-at-arms.

Mr. ARCHER—At the suggestion of the gentleman from Jefferson [Mr. Bell] I withdraw the resolution.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, as amended in and reported from the Committee on the Whole, and as further amended in Convention.

The PRESIDENT declared the pending question to be upon the section offered by Mr. A. J. Parker, in the following words: "Sec. 35. The testimony in equity cases shall be taken in like manner as in cases at law."

The amendment was put on the motion of Mr. A. J. Parker, which was declared adopted.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—I move to add to section 8 the following words: "The chief justices of the several departments shall meet at such times and places as may be designated by law, for the purpose of reviewing, in such manner as the law may provide, any decision arising under the Code of Procedure made by any of the departments of the general terms of the supreme court or the superior court of the city of New York, or the court of common pleas in the city of New York, or the superior court of the city of Buffalo, which shall conflict with the decision of any other of the said courts." It will be perceived that the object of this amendment is to secure uniformity of decisions upon questions arising under the Code which regulates the practice in our courts. I will not take up the time of the Convention in arguing the necessity of attaining such a result, for it seems to have been admitted by every gentleman who has spoken on the subject. It is clear, however, that the doubt and uncertainty in which our present system is involved must continue, unless we adopt some such amendment as the one I propose. The court of appeals is the only tribunal now capable of settling a question which has been decided differently by two courts of independent jurisdiction, and many of the questions arising under the Code of Procedure can never reach that court. I will only cite a few: It was held, for instance, in the case of Genin v. Tompkins (1 Code Rep. [N. S]. p. 415), and in Vandewater v. Kelsey (2 Code Rep., p. 3) that no appeal would lie from an order granting or refusing a provisional remedy, nor from an order vacating or refusing to vacate such provisional remedy. Hence the superior court of the city of New York having decided that an attachment may be issued against the property of a defendant residing in New Jersey, but who is engaged in business in the city of New York, and the supreme court in the first district having come to a contrary conclution, the conflict between the decisions of those two courts on that subject must last until one of them changes its views, and the result is that a different practice relating to attachments must prevail in each court. The same may be said as to the writ of ne exeat, which has been held to be abolished by the superior court of New York, and to be still in existence by the supreme court. In the case of Briggs et al. v. Bergen (23 N. Y., 162), the court of appeals say that there is no mode in which the question arising upon an answer alleged to be sham or irrelevant can be brought to that court. In Catlin v. Billings (16 N. Y., p. 622), it was held that if there was any irregularity in assessing damages against a defendant without an affidavit that he had made default in answering, it was a question of practice which was not reviewable in the court of appeals. So it was also held that no appeal to the court of appeals would lie from an order refusing to set aside an execution issued without leave after five years, nor from an order striking out the costs from a judgment. If, therefore, a conflict of decisions takes place on any of those questions which cannot be presented to the court of appeals, there is no remedy whatever for the evil, and the amendment which I propose will provide one. Again, there are a variety of questions relating to pleadings which never are presented to the court of appeals for the very good reason that, as no appeal can be taken except from the final judgment in the action, it is in many cases deemed advisable to conform to the decision of the court below, although believed to be erroneous, rather than suffer judgment to be entered for the sake of having the question reviewed; of such a nature, for instance, are questions arising on an order for judgment on demurrer, or on a frivolous answer, in which cases no appeal will lie to the court of appeals from the order where no judgment has been entered. (2 Code Rep., p. 70; 27 N. Y., p 640.) So it is with questions arising on interlocutory orders; as no appeal can be taken from such an order, directly, unless it prevents the rendering of a judgment, the suitor, in many instances, must take his choice between conforming to the decision of the court below or persisting until the judgment in what may prove after all to be an erroneous course. Remedies in courts of equal jurisdiction, should be administered with an even hand; it is therefore important that a conflict of decisions on a question arising under the Code of Procedure should be settled promptly, and without the delay necessarily attending the present mode of review. No stronger argument can be urged in favor of a change in that respect than the bare statement of the fact that many important points of practice remain yet unsettled, although our present system has been in existence nearly twenty years. The amendment which I propose adapts itself to the report of the committee; it does not in any way interfere with it, it merely clothes the chief judges of the several departments with very limited powers of review, confined to questions arising under the Code, as to which there may be a conflict of opinion between the several general terms of the supreme court and the other courts established by the Constitution; and, in my judgment, it is a necessary amendment to insure that uniform course of proceeding in all like cases which we have never yet had since the adoption of the Code.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I propose an amendment to that. I am not certain, Mr. President, but that something of the kind might very well be adopted by this Convention. It proposes an intermediate court of review between the general terms of the supreme court and the court of appeals. That intermediate court, if it be thought wise to create it all, should be confined, I think, in its functions and jurisdiction, to that class of questions which cannot go by appeal from the general terms of the supreme court to the court of appeals. The proposition as it now reads, is too broad. The questions which may be carried from the general terms to this intermediate and new court of review, are questions of any kind or nature which may arise under the Code of Procedure Now, there are very many fundamental questions involving rights under the Code of Procedure which may go by appeal directly to the court of appeals and be there settled; but as to that class of questions, I am quite sure that we do not need this intermediate court of review. I propose, therefore, to amend this proposition so that it will be limited to questions of mere practice, which are not appealable to the court of appeals.

Mr. FERRY—I have a single remark to make which will not interfere with this amendment. This proposition is further objectionable because I can see no reason why it should be confined to the courts specified by the resolution, inasmuch as we have given original jurisdiction to some extent to the county courts. If it is to be applied to any, it should be applied to all.

Mr. LIVINGSTON—The reason for that limitation is, that there is an appeal, as I understand, from the county courts to the supreme court.

Mr. HALE—The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston] has, it seems to me, some merits which ought to be considered by this Convention. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] limits the application of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston], and with great deference to the gentleman's opinion [Mr. Comstock], it strikes me that his amendment limits it too much and that if such a tribunal is to be constituted it would be better that it should have jurisdiction in some cases that are appealable to the court of appeals. I have heretofore in this Convention endeavored to advocate some plan by which the diversity of decisions in the supreme court might be remedied. It is admitted that this diversity does exist to a great extent, and that it is an evil; and I favor any proposition which will tend in any way to put an end to that evil. Now I think the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston] will do it. As I understand this proposition—I may not understand it correctly—he does not propose that there should be an appeal directly from the general term to this State general term, if I may so call it, which consists of the four chief justices; but this general term, consisting of these chief justices, is to have such appellate jurisdiction as the law shall give to it. It would be left to the Legislature to determine in what manner that jurisdiction should be exercised. I do not understand that a distinct and separate appeal to that general term would be necessary, but that in case of an appeal from the special term to the general term coming within the cases mentioned in the amendment of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston], the Legislature, under this provision, could direct that it should be heard in the first instance at this State general term, consisting of four chief justices. Now, as to the details of a plan of this kind, although I have my own views about them, I do not think discussion is now necessary; perhaps the method suggested by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston] would be as good as any that could be proposed. It would establish one tribunal in the supreme court which could regulate these conflicting decisions and matters of practice and the decisions of which, unless they were reversed by the court of appeals, would be the law, not of one department or one district merely, but of the whole State. In his remarks, the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston] has mentioned several matters in which there are conflicts of decision, and they are familiar to every lawyer. We all know, for instance, that in the superior court of the city of New York, it has been for years held by the general term that the writ of ne exeat was abolished, that it no longer existed. The general term of the supreme court in the first district, on the other hand, has held that that writ was not abolished, and that a party in a case which would have entitled him to it before the adoption of the Code, was still entitled to it. The result of this difference has been that a party bringing a suit in the supreme court finds that he has a remedy against the defendant which a party residing in the same city, but bringing his suit in the superior court, has not; and, as has been said by the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston], thus far there has been no way found of reconciling these conflicting decisions. The same may be said in regard to a great many other questions, not only questions of practice, but questions of legal right. On a former occasion I called the attention of the Convention to several decisions of that kind—in regard to the measure of damages in certain cases, and in regard to tenancy by curtesy—and a great many question of that kind will present themselves to the minds of lawyers who have investigated the subject, in regard to which the law of the State is, for all practical purposes, one way in one district and in the adjoining district directly the reverse. I have not examined particularly the phraseology of the proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston], but I cannot see why something of this kind is not practicable and desirable. I cannot see why we ought not to have it; and I will favor any proposition which will enable the Legislature (because of course we cannot settle the details here) to provide for a uniform system of practice, and so far as may be, a uniform law throughout the State of New York. The gentleman from Otsego [Mr. Ferry] asks why not apply this provision to the county courts as well as to the superior court and the court of common pleas. The answer is obvious. There is no general term of the county court, and a decision of the county court is appealed directly to the general term of the supreme court; and if that general term in one district decides adversely to the general term in another district upon that appeal, then the State general term, which is suggested in this proposition of the gentleman from Kings [Mr. Livingston], would come in and settle the matter. I would remark, too, that this proposition of the gentleman from Kings differs in many respects from similar propositions which have been made before, and voted down—not in its design, but in its form and detail; and therefore this Convention has not committed itself in opposition to the plan as now presented.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. Livingston as amended, which was declared carried.

Mr. HADLEY—I move to amend by striking out of section 16, line 14, the words "the supreme," and inserting after the word "justice" the words "or judge," and after the word "of" the word "any," so that it shall read, "but no person shall hold the office of justice or judge of any court longer than until the first day of January next after he shall have arrived at the age of seventy years." The object of the amendment is to have the same provision apply to the superior court, the court of common pleas of the city of New York, the city court of Brooklyn, the superior court of Buffalo, to the county courts—in short, to all judicial officers, so that no judge in the State shall hold the office of justice or judge longer than until the first day of January next after he shall have arrived at the age of seventy years. This section, as it now stands, confines the provision to justices of the supreme court, and this amendment is intended to extend the application of it to the courts I have mentioned. In the preceding section there is a provision to the same effect in regard to the court of appeals, but there is no provision of that kind applying to the superior court of Buffalo, the superior court of New York, the city court of Brooklyn, or other county courts and the various surrogates' courts, and my object is to make the provision general.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Hadley, and it was declared carried.

Mr. HADLEY—That amendment having been adopted, I now move to strike out from section 2, article 6, these words (they being rendered unnecessary by the adoption of the other amendment): "No chief judge or associate judge of said court shall remain in office longer than until the first day of January next after he shall have arrived at the age of seventy years." As the section now stands, that provision is applicable only to the court of appeals, but the amendment just adopted supersedes that and makes the provision applicable to the supreme court as well as to all the other courts.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Hadley, and it was declared carried.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I move to amend by striking from the eighteenth section, line six, the words, "where the parties reside in the county," and insert instead thereof "where the defendant in the action shall reside in the county." The Convention has adopted the amendment proposed by me, and ingrafted upon the Constitution the section conferring upon the county courts of the State original jurisdiction to the extent of one thousand dollars. In drafting the amendment this language was used which I move to strike out: "where the parties reside in the county." That, I say, seems to be a mistake, and I therefore move to amend, as I have stated, by substituting the words "where the defendant in the action shall reside in the county." The object is this: it is entirely proper that a non-resident of the county may be allowed to bring an action in the county court against a party residing in the county, but of course it would not do for a party residing in the county to be authorized to bring an action there against a person residing out of the county. It should be strictly confined, as it was in the old court of common pleas, to cases in which the defendant resides in the county. I think the amendment will strike the Convention as being eminently proper. In fact, I may say it was by an error of mine in drawing the original section that this provision was left in the way it now stands.

The question was put on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Chesebro, and it was declared carried.

Mr. HARRIS—I propose to amend section 16, line nine, by inserting after the words "fourteen years" the following: "from the first day of January next after such election," otherwise the term of the court of appeals which is to be elected in the spring of 1869 will expire on the first Monday of July—an inconvenient time.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Harris, and it was declared carried.

Mr. HITCHCOCK—I move to strike out, in line twenty-one of the eighteenth section, the word "sixty," and to insert in its place the word "forty" so as to restore the provision of the present Constitution.

Mr. FOLGER—I hope that amendment will not be adopted. All our effort in relation to the office of judge of the county court has been to make it an office of greater use, and to add to it such additional duties and such additional emoluments as will secure for it an efficient incumbent. Now one great reason why the office is not such at present, is that the duties of county judge and surrogate are divided in the smaller counties where the paucity of population does not demand that those offices should be divided. With this view, at a prior session of this Convention, I moved that the word "forty" should be stricken out from this section and the word "sixty" inserted. I made that motion for the reason that I did not believe, and the Convention seemed to adopt that idea, that in a county with a population of about 60,000 it was necessary that there should be two offices, one for the duties of surrogate and the other for the duties of county judge. I believed that prudence and good sense demanded that, in a county with that population, or less, these two offices should be joined in one, thereby giving to the incumbent more duties to perform, consequently securing to the office more emolument and more respectability. Now, I hope this Convention will not go back after having put sixty in the place of forty and change the number back to forty, which would bring us to the same position we are in already, under the present Constitution. The county of Ontario, which I in part represent, shows practically, the detriment which results from the division of this office in counties of small population. The office of county judge in that county during the first term under the Constitution of 1846 was held by a person who performed the duties of both county judge and surrogate; a person eminently fit for the position, and who performed the duties of both offices well, and received an amount of emolument sufficient, in a measure, to attract to the office such a person; but after his retirement from the office the board of supervisors, under the authority given by the Constitution of 1846, separated the offices, and from that time until this neither office has increased in public esteem. I propose that these offices should be united in one man, the county judge, who by reason of his increase of duties would be in a position to demand from the board of supervisors an increase of emolument—for I hold that increase of emolument always brings to the office better men to fill it and secures for it a greater degree of respect from the public, especially where higher emolument is the result of higher and more extended grade of duty. I hope, therefore, that this amendment which would carry us back to the basis of 40,000 inhabitants in a county, will not be adopted.

Mr. HITCHCOCK—A great change has taken place in the duties of the county judge since that provision was inserted. At the time that provision was inserted no original jurisdiction had been given to the county courts. The duties of a county judge were, therefore, very much less under the provisions of the Constitution of 1846 than they will be under this Constitution. So far as the gentleman has cited his own county, I can say nothing about it; but in relation to my county, I can say that we desire to have both offices, although our population does not by any means reach sixty thousand. Both offices are necessary to our interests.

Mr. GOULD—I have very little personal knowledge with regard to the working of this plan; but since the insertion of the number "sixty thousand" by the Convention, many persons of my own county, who have a knowledge of the subject, tell me that one officer would be quite inadequate to discharge the duties of county judge and surrogate, that the surrogate is continually employed, and that if he had the duties of county judge added, it would be physically impossible for him to perform them. There are many persons in my county who have spoken to me on the subject, and I think it would suit that county, at all events, better to have two officers rather than to have one individual perform the duties of both offices; and from what I hear there are many other counties which would be seriously inconvenienced if this change were made.

Mr. WAKEMAN—There is a large number of counties in this State which would not be affected by the amendment. The county of Genesee, for instance, has a population of about thirty-three thousand only, and I am entirely satisfied that if the population of that county were to increase to fifty thousand, the duties of these two offices could not be performed by any one man. The county judge of that small county is engaged all the time in holding courts and in surrogate business under the present arrangement, and now in this Constitution we have increased the jurisdiction of the county courts. I trust that hereafter the county court will be what may be called a home court, to which parties will largely resort; and it seems to me that if we increase the number of population required in this section to sixty thousand, no one man can perform the duties of these two officers. It may be that in small counties like Genesee a single officer can perform these double duties, but I am satisfied that in counties of sixty thousand population or thereabouts, no one man can do it.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Hitchcock, and it was declared lost.

Mr. HALE—I move to strike out the word "cases" in the sixth line of section 18, and to insert instead thereof the words "actions for the recovery of money only," so that it will read, "shall have original jurisdiction in actions for the recovery of money only, where the parties reside in the county, where the damages claimed shall not exceed one thousand dollars." The object of my amendment is to meet what I suppose to be the design of the Convention in adopting this provision that is, to limit the jurisdiction of the county courts to actions in which the amount involved does not exceed one thousand dollars. We know there are a great many suits in which the amount of property actually involved is vastly more than one thousand dollars, but in which the amount of damages claimed may be less than that sum. Take, for instance, an action for specific performance: sometimes, under the Code of Procedure, an action to enforce the specific performance of a contract to convey real estate is combined with a count for damages; and so there are many other cases which might be named where the count for damages is joined with what would have formerly been the subject-matter of an equity suit; and it seems to me that the county court, as these words now are, would have jurisdiction of an action for the specific performance of a contract where the property involved exceeded one hundred thousand dollars in value, provided the party joined with it a claim for damages limited to less than one thousand dollars; and, as I suppose, the design of the Convention was to limit the jurisdiction of the county court, and not to give it general equity jurisdiction, it seems to me that this amendment which I now propose will accomplish that design.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope that amendment will not pass. It was certainly my idea, for one, to give the county court jurisdiction in all cases where the matter in controversy did not exceed one thousand dollars. Under the amendment of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] the county court cannot take jurisdiction even by law, by grant of the Legislature, except in strictly pecuniary actions, where the object is to recover a sum of money.

Mr. HALE—If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I will call his attention to the succeeding part of the sentence which given it "such other original jurisdiction as shall from time to time be conferred upon it by the Legislature." The Legislature may confer additional jurisdiction in the case of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The gentleman is quite correct. The Legislature may confer jurisdiction in other cases besides actions to recover damages or money; but the question before the Convention is whether the county court shall take this jurisdiction by the Constitution instead of waiting for the action of the Legislature. Now, there are a great variety of controversies involving less than one thousand dollars, where the object sought is not the recovery of money at all. The gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale] has mentioned one of them: an action for specific performance of a contract, in which the plaintiff does not seek to recover damages, but only to have a decree that the contract shall be performed. Then take the action so common in our courts, for the specific recovery of chattels, in the nature of replevin, according to the former nomenclature. I do not myself see any reason for distinguishing in the Constitution between an action for damages to the amount of one thousand dollars, and any other suit where the thing in controversy does not exceed that value. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Essex [Mr. Hale]; and I was about to move to insert, after the words "damages claimed," the words

"or matter in controversy," to the end that the county courts may have original jurisdiction to that extent.

Mr. FOLGER—In my judgment, the difficulty with the amendment is that we do not arrive at the value of the thing in controversy until the jury have fixed it, so that we have to wait for their verdict before we know whether the county court has jurisdiction or not. Now, in the case cited by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr Comstock], the case of replevin, the question of value is one of the questions submitted to the jury, and we have to await their verdict before we arrive at the value of the property in question, so that the question of jurisdiction would be postponed until the verdict came in, and if the verdict was for more than one thousand dollars the court would have no jurisdiction, and the litigation be without result.

Mr. COMSTOCK—The language is the same in the judiciary act of the United States, and in many cases the jurisdiction is defined by the amount in controversy. There is a way of pleading to the jurisdiction if the amount is beyond it.

Mr. McDONALD—It seems to me that this brings with it its own remedy, because persons entitled to more than one thousand dollars would be pretty sure not to sue in a court where the jurisdiction was not over that, but would go to the supreme court.

Mr. FOLGER—It is not always the plaintiff that is alone interested in the value of the property. Suppose that I have in my possession a horse, or any other chattel—say a diamond pin—which I value at three thousand dollars. The gentleman from Ontario [Mr. McDonald] demands it, and brings his replevin suit for it, estimating its value but five hundred dollars. Am I to submit to his valuation of it? By no means. I think it is worth more, and I await the opportunity to show by my proofs that it is worth more, but when I have made that proof, I have ousted the court of jurisdiction, and I am subjected to a fruitless litigation, because my opponent brings me into that court to contest for a piece of property worth a larger sum than comes within the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. McDONALD—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The Chair will hear the gentleman by consent of the Convention, but it is against the rules for any gentleman to speak twice upon the same proposition. There being no objection, the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. McDONALD—I simply wish to suggest that the section furnishes a remedy for this difficulty. Such a case would be removed to the supreme court on the suggestion of the defendant that it is claimed by him that the county court has no jurisdiction.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Hale, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I now move the amendment which I suggested in line 7 of this section, to insert after the words "damages claimed" the words "or value in controversey."

Mr. CHESEBRO—I do not see how it would be possible, as has been suggested by my colleague [Mr. Folger] to arrive at the conclusion whether the court has jurisdiction of the cause of action at all until after the verdict of the jury is rendered. That is my only objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], for I should be very glad indeed to have actions of the kind named by him brought in that court, but I do not see how it would be possible to say whether the court has jurisdiction in the action until the verdict is rendered, determining whether, in point of fact, the property in controversy is of the value which will bring it within the jurisdiction of the court. I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment.

Mr. ROBERTSON—I propose to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] by adding the words "in which the damages or the value of the subject-matter in controversy claimed shall not exceed one thousand dollars; the mode of estimating such value or amount of damages to be determined by the Legislature."

Mr. COMSTOCK—I will accept that amendment.

Mr. DALY—The amendment which is now proposed indicates the difficulty involved in the original proposition. The section itself proposes that the Legislature may confer such additional jurisdiction from time to time upon the county court as it thinks proper. Now, if it be desirable to increase the jurisdiction so as to embrace actions of replevin, or actions in the nature of proceedings in rem, it is competent for the Legislature to do so. The provision is already very broad, and includes all cases in which the damages claimed shall exceed one thousand dollars. I think, therefore, it will be more prudent to leave the matter under the general provision which gives the Legislature power to increase the jurisdiction. By making the amendment proposed we shall create the difficulty of determining how the amount or value shall be ascertained, for the purpose of knowing whether or not the court has jurisdiction.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared lost.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to amend by inserting in section 3, line twelve, after the word "elected," the words "or appointed." The phraseology used here was employed to distinguish between persons elected to the court of appeals, and those who came into it from the supreme court; but, as recent events have shown, some gentlemen come to sit in the court of appeals by appointment, instead of by election, and this amendment will provide for this contingency.

Mr. HARRIS—There is a defect in the statement of the proposition in the eleventh section. It is provided by that section that in 1873 it shall be submitted to the electors of this State to determine whether vacancies in the various judicial offices of the State shall be filled by appointment and not by election. That question refers to sections 2, 6, 15 and 18. The result of the vote as it is declared in the section, applies only to sections 2 and 6, making no declaration as to the effect of the vote upon the local judges in the cities of New York, Brooklyn and Buffalo, or upon the county judges. I propose, therefore, to remedy that defect by striking out in lines nine and ten, the words "judges of the court of appeals, and justices of the supreme court;" and making the word "office" "offices," and by inserting thereafter the words mentioned in said sections;" which will make the section complete, and carry out the purpose of its framers.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Harris, and it was declared carried.

Mr. LAPHAM—I propose to add after the word "law," in the third line of section 6, a provision in substance like this: "but no appeal to the court of appeals shall be allowed where the amount of the recovery of the property involved in the judgment is less than five hundred dollars, except upon the certificate of the supreme court pronouncing the judgment, that the case is a proper one to be taken to the court of appeals. I am aware, sir, that it will be claimed that the provision as it now stands authorizes the Legislature to make this limitation upon the right of appeal; but I am not willing to trust it to legislation, and desire some provision to be inserted in the body of the Constitution upon the subject. All who have been observers of the practice under the present system, cannot fail to have seen that the unlimited right of appeal without respect to the amount involved in the controversy, has been one of the chief causes of the accumulation of business upon the calendar of the court of last resort. We have a provision in the law as it now stands, by which no action originating in a justice's court can be brought to the court of appeals, except upon such a certificate, and I propose by this amendment to limit the right of appeal where the amount in controversy or the amount of the recovery is less than five hundred dollars, in the discretion of the court pronouncing the judgment. If they certify that the case is one involving a question proper to be taken to the court of appeals, it can be brought there; but if they decide that it is one of a different character, then the mere caprice, or the personal feeling which so often influences litigants, will not be allowed to carry the case to the court of appeals. In my judgment, the adoption of a provision of this character will do more toward relieving the court of last resort, and toward preventing a new accumulation of business in that court, than any other provision which can be adopted. I see no injustice whatever in it. It seems to me that unless a party proposing to bring a case involving a trifling amount to the court of last resort, can satisfy the judges of the supreme court that it is a proper cause to be brought there, and obtain their certificate to that effect, he ought not to have the right to take it to the court of appeals.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I am entirely opposed to the amendment now proposed. I admit that it would very much relieve the court of appeals to deprive parties of the right of appeal. That is a very summary mode by which we can relieve any court. It is proposed that no one shall be allowed to present his case on appeal to the court of appeals, unless the amount in controversy is five hundred dollars or more. Now, I believe it is our duty to throw the doors wide open to suitors, and allow them to have their controversies settled by the courts of law and by the more valued judgment of the highest tribunal. It is our duty to furnish courts enough, courts that shall be adequate to the decision of all cases brought before them. I do not believe in the propriety of saying that a person who has but five hundred dollars involved in a suit shall be excluded from having it heard and decided in a court, where, if the sum happen to be somewhat larger, he would be permitted to be heard. That is giving the benefits of the court to the rich and denying them to the poor, and I do not believe in that discrimination. I admit that we could very much shorten the labors of the Convention upon this subject by saying that parties shall not be heard in the higher courts, but I do not think that is our duty, nor do I think that it is in accordance with a wise public policy. We are bound to afford litigants a hearing, we are bound to establish courts to hear them. The people all have a right to be heard in the courts without regard to the amounts in controversy, and we should provide for securing to them the enjoyment of that right. It is proposed that, if the court which decides adversely to the litigant shall certify that the case is a proper one to appeal, then the appellant may be heard on appeal. That, sir, I think, is entirely wrong in policy. The court decides against a party, and then it is proposed to require him to apply to that same court for a certificate that his case is a proper one to go to a court of review. The court that has decided against him is not a fair tribunal to pass upon that question. It is already committed upon the subject. It has expressed its judgment that the party has no right of redress, and it is a mere matter of caprice with the court whether the appeal be allowed or whether it be refused. Generally, it will be the inclination of the court to refuse it, whatever it may decide to do in any particular case, and I think it is unjust and impolitic, in every respect, to compel a party to apply to the very court that has decided against him, for the privilege of going to another court to have that decision reviewed. Now, it seems to me, Mr President, that we had better not attempt any changes like this. There is a limitation now as to the amount in controversy—a limitation of fifty dollars, which enables a party to litigate his claim in the supreme court and all the courts in the State—a nominal sum. Virtually, at this time, the courts are thrown open to all without regard to the amount in litigation; and I hope this Convention will not attempt to restrict it in the mode proposed. In the first place, the question really belongs to the Legislature, and not to the Convention. They have power now to impose such restrictions if they think proper, or if they dare to do so, or choose to do so, that justice may be administered by denying a hearing. They have a right to resort to the policy now if such a policy is right. I trust that no amendment will be adopted here interfering with the right of an appeal from the supreme court.

Mr. SMITH—I agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. A. J. Parker], that the amendment proposed would be unwise and unjust, that the doors of the Temple of Justice should be open to all, and to all alike, the high and the low, the rich and the poor. But this amendment proposes to make a distinction in favor of the rich man. If a man is worth his millions, and has a controversy involving more than five hundred dollars, he may move it on through all the courts, even to the court of last resort; but the poor man having a controversy involving less than five hundred dollars—which amount may be his all—when he reaches the supreme court, finds the doors closed to him thereafter, and he must submit to injustice whether he will or no, provided he has failed to obtain justice in the lower court. I do not believe that the pending amendment is in accordance with the theory of our government, or is one that ought to be sanctioned, or would be sanctioned by the people.

Mr. DALY—This subject was very fully discussed in the Committee on the Judiciary, and after what the committee deemed mature deliberations, they arrived at the conclusion that it would not be wise or expedient to adopt it. So far as the suggestion that it might reduce the number of appeals from the supreme court, it is worthy of consideration now whether the last measure which we have adopted increasing the jurisdiction of the county court, and really making that court an efficient tribunal, will not do all that is required to diminish the accumulation of business in the court of appeals. There is very generally a desire by a defeated party to have his case reviewed by another court after it has been determined by the tribunal in which it was brought. In very many instances, the party is satisfied if two tribunals, one superior to the other, unites in the same judgment. Under our present organization, the party is compelled to go in the first instance to the supreme court, for the reason that the present jurisdiction of the county court is exceedingly limited, and he is not usually satisfied with the judgment of the supreme court alone, but he desires to go to the next highest tribunal, which happens to be the court of final resort, and therefore the business of the court of appeals has largely accumulated. But by increasing the jurisdiction of the county court in all cases where the damages claimed do not exceed a thousand dollars, we re-establish in the State what should never have been abandoned, a comprehensive local tribunal in each of the counties of the State convenient to the parties, where the witnesses can be readily obtained, the cause speedily tried, and where justice may be as satisfactorily rendered as in the larger jurisdiction of the supreme court. In the great majority of instances, after a party has had a hearing and determination by a jury, and by the court in the county court, and that has been affirmed upon appeal to the supreme court, he will probably be satisfied, and not be disposed to go further. I think, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that we have devised the best remedy which we can for diminishing the business of the court of appeals; and if it be desirable to provide against that contingency in the future, it would be much better in my judgment to insert a provision in the Constitution that the Legislature may hereafter, if they should deem it expedient, limit the jurisdiction; but that it would be exceedingly unwise to do this in the Constitution itself, and there fix the precise sum which should limit it. For these reasons I fully concur with the views of the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker].

Mr. FERRY—Men differ here as to the propriety of a limitation of this kind, and they will continue to differ hereafter; men of equal intelligence will honestly differ upon this point, and I argue from that that it is safer to leave it where the committee left the matter, and that is to the discretion of the Legislature. They may try the experiment, and if it works badly they can change back; whereas, if we go on and constitutionalize the system, and it operates injuriously, we shall have no remedy of. that kind. There is another feature that strikes me as rendering this amendment objectionable. A man has a cause of action, we will suppose, which involves less than five hundred dollars. He goes to a counsel and asks his advice. The case is important to him. He may be a poor man. The counsel, a conscientious and intelligent attorney, seeks to advise him correctly in regard to his rights. He sets to work and looks over the subject with care, and after that he says to his client: "I have no doubt as to the legal principles which should determine this case, but our courts are somewhat uncertain in their decisions, and I may be compelled to go to the court of last resort before I can get justice done you." Every lawyer who practices has that thought in his mind at times, and he is obliged to say to clients who call upon him that unless he can get the case to the court of last resort he cannot feel confident of a favorable result. With this amendment adopted, he will be obliged to say, "I may be stopped midway in the litigation, and I cannot tell whether you can get justice done or not." Here will be this fetter upon the action of honest and intelligent counsel, which will be embarrassing, to say the least, and it certainly is objectionable in that point of view. There is still another objection. The sum of five hundred dollars is not in all cases the entire amount involved in the recovery of a judgment of that amount. Such recovery is frequently a bar to the recovery in one way or the other of a larger amount, and the judgment in an action involving less than five hundred dollars might prevent the recovery of a million of dollars in another action because when the larger suit shall be commenced, it would be claimed that the question involved had been decided, and must be regarded as res adjudicata.

Mr. LAPHAM—With the permission of the Convention, I would like to say a few words more.

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman having spoken once is barred from speaking again, except by unanimous consent. There being no objection, he may proceed.

Mr. LAPHAM—This suggestion of mine which I have made, is not entirely my own. I have made it in pursuance of a conversation I had last evening with a distinguished jurist who was a member of the courts of this State before the present Constitution was adopted, and who has adorned the court of last resort as one of its most valuable members. The provision is suggested as the result of his observation and experience. Now, sir, as to the hardship and injustice I desire to say a word. I am behind no man in my regard for the rights of the poor man. I stand by them as firmly and as zealously as the gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker] or the gentleman from Fulton [Mr. Smith]. It is to protect the rights of the poor man that I would put this provision in the Constitution. What is the class of cases which go to the court of appeals? They are actions where the poor man recovers against the man of property, having a meritorious cause of action and where his antagonist says: "If you do not stop this litigation I will law you as far as there is a court to which I can appeal." That is the class of cases which go to the court of appeals merely to gratify the will of the rich ligitant and keep the poor man out of what is justly his due. I assume, under this provision, that if the poor man has a judgment which is meritorious, and subsequently his opponent seeks to bring the case into the court of appeals for mere delay and annoyance, it will be a privilege which will be denied him. I assume, sir, that if the poor man or any man having a meritorious cause of action has failed to succeed in recovering it, the court which pronounces judgment will regard the case as one proper to give a certificate as being one which should go to the court of last resort for further examination. There is no bar against the carrying of cases to the court of last resort contained in this provision. There is nothing in it which is broader or more sweeping in its provisions than the present statute in regard to the largest class of actions which are tried in this State, those which originate in the justices' courts, where the right of the poor man is involved, and in those cases you cannot get to the court of appeals unless the supreme court certifies that it is a case proper to be carried there. A man may have two hundred dollars involved in a case, which may be all that he has, and yet if the decision is adverse to him in the supreme court he cannot get his case carried to the court of last resort except upon such certificate. It may be said that the poor man is denied justice by this. There is nothing in that idea. The provision which I suggest is intended and designed, and that will be the effect of it and the only effect, to prevent the bringing of appeals to the court of appeals merely to gratify the caprice or vindictive feelings of litigants who are abundantly able to carry a case to that court. It is that class of litigants who will be estopped by this provision, and against whom I regard this provision as being aimed in its result.

Mr. FOLGER—The difficulty, to my mind, with the amendment of my colleague from Ontario [Mr. Lapham] is that it takes as a basis of the right of appeal a valuation in money, that no cause can be carried to the court of appeals unless it involves a certain amount. In my judgment, that is a basis which is entirely fallacious and illusory. Let me illustrate: the gentleman may have a client living in Canandaigua who may desire to bring an action of ejectment for a share of a farm worth five thousand dollars, and he may carry that case under the amendment through all the courts without any restriction. I may have a client living in Geneva who chooses to enforce the same title for another share by an action of trespass quare clausum, in which he may recover merely nominal damages. He [Mr. Lapham] may succeed at last, in the court of last resort in behalf of one person, and I may be defeated in behalf of another person just short of the court of last resort, although the suits in each case were brought to enforce a right depending upon the same title. He may go to the court of appeals with his case, and I am bound to submit to the judgment of the supreme court under his amendment unless the judges agree that it is a case which should be carried higher. He may succeed upon the same question upon which I may be defeated, and the very same title be held good in one person and bad in another. I say it is entirely illusory—the fixing upon a valuation, the putting on of a tariff and providing that appeals shall not be carried to the court of appeals unless the sum involved amounts to so much money. The sum total in litigation in one aspect may be less than five hundred dollars, and in the other it may be five thousand dollars, and the same question would, in the one case, be stopped in general term, which in the other case would go to the court of appeals. Thus it is that the value of the property that a party claims in one case gives him a right to go the court of appeals, while another party is debarred, although the question involved is precisely the same, because the value of his damages claimed does not come up to the limit of the gentleman's amendment. There is undoubtedly a necessity felt in this State that there should be some limit to the right of appeal, or some equable and uniform hinderance to appeals, but it does strike me that the limit of dollars and cents is an entirely partial and unequal basis upon which to fix that limit.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Lapham, and it was declared lost.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] to section 11, which relates to the submission to the people in 1873 the question whether certain judges shall be elected or appointed, was adopted.

The PRESIDENT—Except by unanimous consent, the question to reconsider cannot now be entertained.

Mr. KRUM—I object.

SEVERAL DELEGATES—No, no.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I think that the motion I make had better be considered now, as it certainly will have to be considered to-morrow. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris], was offered under a misapprehension.

Mr. KRUM—I withdraw the objection.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I did not understand the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Albany, when it was offered, and I have learned in conversation with him that he offered it under some misapprehension. It will be recollected that the Convention, when the subject was under consideration sometime ago, after considerable discussion, deliberately voted to confine this question of submission to the judges of the court of appeals and the judges of the supreme court. The error is in printing the section as it now is. Of course the numbers "fifteen" and "eighteen" in the fifth line ought not to be there. Then the section will be consistent with itself. As I have stated, the fact I believe is that the amendment of the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] was offered under a misapprehension, because he was not present when a vote was taken to except the local courts from the operation of the provision. The object of the gentleman from Albany can be obtained, and the section made consistent, by striking out the words "fifteen" and "eighteen" in line five.

Digitized by Google

Mr. HARRIS—It is true, as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has said, that I was not present when any such vote as that of which he speaks was taken. I do not now regard it as a matter of much consequence whether we confine this submission to the judges of the supreme court and the court of appeals, or whether we extend it to the judges of other courts. My preference would be to extend it to all judges. I think it is better, therefore, to let it stand as it has now been amended; but if the Convention have deliberately determined that this submission shall be confined to the judges of the court of appeals and the supreme court, then the motion of the gentleman from Onondaga ought to prevail; otherwise I should prefer that it stand as it does.

Mr. KRUM—I offered the amendment in Committee of the Whole to include the officers spoken of in sections 15 and 18, and upon my amendment this section was made to embrace the officers named in those sections. I am not aware of any vote having been taken in the Convention doing away with the vote in Committee of the Whole, thus extending this provision to the officers named in those two sections. My argument in Committee of the Whole for the extension of the provisions of this section to the officers named therein, was that these officers were local officers —to wit; the judges of the superior courts of the city of New York, and the city of Buffalo, and the county judges throughout the State. My position, then was, that if it was wise for the people of the State of New York, and they thought it best that the judges of the court of appeals and of the supreme court should be appointed, it was best also to extend the appointment to these local tribunals, that there was a greater necessity in fact, for appointing judges of these local courts than there was for the appointing of judges of the court of appeals and the supreme court. I believe so still. The Committee of the Whole agreed with me then, and I believe that due reflection since has not changed the minds of gentlemen of the Convention. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], will not prevail, but that the section will stand as it was originally adopted in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I regret that this question has got into this situation by a mere misapprehension of what this Convention has formerly done. It is true that upon a full discussion of this question in Convention—not in Committee of the Whole, according to my recollection—it was decided that the submission in 1873 should be confined to the judges of these two higher courts. It was decided upon a full view of the reasons which were then given for so confining it. Now, it may be true that whatever reason can be given for appointing a judge of the court of appeals, or a judge of the supreme court, is just as available for appointing a county judge, and county judges are included in the proposition for submission offered by the gentleman from Schoharie [Mr. Krum], and the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris]. But when the question was considered in the Convention at the time referred to, it was stated that we could not get a fair and deliberate expression of the sense of the whole people of this State if it were presented in a form to excite local prejudices and to be influenced by local circumstances. That was the ground upon which it was put, and it was thought, therefore, wise to confine the submission to those judges who were voted for by the whole people of the State, or by the people in large judicial districts. If it affects the county judge, then you array parties in the county upon a great question which affects the whole State, and a fair and honest expression upon the elective principle or upon appointment as against election can never be had unless the people give that expression unaffected and uninfluenced by the circumstances and the prejudices of localities. If, on a view of the whole subject and of the principles involved in the general question, the people shall declare by their vote that the appointive principle is preferable in regard to these high courts, then the Constitution can be amended, carrying the same principle into the election of local judges; but I should consider it entirely useless and hopeless to submit the question to the people at all if it is to go to them affected by this local prejudice and these circumstances.

Mr. HADLEY—The argument of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] has satisfied me, if I needed to be satisfied before, that his motion to reconsider ought not to be adopted. When we have reached a point that we dare not trust the people of a locality to elect their county judge, or when we have reached a point that we dare not trust the people of a county to determine whether the judge shall be appointed or not, I say that we have arrived at a point where we dare not trust the people to elect a judge of the supreme court or a judge of the court of appeals. The very argument that the gentleman uses, is the strongest argument that can be used to satisfy my mind—

Mr COMSTOCK—Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HADLEY—Certainly.

Mr. COMSTOCK—It is not proposed by any one to interfere with the election of county judges. On the contrary, the motion which I make to reconsider, is, in effect, that we shall continue to elect county judges until the Constitution shall hereafter be amended

Mr. HADLEY—But it is proposed that we shall submit to the people in the year 1873, whether or not county judges shall be appointed or elected. The motion of the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] is to the effect that we shall only submit to the people the question of whether supreme court judges, and judges of the court of appeals shall be appointed. I would like to have the gentleman from Onondaga, or any other gentleman, tell me why the people of any county in this State shall not be allowed to judge for themselves in 1873 whether they will elect county judges in the future, or whether they shall be appointed; or whether the people of the city and county of New York shall not be permitted to say whether they will elect or have appointed the judges of the superior court and of the court of common pleas. And the same with reference to the city of Buffalo. In other words, Mr. President, I am opposed to this reconsideration for the reason that I want the people of every locality to have their attention expressly called to this question and to say whether they will have an appointed or an elected judiciary. It is for that reason that I am opposed to the reconsideration, and am in favor of the section as it now stands. I desire the people of every locality, in every county, in every town, and even in every school district to understand whether or not in 1873 they will elect their county judges, or whether they would prefer to have them appointed by the Governor. I wish the people to understand it with reference to the superior court and the court of common pleas of the city of New York, the city court of Brooklyn, and the superior court of Buffalo, and of every county court in the State. I want the people aroused to the importance of the question, and they will be aroused to its importance if the question is submitted to them in their various localities in relation to their local courts; whereas, if it is simply confined to the State courts—the supreme court and the court of appeals—they will not have their attention so certainly and directly called to it as they would have if their locality was to be affected by it.

Mr. DEVELIN—The gentleman from Seneca [Mr. Hadley] seems to be somewhat in error in regard to the courts in the city of New York. It is not proposed by this clause in the Constitution to submit to the people of the city of New York whether their judges shall be elected or appointed.

Mr. HADLEY—Certainly.

Mr. DEVELIN—It is proposed to submit to the people of the State of New York whether the judges in the city of New York shall be elected or appointed

Mr. FOLGER—I think the gentleman is in error. Section 16 expressly applies to the city of New York.

Mr. DEVELIN—Section 11 declares that the people of the entire State shall determine whether the judges in the city of New York shall be elected or appointed. I say that the gentleman from Seneca [Mr. Hadley] is mistaken in supposing that the people of the city of New York are to decide this question of themselves.

Mr. HADLEY—By section 15 the gentleman from New York [Mr. Develin] will discover that the superior court and the court of common pleas of the city of New York, and the city court of Brooklyn, and the superior court of Buffalo, as well as the county courts, are all in the same category.

Mr. DEVELIN—I understand that, but it is the people of the State of New York—the people of the entire State—who are to decide whether the judges in the city of New York are to be elected or appointed. It does not leave the matter to the people of the city of New York to decide. It does not leave it to the people of a county to decide whether the judge of that county shall be elected or appointed, but the decision is left to the people of the whole State. My friend from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock] is perfectly right in saying that local prejudice will probably defeat any fair, straightforward, unbiased expression of public opinion on the part of the people, if you include in this submission the local judges in the city of New York. We, of New York, have for years been restive under legislation in Albany in regard to our city, and under appointments made under that legislation. If, then, the question is to be submitted whether the Governor, be he democrat or be he republican, shall appoint the judges of the court of common pleas and of the superior court, in the city of New York, I venture to say that there will be a majority of from thirty to forty thousand against the proposition, and the same result would occur in many of the counties of the State.

Mr. HITCHCOCK—In most of them.

Mr. DEVELIN—Yes, in most of them. Therefore, if it is the desire of the Convention that there should be an unbiased expression of opinion upon the part of the people of the State whether the judges of the two highest courts shall be appointed or elected, the question should not be prejudiced by bringing local considerations to bear in its determination.

Mr. A. J. PARKER—I hope this motion to reconsider will prevail. I was satisfied, at the time the amendment was offered, that it was offered under a misapprehension; for I recollect perfectly well that this question was discussed, and well understood when it was determined in the Convention on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], which confined the submission of the question to the appointment of judges in the court of appeals and the supreme court. Certainly it would be manifestly improper for the people of the State to determine whether the judges in the city of New York should be elected or appointed, and it would be also improper for them to determine whether the officers included in the fifteenth section should be appointed or elected in other parts of the State. It seems to me it is better in submitting this question in 1873 to submit simply the question whether the judges who are properly State judges—judges whose jurisdiction extends over the entire State—should be appointed or elected. That includes only the judges of the court of appeals and the supreme court. In regard to them, there is an interest felt throughout the entire State, over which their jurisdiction extends. I believe it will be wise to strip the question of any other consideration except the one whether those judges shall be elected or appointed, leaving the question in regard to local judges to be determined thereafter.

Mr. KRUM—Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT—The gentleman having spoken once, is barred from speaking again under the rules; but there being no objection he may proceed.

Mr. KRUM—I have great deference to the opinion of the learned gentleman from Albany [Mr. A. J. Parker], and also to the opinion of the learned gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Comstock], but I have been unable, in listening to their arguments in favor of the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Albany [Mr. Harris] was adopted, to determine any principle upon which they seek to reconsider it, save that unless it is reconsidered the proposition to appoint judges of the court of appeals, and of the supreme court will be defeated by the people. Neither of them take the position that it is not right. Neither of them take the position that the judges of the superior court, and of the county court ought not to be appointed. They stand in the Convention upon the mere question of policy, and not upon the question of principle. It strikes me that we should determine this question upon principle, and if it is best to appoint supreme court judges and judges of the court of appeals, is it not also upon principle, equally right to appoint judges of the county courts, and judges of the superior court? I submit that this Convention is belittling itself when it stands here upon the question of policy and not upon the broad question of principle. Fear of defeat is the only argument, fear of defeat before the people, and not the question of right and wrong. It is said that the people of the whole State ought not to determine whether or not the judges of the superior court in the city of New York should be elected. If the people of the whole State ought not to determine whether the judges of the superior court in the city of New York should be elected, then I ask why the people of the whole State should determine whether the judges in the third judicial district should be elected or appointed? The question is one as to the judiciary of the whole State, and, although the superior court judges of the city of New York belong to the local court in that city, yet, after all, the question of the judiciary is a question for the people of the whole State, so far as its basis is concerned, to fix upon and determine. I believe that, as this question includes the superior court judges, and the judges of the county court, the people will become sufficiently exercised about it in its submission to them, that they will look into it and vote upon it intelligently, and that the leaving out of the county court judges, and the superior court judges, will leave the subject to be passed upon at the election, without the people fairly considering the principle involved. I hope that the motion to reconsider will not prevail.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Comstock to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of Mr. Harris was adopted, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 22 ayes, the noes not being counted.

Mr. HARRIS—I find, on a more careful observation, that the amendment I proposed to section 16 does not cover the whole case. I therefore propose to apply the same amendment to section 2, line four, after the words "fourteen years," insert "from the first day of January next after said election," thus making it applicable to the court of appeals. The amendment I first offered applies only to the other judges.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Harris, and it was declared adopted.

Mr. HADLEY—I move to amend by adding in section 34, in the second line, the words "may try such offenses with or without a jury;" so that the section will read as follows: "Courts of special sessions shall have such jurisdiction of offenses of the grade of misdemeanors as may be prescribed by law, and may try such offenses with or without a jury." The object of the amendment is this: that courts of special sessions may try offenses without a jury if the Legislature should see fit to create such courts; as, for instance, cases of assault and battery and some of the minor grades of misdemeanor.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Hadley, and it was declared lost.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee as to what position they have left the clause in the present Constitution, in reference to courts of conciliation, whether they have touched that matter at all in their report?

Mr. FOLGER—I will answer the gentleman by saying, that we have not touched that subject at all.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—Then I move to add the clause in the present Constitution providing that courts of conciliation may be organized, amending by inserting the word "shall" in place of the word "may," so as to make their establishment imperative upon the Legislature. I wish the gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee had given more consideration to that clause.

The SECRETARY read the clause proposed to be added by Mr. S. Townsend as follows:

"Tribunals of conciliation shall be established with such powers and duties as may be prescribed by law; but such tribunal shall have no power to render judgment to be obligatory on the parties, except they voluntarily submit their matters in difference, and agree to abide the judgment, or assent thereto, in the presence of such tribunal, in such cases as shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—That is the idea. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALVORD—I believe that in the history of this State, under the present Constitution, there has never been but one tribunal of conciliation created by the statute under the Constitution, which gives the right to the Legislature to create such a tribunal. That instance was in the county of Delaware, and the court cost some ten thousand dollars by way of fees to the judge thus appointed, although the judge tried but three cases and decided but one. [Laughter.]

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—My object in offering the additional clause is merely to assert a principle. It is a practice now to refer cases, and it was thought of sufficient importance in the Convention of 1846 to place this clause in the Constitution. It was thought that the people would like to have some recognition of a court which would have more influence than would attach to a mere voluntary reference—that they would like to have a court before which they could go under certain circumstances and certain forms prescribed by the Legislature for the settlement of differences. I should say that the author of the clause of the present Constitution was a very distinguished gentleman originally of the mercantile profession, and who had studied law in the city of New York, but who was more distinguished as a traveler, an author and a lecturer—Mr. John L. Stevens. He brought this proposition forward and sustained it by a most admirable speech in the Convention on the ground that in his numerous travels in other countries, he saw this principle recognized owing its origin principally to the Turkish Cadi and the Alcalde of Spain, and that he had found the most beneficial results to flow from it. His argument before the Convention was so intelligent, persuasive and conclusive that a select committee was appointed in reference to the matter and the clause would have been passed precisely in the form which I have suggested, had he not good-naturedly yielded to the suggestion of a gentleman in the committee that the word "may" should be used instead of the word "shall," because the gentleman said the word "may" had the same force as the word "shall." [Laughter.] And I have since heard it stated that in legal terminology the words are synonymous. Although it has been said that but a single court has been established under the clause referred to, and that in the county of Delaware, I presume that some local circumstances must have interfered with its successful operation. Certainly it cannot do any harm to adopt this clause unless some better argument can be adduced against it than has yet been suggested.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I did not design to say one word during the discussion of this judiciary article, but the amendment which has been proposed by my colleague [Mr. S. Townsend] seems to be an eminently proper one. My conviction is a conviction based somewhat upon observation and inquiry, that such a provision inserted in the Constitution, and made mandatory upon the Legislature to establish such a court, would result in great public good. I believe, sir, that it would abridge to a very large extent the amount of litigation, and whatever contributes to lessen litigation, in my judgment, will result in a public benefit. Now, sir, as a layman, I feel the prejudice which gentlemen of the legal profession naturally have in regard to what may be called innovations upon the customs of the State and country respecting courts of law and practice in them; but these courts of conciliation are common in some of the old countries. I believe they practically exist, though under another name, in France, and in some other countries, and wherever they have been tried, so far as my inquiries have gone, they result in public good, and save a large amount of expense to the State and to the people. Certainly a proposition of this kind cannot do any harm. I believe, sir, if it was in the power of the Convention to establish such a court, while it would encounter a great amount of local prejudice, it would also result in abridging litigation, and conferring great benefits upon the people in settling questions of this kind in a friendly and amicable manner.

Mr. FOLGER—May I ask the gentleman to state what he understands by a tribunal of conciliation?

Mr. E. BROOKS—I will tell the gentleman. I understand the term to be precisely what the words express. The gentleman knows very well what a tribunal is; and he also knows what is meant by conciliation. I suppose that the term might go to this extent; that the power of such court would be defined by the Legislature of the State—that such a court might have power conferred upon it of this character: for example—here are two parties to a litigation; they agree according to terms provided by law that the question between them shall be settled, and settled finally, without carrying a controversy through all the forms of law up to the court of appeals.

Mr. FOLGER—We have just such a court as that already, without direct constitutional provision. If the gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks], and myself have a difference, we can settle the matter by arbitration, and arbitrators are no more and no less than a tribunal of conciliation. He and I may, if we feel indisposed to resort to litigation, agree upon arbitrators—right-minded men to settle our difference for us. We can submit the matter to them, and that is a practical tribunal of conciliation. The Revised Statutes already provide for arbitrators except in certain specified cases—cases relating to the title of real estate and perhaps others. Even under the Code of Procedure, we may agree upon a state of facts and submit the case to the supreme court without a formal suit, and thus have the case decided without the calling of witnesses and without any of the pharaphernalia of a lawsuit and thus have the difference between us decided in an amicable way. What more do we need as a court of conciliation? The gentleman [Mr. E. Brooks], and I may select the gentleman from Ontario before me [Mr. Chesebro], and he may hear the statement of facts in an informal manner and do what he regards as just between us. That to-day is the law, except in respect to title to land. Or, if we desire more formality, we may submit the facts as we may agree upon them in writing to the supreme court. What do we want another tribunal for? The difficulty is not in the Constitution; it is in human nature itself, which will not be conciliated. It prefers litigation. It prefers to frame an issue and to try the case at circuit and at general term and at the court of appeals. There is no difficulty to-day in any two men who differ about their rights, submitting the question at issue to a tribunal of conciliation elected by themselves—flexible, free as the air—and without any constitutional provision. And for that reason I am opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Queens, [Mr. S. Townsend].

Mr. DALY—The gentleman from Richmond [Mr. E. Brooks] is in error in supposing that the opposition to courts of conciliation arises solely from professional prejudice on the part of members of the legal profession. There is no such idea. Courts of conciliation have been in existence in Europe for nearly a hundred years. King Christian, one of the kings of Denmark, first established a court of that description. It is exceedingly simple in structure, and peculiarly adapted to the kind of government where it prevails. The gentleman from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] has suggested that there is no jurisdiction so comprehensive as the Turkish Cadi. When the litigants come before him for conciliation he has the power to do with them what he pleases. But we have learned from the days of Magna Charta that our rights are to be determined by certain legal principles, and that upon the continuance and application of those principles depends the preservation of our rights. It is true that the experiment of courts of conciliation has been tried, and that within certain limits they are practicable, but those boundaries are exceedingly limited. If gentlemen had before them the report of the Judiciary Committee they would find appended to it an account of the judicial system of France, and would see that there is a court in the city of Paris, and another, I think, in the city of Lyons, called the court of prudhommes—or a court for working men—where small controversies arising between employer and employee, generally between mechanics and master-mechanics, are settled. It is a court composed in part of a judicial officer, but the greater part of journeymen mechanics or masters; and the experience in regard to that court is, that it works exceedingly well—that many cases every year are conciliated. And, sir, there is no difficulty in the Legislature creating, if they deem it judicious, a court of that nature in the city of New York, and try the experiment there, as it has been tried in the city of Paris. It requires no constitutional provision to put such a tribunal in operation. A constitutional provision such as is contained in the Constitution of 1846 suggests to the mind a fundamental change in the whole system of our judicial organization. It suggested an impossibility that was fully verified by the result. Educated, as we have been, to have our rights determined, and strictly determined, by rules and principle, no person is willing to trust the disposition of his rights to the arbitrary judgment of any man.

Mr. S. TOWNSEND—In reply to the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. Daly]. I will say here that the only penalty which the author of the proposition in the Convention of 1846 calculated to attach to the provision was that the appellant should lose all costs. That was the great feature of the Alcaldo courts of Spain and other countries which owe their origin to Spain. No such penalty as suggested by the gentleman, of severing the neck by the scimiter, has been proposed.

Mr. DALY—I do not know that I went into the details to the extent of suggesting that the Turkish Cadi had the power of taking off the heads of those before him, though such cases have occurred. I would suggest, in reply to the gentleman, that the difference is only one of degree between the Spanish Alcalde and the Turkish Cadi. God forbid that we should ever become, in our land, subject to courts of that description. I have said, Mr. President, that if it is desirable, the experiment of a court of conciliation might be tried in the State. The great mistake made by the Convention of 1846 was in supposing that such a principle could be introduced into the general judicial organization of the State. And I would repeat to my friend from Queens [Mr. S. Townsend] that courts of conciliation already exist, as has been already stated by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger], and yet the people seem to be unwilling to avail themselves of them. For many years I have been acting in a court in the city of New York, which happens to have special jurisdiction over proceedings arising under the provisions of the Revised Statutes relating to arbitration; and I would say, as a matter of information extending over a practical experience of over twenty years, that so unwilling do suitors appear to be to trust their rights to that provision in reference to arbitration, that cases of arbitration in which judgment has been entered up in our court have been exceedingly rare. During that period, in nearly every case where such proceeding has been instituted, the parties have been so dissatisfied that they have almost uniformly appealed to the court to exercise the limited jurisdiction it has to review and set aside arbitrations; and I say it justifies the remarks that our people are too enlightened to trust the disposition of their rights to the arbitrary judgment of any man. If the opposite principle is right—if the reference of differences to the Cadi and Alcalde is the correct principle—then the whole system of jurisprudence which we have followed and acted upon for centuries, is fundamentally wrong. I admit that in a limited sphere it would be possible to settle small claims arising for wages in courts of conciliation. But as the gentleman from Onondaga [Mr. Alvord] has said, the experiment has been tried in a larger way, and it was not successful. It is not necessary that the word "shall" should be placed in the Constitution. The word "may" exists in the present Constitution, and in consonance with that provision, the Legislature established a court of this description in one of the rural districts in this State, and the result is, as has been stated by the gentleman from Onondaga, that it cost the State nearly ten thousand dollars, with scarcely any suitors. There was a provision that it might continue in existence for three years and might then be renewed upon an application to the Legislature. No such application was made; no voice was raised for its continuance. I need only ask in conclusion, Mr. President, that after twenty years' experience with a provision of this kind in the Constitution, what utility is there in repeating it, or asking us to continue a constitutional provision of this kind in the Constitution for twenty years longer, when it is in the power of the Legislature to organize a tribunal of that nature, if the public exigency should require it, and it should be left to the discretion of the Legislature to exercise it or not.

Mr. E. BROOKS—With the consent of the Convention, I will make a single remark. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from the city of New York [Mr. Daly], that I certainly entertain no prejudice against the members of the legal profession. Long ago I learned to admire that sentiment uttered by Edmund Burke, in regard to Lord Grenville as a British Minister, when he said that he was bred to the law, which, in my opinion, "is one of the noblest of the human professions, but which is not apt, except in minds peculiarly constituted, to enlarge and liberalize the mind in deliberating upon measures outside of their own profession." I have looked upon a court of conciliation as having a tendency to conciliate persons who have a tendency to engage in litigation, or who are unwittingly drawn into it, and I believe that such a court would abridge, in a large measure, time and the expense, both of the State and the people, which is taken up by this kind of controversy. And let me add, as a layman, and as a member of this Convention,—and it may sound very revolutionary in this body—that if I had the power I would abolish four-fifths of the present courts of law and establish courts of equity in their place [laughter]; for, in my judgment, sir, a majority of the decisions made are not at all equitable in their character, but are the results of legal acumen and ability, and ability sometimes to make the worse appear the better reason. In regard to the judgments which are rendered—and I say it in all respect—a Convention composed, as this is, nearly four-fifths of members of the bar, the decisions in a great majority of cases are not decisions of equity, but are decisions of law apart from equity.

The question was [then put on the motion of Mr. S. Townsend, and it was declared lost.

Mr. LAPHAM—I desire to take the sense of the Convention upon another point by amending the twenty-eighth section. Those who remember the first judicial election held under the Constitution of 1846 will remember how well it illustrated the great importance of having judicial elections distinct from all others. I believe, sir, that the success of an elective judiciary depends more upon having selections thus made by the people, independent of all other considerations than the fitness of the nominees for their places—than upon any other consideration which can govern the conduct of the electors. I propose, therefore, to strike out the whole of the twenty-eighth section down to and including the words "sixty-nine" in the fourth line, and to insert in the place thereof a provision substantially in these words:

"All elections for judicial officers, except justices of the peace, shall take place at such time as the Legislature shall prescribe, between the first Tuesday of April and the first Tuesday of June in each year."

So as to separate the elections for judicial officers from all other elections, and have them take place at the period of the year that I have named instead of a later period and nearer the time of the annual and general elections.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Lapham, and, on a division, it was declared lost, by a vote of 20 ayes; noes not counted.

Mr. FOLGER—By way of reconciling the differences as to section 11, I would move to amend, so that the questions proposed to the people by that section shall be separated, and that there shall be one question as to vacancies in the offices of judges and justices mentioned in sections 2 and 6, and another question as to the vacancies proposed in the offices provided for in sections 15 and 18, both to be submitted at the same election. Of course the amendment will require some verbiage, which I cannot give at the present time; but that is the idea, that there shall be two questions proposed to the people, one as to filling vacancies in the offices of justices and judges created by sections 2 and 6, and a second question as to those offices created by sections 15 and 18.

Mr. KRUM—I move a further amendment, so as to submit it in three separate propositions; the officers mentioned in sections 2 and 6 to be included in one, those in section 15 in another, and those in section 18 in the third.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Krum, and it was declared lost.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. Folger.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I hope that amendment will prevail. One of the questions submitted relates to the State judges; the other question relates to the local judges. The question is divisible in its nature. It depends upon distinct considerations, and may receive a distinct decision.

Mr. HADLEY—I desire, Mr. President, to say frankly, that I am unqualifiedly in favor of an elective judiciary, now and in 1873, and I desire to have this question presented to the people now, on the adoption of this Constitution, and in 1873 in a manner that shall call the attention of the entire people of the State to this question of an elective judiciary in the most positive and distinct manner, and for that reason I would like to have it presented so that it will call the attention of every citizen in every county of the State, the citizens of New York, and Buffalo and Brooklyn, as well as the people of the State at large, to this question, as to whether their judiciary shall be elected or appointed. For that reason I am opposed to this division. It is only another ingenious move, on the part of my learned friend, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. Folger], to get round the question of presenting squarely to the people the question whether they will have an elective judiciary in 1873 or not, and I desire this Convention now, and here, to put it in such a form that the people in 1873, after some of us, whose hair is white, shall be gone, that the young men of to-day that shall be the active men of that day, shall have their attention called to it, so that they shall understand that the people then shall have the choice of electing their judges in the counties, in the cities, and in the State at large. This is, and I say it with no disrespect to any one, in my judgment, an attempt at some future day to do what gentlemen dare not fairly do to-day, have an appointive judiciary; and I believe the people of to-day, in 1868, will insist, nor do I believe they will be the less backward in 1873, in insisting, upon an elective judiciary for their county judges, and for common pleas judges, and superior court judges, in New York and Buffalo, as well as the judges of the supreme court and the court of appeals. I desire that the whole thing shall go together. I am opposed, I will frankly say, to the entire section, but if they will submit to the people in 1873 the question whether there shall be an appointive judiciary in any degree or not, I desire that it shall extend not only to the court of appeals and the supreme court, and to the superior court of New York and the common pleas of New York, and the superior court of Buffalo, and the city court of Brooklyn, which, now for the first time, are here to be constitutionalized, but also the county courts; and for that reason I am opposed to the motion of my friend from Ontario [Mr. Folger].

Mr. ALVORD—I understood the gentleman who has just taken his seat, to say that gentlemen were undertaking to do a thing here indirectly which they dared not do directly. I desire to state that I stand here ready to vote, and have voted in favor of the appointing power rather than the elective, with regard to the judges; and, having failed in that, giving honestly and fairly a vote in that direction, I desire to do the next best thing, submit the question to the people to determine how it shall be in the future. I have no sort of question, that if the people shall be called upon to vote upon this question of appointing or electing the officers of our higher courts, they will decide in favor of appointment, and I desire that they shall not be trammeled in their decisions by local influences brought to bear upon them with regard to their local officers. It is an attempt on the part of these gentlemen who dare not submit this question to the people naked and simple, so to trammel it by connecting it with their local courts, and raising up local prejudices in regard to it, as to defeat the great end of the appointment of the judicial officers of the higher grades by the Governor and the Senate, as the people of this State, in my opinion, desire to do to-day.

Mr. HALE—This Convention has already resolved that it will submit to the people of this State the question of appointing or electing the judiciary. The only question now is, how that submission can most fairly be made. The gentleman from Seneca [Mr. Hadley] argues that this is a trap, sprung here by gentlemen who are in favor of the appointing principle. I insist that the proposition made by the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Folger] involves the only fair way of getting at the sense of the people. And why? I have heard many gentlemen of experience differ in regard to where they would apply the appointive and where the elective system. I have heard gentlemen say they were in favor of electing the judges of the State at large, but that they were in favor of appointing local judges. Why should not the voters of the State who entertain that opinion, have the privilege of saying by their votes that they wish their local judges appointed, but are willing to have the State judges elected by the people of the whole State? On the other hand, I have heard the opinion expressed in the Convention by others, that while they would favor the election of local judges, they would have the State judges appointed by the Governor. Why should not those who entertain that opinion have the privilege of saying so by their votes? It is not a question which involves for our decision the question of an appointive or elective judiciary; but it is simply, whether the people shall be permitted to say, if they choose to do it, that they will have their local judges appointed, but will let the State judges be elected; or, on the other hand, that they will have the judges of the court of appeals and the supreme court appointed, but will elect their local judges; and if the people desire that, if they desire that the appointive system shall apply to one branch of these judicial officers, and the elective system to the other, I would like to have any gentleman tell me why they should not be allowed the privilege of expressing their desire, and why such distinction should not be made, if in accordance with the will of the people?

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Folger, and it was declared carried.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I desire to move an amendment for the purpose of testing the sense of the Convention upon a question which was discussed in the Committee of the Whole and ingrafted in the sixteenth section as the sense of the committee, as to the period of time at which a judge should be legislated out of office. I therefore move, in the sixteenth line of the sixteenth section, to insert after the word "seventy" the word "five," promising, in case the sense of the Convention shall adopt that amendment, to move a similar one in regard to the other judges named in section 2. I believe, inasmuch as we are merely here judging for ourselves as to what period of time it is proper to fix for a judge to sit upon the bench, that there will be no danger whatever in this Convention fixing a further limitation, and leaving to the people to determine at what period of time a judge shall be incapacitated by age from occupying a position upon the bench. I know of men in this State, who are to-day on the bench, whose term of office under the present Constitution will expire after they are seventy-five years of age, and I know of men who have been upon the bench, who have adorned it, who are ornaments now in the profession, that have passed the period of seventy-five years, and are in active practice. I see no judgment or good sense in this body limiting the period, when, if we fix the limitation at seventy-five years, or any other period beyond that now limited by the section, we only leave it to the people to determine whether or not a man is in that degree of capacity and physical ability to discharge the duties of the office up to the period of seventy-five years, or any other period of time that we may designate. I therefore think it would be wise to fix the period at not less than seventy-five years, and leave it for the people to judge whether or not the individual they shall select for the position is equal to filling that office up to that period of time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK—That proposition has been passed upon in Convention.

The PRESIDENT — The Chair is not aware that it has.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I think the question was passed upon in the Committee of the Whole, but not in the Convention.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair is informed that it was in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRIS—If we do not fix the limit of seventy years I do not see any use in fixing any limit at all. Why not let the poor old gentleman hold his office until he dies a natural death?

The question was then put on the amendment offered by Mr. Chesebro, and it was declared lost.

Mr. GRAVES—I move that the Convention do now adjourn.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Graves, and it was declared lost.

Mr. GRAVES—Is it in order now to move to strike out a section?

The PRESIDENT—Amendments generally are in order.

Mr. GRAVES—I move then to strike out section 11. I submit, whether, after the protracted discussion which has been had upon this question—

Mr. KINNEY—I rise to a point of order. I feel quite confident that this same motion has been entertained once in Convention to strike out that section.

The PRESIDENT—That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. DALY—If there are no further amendments to be offered to the section I deem it but just to an absent gentleman [Mr. Hardenburgh] to say that he has a motion pending for the reconsideration of the provisions of the eighth section; a question which was much debated in the Convention, and which he desires to renew. As I was opposed to his motion I deem it but an act of justice to rise and say that he has been suddenly called away from this Convention to attend the funeral of Judge Wright; that he is very anxious to try the sense of the Convention again upon this subject; and I suggest, if such should be the disposition of the Convention, that this matter shall remain until to-morrow morning.

Mr. DEVELIN—He will not be here till Friday. The judge will be buried Thursday.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair is of opinion that that reconsideration has once been had.

Mr. FOLGER—I would suggest that when the gentleman from Ulster [Mr. Hardenburgh] arrives he can reach his end by moving to instruct the Committee on Revision just as well as by a reconsideration, if it is in order.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair understands the gentleman from New York [Mr. Daly] to assent to that proposition.

Mr. STRATTON—I move to amend section 9 by striking from the first and second lines the words, "of the court of appeals and of the supreme court at general term," so that the section will read, "No judge shall sit in review of a decision in which he formerly participated." If this principle is good for any thing it is good for every thing, and it should apply to every judge who takes part in a decision, and not apply simply to two of the courts in the State.

The question was put on the amendment offered by Mr. Stratton, and it was declared carried.

Mr. GRAVES—I do not desire to appeal from the judgment of the Chair, but I submit again that the motion to strike out the eleventh section has not been heard in the Convention. It has been heard in the committee, but I think not in the Convention, if my recollection is right. I do not desire to persist in it.

The PRESIDENT—The Chair still adheres to its opinion, but will entertain the motion, if there be no objection.

Objection was made.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I desire to move an amendment to the twentieth section. After the word "surrogate," in the fourth line, to insert the words, "and to exercise the power of judges of the supreme court at chambers." The amendment will have the effect of conferring upon local officers of counties the powers of the supreme court at chambers, and will be substantially conferring upon those officers the same powers which were formerly exercised by the supreme court commissioners. In many counties of the State it is very desirable that that power should be conferred upon those officers.

Mr. FOLGER—I ask the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro] whether he proposes to give more power to these local officers than is given to the county judges and surrogates. His amendment will have that effect.

"The Legislature may, on application of the board of supervisors, provide for the election of local officers, not to exceed two in any county, to discharge the duties of county judge and surrogate."

In addition to those duties he proposes to give them the duties of the supreme court judges at chambers. It seems to me that it will be an anomaly, an incongruity, to create an officer inferior to another to act when the superior is incapitated, and yet with other and greater powers than his superior. Apart from that it does seem to me that the county judge has sufficient powers and duties already, without giving him the duties of the supreme court at chambers.

Mr. CHESEBRO—I am indifferent whether this amendment is inserted at the point where I have designated in the twentieth section, or whether it shall be inserted after the word "surrogate" in the fourth line of the eighteenth section, as has been suggested to me by a delegate. What I desire is simply this, that there shall be an officer in the county who shall have the power of performing the duties of the supreme court judges at chambers, which is simply the granting of orders, which the profession generally understand must at times be obtained upon application very summarily. It is the exercise simply of a discretionary power which is reviewable before the supreme court, and, therefore, it cannot by any possibility or probability do any injury, while it will be a great accommodation in many counties of the State to the profession. It has come to my knowledge that there are counties in this State where members of the profession are required to go a distance of fifty or sixty miles to obtain simply an ex parte order from a judge. I think that in counties of that description it is eminently proper that we should provide an officer who shall have the power of granting those orders without compelling the lawyer to go to a supreme court judge at the distance he is now required to go. The Committee on Revision can put that provision in at any point. I am indifferent where it comes in; whether at the point I have designated in either of these two sections, or at the point designated by Judge Daly; but I think it is proper that there should be somewhere in that article a provision conferring that power on a local officer.

Mr. SEAVER—I would suggest to the gentleman from Ontario [Mr. Chesebro] that his amendment could be inserted in the eighteenth or twentieth section, in both or either. They confer on the Legislature sufficient power to grant this authority, and the conferring of it can be left to the Legislature better than to insert it in the Constitution.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. Chesebro, and it was declared lost.

Mr. LAPHAM—I move a reconsideration of the vote on the amendment offered by me to section 28, and ask that that motion lie on the table

The PRESIDENT—The motion will lie on the table under the rule.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I move that when this article is completed it be referred back to the Judiciary Committee to report complete. I am under the impression that there is considerable to do in putting the work of the Convention in proper shape, and expressing the various provisions of this article in proper style. It is a long and complicated article, and, being myself a member, both of the Judiciary Committee and the Committee on Revision, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say that I think the Judiciary Committee, the best constituted, on the whole, to do the remaining work on this article; and I would also add that the Committee on Revision concur in this disposition of the subject. I therefore move that it be referred back to that committee.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I hope the gentleman will change the phraseology of his motion that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for revision, so as to complete the work in that respect.

Mr. COMSTOCK—That is what I mean.

Mr. FOLGER—I move to amend the motion so that the report shall first be printed.

Mr. COMSTOCK—I accept that amendment.

The question was then put on the adoption of the motion of Mr. Comstock, and it was declared carried.

Mr. MERRITT—I move the Convention do now adjourn.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. Merritt, it was declared carried.

So the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 15, 1868.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. Dr. SPRAGUE.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. HARRIS presented four memorials praying for the abolition of the Board of Regents.

Which were referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRIS—I desire to embrace this opportunity to make a communication to the members of this Convention in behalf of the mayor of this city. He has a very convenient office in this building, in the south-west corner, on the first floor, at the right hand of members as they enter the hall. He has asked me to tender, for him, to the members of this Convention the use of that room, while they are engaged in the discharge of their duties here. It will be found a very convenient room, well fitted up and with ample accommodations for writing, and for the meeting of committees. It gives me very great pleasure to be the organ of this communication from Mayor Thacher, who has been generous and unwearied in his efforts to provide for the comforts and conveniences of this Convention.

Mr. E. BROOKS—I move that the offer of the mayor of this city be accepted, and that the thanks of this Convention be returned for the same.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Brooks, and it was declared carried.

The PRESIDENT presented a communication from the New York Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, signed by the Secretary, stating that no memorial to the Constitutional Convention praying for the abolition of the Board of Regents had ever been signed by the directors of that institution.

Which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT announced the special order of the day to be the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature.

Mr. STRATTON—I do not see the chairman of that committee here. This report was laid over once before on account of his absence, and I move that it be now passed for the purpose of taking up the report of the Committee on Charities.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. Stratton, and it was declared carried.

The Convention then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Charities and Charitable Institutions, Mr. OPDYKE, of New York, in the chair

The SECRETARY read the first section of the report as follows:

SEC. 1. The Legislature shall establish a board of commissioners of charities, consisting of eight persons, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum who shall have power to visit, inspect, and to require reports from charitable institutions of every nature and description whatever, whether established by individuals, or supported or aided by the State, except religious organizations of a sectarian character, penal and correctional institutions, and educational institutions otherwise controlled by law. Such board shall report to the Legislature. It shall also give notice to the Attorney-General of any breach of trust in the management of such institutions or of their funds, who shall thereupon refer the question of such breach of trust to the proper court. The members of such board shall be appointed by the Governor with the consent of the Senate. Their term of office shall be eight years, and they shall be so classified that one shall go out of office in each year.

Mr. E. BROOKS—We have now reached in the course of our deliberations the article upon charities and I shall so far depart from the usual custom of this body, and from my own uniform practice, as a member of it, as to read what I propose to state in defense of the article now under consideration. I ought, perhaps, to make no apology for this, because in the discussion of a subject of so much importance, a subject which has received from time to time the consideration of this body, and which has received, in a large degree the attention of the State, I think that in preparing myself as I have, I do no more than justice to the Convention itself, as I have endeavored to do justice to the subject under consideration. When we assembled last summer, and almost from the day we came until our return here in November, we were met by petitions, headed in large black letters with the question, "Shall the State support the churches?" and complaining, as "tax payers of New York," that the people's money had been expended in vast amounts for purely sectarian purposes. These petitions had their origin in party organizations in the city of New York. They have been, and are still, scattered all over the State, and have produced in the minds of the people that natural fruit which springs forth from sectarian hate and sectional prejudice, as between town and country. There is hardly a town in the State which has not sent one or more of these petitions to this body, and it is fair to suppose that both the reports of the Committee on Finance and of the Committee on the Powers and Duties of the Legislature, each of them adverse to charitable appropriations, were more or less influenced by the record made. Be this as it may, the reports referred to were made in the presumption that the State had been guilty of great wrong in its grants of money for public and private charity.

CHURCH AND STATE.

I shall not discuss at any length the relations which, in a government like ours, the State bears to the church, for this is one of the subjects noticed, but if it be any gratification to the thousands of citizens who have sent their memorials to this body, I am prepared to answer their question in the negative. The State ought not to support the churches, and it ought not to make donations for purely sectarian purposes. And having answered this question, let me add that it is also unworthy of a State to deny to any class of needy people the State's aid, because the recipients of its bounty perchance belong to any one sect or to no sect; and I may also add that it is also unworthy of "tax payers," and all others, to incite the fury of the State against any sect or party on account of its religious faith. The history of the old world—the long and bloody feuds between Scotland and England, England and Ireland, between the Catholic and Protestant French—an incident of which was the massacre of St. Bartholomew—the wars between Spain and the Netherlands, Spain and the Ottoman Empire, all of which most painfully recall the time of Charles of Spain, Catharine de Medici, Queen Elizabeth, Alva, Philip, Pope Gregory II, Mary of Scotland, and, indeed, all history, ancient and modern, where governments are founded alone upon sectarian faith, are lessons for our own and all times. There is, I know, a party springing up in the land which reasons that the church is the corner stone of all civil governments, and, therefore, that the civil government is bound to recognize the church. We are even called atheistical because God is not recognized by name in the Federal and State constitutions. Such complainants forget that the church is of God and for the people and forms no part of the machinery of political government. The old world church history, from the reign of Constantine to the present time, the days of State tithes and all other State exactions of a religious or semi-religious character, show how uncongenial such a system would be in our own land. Ten thousand feuds and wars abroad warn us against all such alliances. But few except the ancient Jews, and they because they had one King in Heaven, and the so-called Fifth-monarchy men, ever held to the doctrine that even the saints were not subject to earthly government, and these precedents rather warn us against such folly, than attract us by any thing either safe or wise for our imitation. It is also said that the church or christianity, is more the protector and supporter of the government than the government is of it; but if it be so, this fact does not change the truth I have stated, nor the duty of complete separation. The federal Constitution, as the supreme law of the land, forbids the bans and should forbid them now and forever. The moral relations between the two are well set forth in the farewell address of Washington, when he reasons that "the teachings of the church are of immense benefit to civil government; that virtue is indispensable to a free, republican State, and that morality is sustained and rendered effective by the sanction of religion;" but it is nowhere added that the two should be combined in one, as in Rome, Russia, Turkey, or even in England. "Reason and experience," he adds, "both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles." But, sir, we may agree with the spirit of the petitioners, that it is not for the State to favor sects nor to sit in judgment upon religious tenets or opinions; yet the very complainants who remonstrate against sectarian charities, are themselves all of some sect and party, and the complaint, I think, is not so much that money is expended, as that, perhaps, those not of the sect of the signers get more than their share of this money. By and by I shall show that even the charges made have so little foundation in truth as to reflect rather upon the accusers than the accused. In the mean time let me address a few words to those who would refuse appropriations to men, women and children of the Roman Catholic faith. Those who know my antecedents will not accuse me of any undue partiality for the adherents of this church. I would give them no advantage over others, and I would do them no wrong by discriminations against them, and, least of all, in dispensing charity, would I inquire the religious faith of any who need assistance. All true charity, private and public, is eminently catholic and free from sectarianism. Not long ago it was determined in England: First, that no Roman Catholic should hold a seat in parliament; and secondly, that no Jew should be seated there; and it is to the credit of Thomas Arnold and other eminent English Protestants, that they fought and partially fought down this principle of exclusion. To the petitioners to this Convention who oppose appropriations for Roman Catholics, and to all concurring with them, I advance the argument then used, for sectarianism appears here as it did in England:

1. That it is the duty of every Englishman (American let me say) to support the just claims of the Roman Catholics of Ireland (the United States) even at the hazard of injuring the Protestant establishment, because these claims cannot be rejected without great injustice, and it is a want of faith in God and an unholy zeal to think that He can be served by injustice, or to guard against contingent evil by committing wrong.

2. That as the path of duty is the path of wisdom, so the granting of the Catholic claims, to which we are bound as a plain point of duty, will in all human probability greatly benefit the cause of Christianity.

Let us hope also that those who think it right to grant the federal money in almost unlimited sums, raised by a tax upon the whole people, even for three or four millions of emancipated slaves at the South, will not regard it as a great wrong to extend, under proper safeguards, some limited relief to the Celtic race whose lot is cast among ourselves.

It was, I know, once held by Lord Berley that the Catholics of Ireland were not the Irish, and that the Protestants were. Practically in law, through the power of an established church and by force of conquest, this was true, but in equity and justice it was never true, and we to-day behold the fruits of this old error in the civil commotion which reigns throughout Ireland and all over the now divided if not disunited Kingdom of Great Britain.

If, sir, this were the time and place, I might show how, step by step, Ireland has declined in population, thrift, and prosperity, and how the United States, in the material interests of the country, have been benefited by the change. Until one hundred years ago this very year a Roman Catholic was forbidden to purchase property in his own country. The reign of Henry VIII, Elizabeth, and on to 1768, the government was one of pure force, and not at all to be commended. History always is rightfully called philosophy, teaching by example, and let it teach us. But I pause, and will come directly to the subject of

SECTARIAN CHARITIES.

It is no doubt wise to be of those who are > "Slaves to no sect—who take no private road,

> But look through nature up to nature's God."

Yet, while discarding State and Church as combinations, we must remember that there can be no true charity where all religion is excluded—since a pure charity is the very essence of practical Christianity, though no necessary part of what in the State is called "a religious establishment." Each member of a family, and every family, are a part of the State, whether rich or poor. The petitioners to this body seem to regard Roman Catholics solely in the light of sectarians, and in this they err, just as the people in England erred, when, in the reign of King Charles, they declared that dissent from the Catholic Church was sectarianism. Men may be Roman Catholics, and something more. I lay it down as an axiom, sir, for which there is the highest authority, that to enforce human duties by divine obligations, is not sectarian.* There is nothing in English law, before or after the conquest, which excludes the Christian religion from the schools, or the policy of divine instruction in the diffusion of knowledge, and the opposite has generally been taught by men of the character of Payne and Volney. But, sir, some one, lawyer or logician, may ask, here, as did the lawyer who tempted Christ, "What is Christianity?" "What is the duty of the State?" or the more practical question, "Who is my neighbor?" and, happily, we have the answer at hand, from the lips of the Saviour himself. See Luke x: 30–37:

30. And Jesus answering said, A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, which stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead.

31. And by chance there came down a certain priest that way: and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side.

32. And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side.

33. But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was: and when he saw him, he had compassion on him,

34. And went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him.

35. And on the morrow when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him: and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee.

36. Which now of these three, thinkest thou was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves?

37. And he said, He that shewed mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, Go, and do thou likewise.

In connection with this subject, and I am reminded of it by the petitions before us, I commend the arguments before the United States supreme court, many years gone by, in the Stephen Girard will case, as then and there presented. The liberal giver, in providing for his great charity school, in Philadelphia, declared that:

"No ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister of any sect whatever shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatever in said college, nor shall any such person ever be admitted for any purpose, or as a visitor, within the premises appropriated for said college."

The civilized world perhaps gives no more marked evidence of bigotry and intolerance than this. It is the very quintessence of sectarianism, and as bigoted and selfish as prejudice could possibly make it: and yet it comes from one who, if alive, would no doubt be shocked to be regarded in this light. Himself the very chief of a sectarianism all his own, and yet alarmed least, at some time, some minister of God, of some denomination, no matter what, should cross the threshold of his secular temple of learning, perhaps to read the Lord's prayer, perhaps to read from the prophets or apostles of old, or it may be only the record I have read, of Christ's sermon on the mount, which is covered all over, as with a mantle, with the spirit of true charity! By the terms of the will, not one word of religious solace, comfort or instruction can ever enter there, for the guidance of the young. The minister of God is met at the very doors of these marble walls with the insulting thought, "No admittance to ministers of the Gospel." I admit, sir, again and again, that sectarianism cannot be, must not be, supported by the State, nor must it, sir, if presented in the form of a true charity, be disowned by the State. Charity, which St. Paul makes the chief good, is scattered all over the Bible. It beams and shines there like the sun by day and the moon and stars by night. It is the very essence of the Christian religion, and, therefore, in a civilized country cannot be excluded in precept or practice, from any public or private institution. Again, sir. If you strike at one mode of religious worship, you strike at all. Your blows fall everywhere, and prostrate all whom they may reach. You must not suppose that asylums in New York, Westchester, Rochester or Buffalo, can be assailed upon the score of sectarianism, or Romanism, if you please, and protestant institutions like the two State houses of refuge, the institutions for the deaf and dumb, the blind, the children's aid societies, Five Points mission, hospitals for those of mature years and infant dependence, escape unscathed. All are so far protestant as to have protestant officers, protestant boards of trustees and directors, and a general protestant management and superintendence. This is true, sir, of all our main institutions, either criminal or for the maintenance of the poor. I have no fault to find with any of them, but be careful where you strike, or like Sampson, you may bring the whole temple at your feet, and destroy all in your zeal to prostrate those you dislike. The federal and State Constitutions know nothing of what abroad is called an established religion, and yet the great many in the State and federal governments are pre-eminently protestant, happily not of any one prevailing sect, but sufficiently united to prevent all innovations upon the rights of conscience and of private judgment. I recall here, sir, the words of Benjamin Franklin in the first revolutionary Congress, where for some weeks all business was suspended by the zeal and heat of party men, and where, too, all was finally hushed into a peaceful calm by the successful motion of the statesman and philosopher in his declaration, uttered in words of deep impressiveness, and as timely as they were simple and touching. "I have lived, sir," said he to the presiding officer and assembly, "a long time, and the longer I live, the more convincing proofs I see of this truth, that God governs in the affairs of men," and his motion that henceforth "prayers imploring the assistance of Heaven and its blessings upon our deliberations, be held in this assembly every morning before we proceed to business," met with a unanimous assent. From that hour the public business proceeded as smoothly as the unrippled tide and with the calm and peace of an untroubled spirit. Samuel Adams, a so-called "independent" of that day, with his white hairs streaming over his shoulders, the very personification of patriotic fervor, seconded Franklin's motion, as upon another occasion of hardly less interest, in the Continental Congress, old John Adams, also of Massachusetts, nominated George Washington of Virginia to be the commander-in-chief of the armies of the nation. Oh, sir, for one hour of those days of blessed memory in our present political life. Now, sir, if all this seems foreign to any of the objects of this Convention, let me answer that we are forming the fundamental law of the greatest State of the Union, and that what we do here may not only become our law, but, as in the past, a law also for other American States. The State, federal and in the form of commonwealths, let me also say, has no superior power. It is indeed, the very essence of all earthly power. It is a principle laid down by Aristotle, and it is as enduring as time, that the object of the State is the happiness of society, happiness consisting both in physical and moral good, and more in the latter than in the former. Warburton, the moralist, wedded as he was to the expediency of an established religion, also held to the doctrine that the sole object of political power is the conservation of body and of goods. To say that the State has nothing to do with religion, makes it atheistical, and that education and charity form no part of its duties, makes it barbarian. To declare also that all State duties look only to the protection of individual property, or what are called the rights of society, makes it but little more than material. The State takes life, limb, time as well as property and money, to maintain its power and supremacy. It makes war, fires towns and ships, incarcerates in dungeons, abridges liberty, and punishes whom the law declares worthy of punishment, and often without discrimination of right. Can it do all this and do nothing to minister to the souls and bodies of those who are diseased, infirm, naked and hungry? Is a sermon like that of Christ from the mountain, beginning with so many blessings upon the poor in spirit, the meek, the pure in heart, the merciful, with so many wise reasons for a good life, the very essence of which is "give to him that asketh thee;" which also says the poor are always with us, which dwells alike upon the manner and virtue of alms giving, which admonishes us that our Father in Heaven feeds the fowls of the air and clothes the lilies and grass of the field, and will, therefore, much sooner feed and clothe the creatures of His hand, meant only for the pulpit and the fireside? If so, to what end do our daily labors begin with prayer here and elsewhere? To what end have men always made provision for the poor by the invocation of prayers? I have not so learned the duties of a State. I see more reason in the words I have read, and in those of the eminent teacher of the New Testament, who said: "Though I speak with the tongue of men and of angels and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." If, too, a poor slave like Terence could give utterance to this generous sentiment: "Homo sum, nil humani alienum puto" —the State cannot wholly ignore the claims of any who are under its government. Some there are, I know, who for State or private reasons, would turn away all applicants asking State assistance. They see no power — or, if power, no substantial good—in grants made by the Legislature or authorized by a Constitutional Convention. Those needing alms they would turn over to the cold charities of the world. Over all legislative deliberations and over the State treasury they would place—as over the gates of Paradise after the fall of our first parents — that flaming sword, guarded by the Cherubim, which turned every way to keep the tree of life. Sir, I would create no such obstruction. In that line we have gone far enough—too far in my judgment — in the restrictions already placed in the financial article. I would rather, under the restrictions and regulations before you from the Committee on Charitable Institutions—"Open wide the gates, not with harsh and grating sound, but on golden hinges turning"—so that all who really require the State's assistance shall receive it, and in some manner best suited to their own necessities and the means of the State; always remembering the truth of all of God's poor, and especially of his poor children, how true it is that—

> The child whom many father's share,
> Has seldom known a father's care."

The federal government, sir, has given to Greece, to Ireland, and to the States at large, frequent appropriations of money. The nucleus of our school fund is a federal grant. This State also gave to Kansas, in the day of trouble, by a direct appropriation of money. What we waste yearly is more than equal to all the demands upon the treasury for ordinary charities. What is expended upon State printing alone is much greater than what is asked for all your hospitals, asylums and orphan homes. One-sixteenth of a mill upon a very low valuation of property is the average expended for the last twenty years upon this class of charities, and a tax of one-fourth of a mill would pay for every publicly supported and State aided charity in the Commonwealth, and for all special grants for education. But, Mr. Chairman, let me analyze the objections as they have appeared, or as they may appear in the course of this discussion. And first, of the nice distinction between charity in a State, or legal sense, and in the sense in which it is a private benevolence. It is said that it is not right to tax the people for charity; but this depends upon contingencies. If the charity is of a public nature the tax paid for it is right. If partly public and partly private, the tax is right to the extent of the aid for public purposes.

2. The duty of the State is the protection of the people, and to develop through wholesome laws whatever may contribute to that end—of course, with proper restrictions.

3. Religious institutions, though charitable in one sense, are something apart from State or from private charities. They are neither to be supported nor opposed per se in the organic law, because, as already said, the spirit of the Constitution forbids the union of Church and State. Congress, in its early history, imported twenty thousand copies of the Bible from Scotland and Holland to supply deficiencies in the Word of God, but this would not be tolerated, nor is it necessary, as we send Bibles all over the world.

4. Though charity begins at home, there is no reason why it should not travel abroad—at least from the Capitol here to all the people in the State.

5. There is a maxim, applying as well to the State as to the people, which says, "He gives most who gives in proportion to his circumstances, rather than he who gives absolutely the most." The State is to discriminate and see that it gets value for value, and this is just what your committee propose in its recommendations.

6. Men, in following the vices which lead to prison and to death, first endure, then pity, then embrace, and as the State has finally to pay the cost of all this, so in the opposite direction men may be kept from the embrace of crime by those remedial blessings found in institutions for education, for reform and in hospitals for the sick. In two years, 1865, '66, 23,681 persons were convicted in the New York courts of special sessions alone. Shall we move on in the same rut, increasing in crime as we increase in years? or shall we try to diminish the causes of offense, and thereby the number of offenses? If not, then indeed was the poet right when he said—

> "They who know the most must mourn the deepest,
> The tree of knowledge is not the tree of life."

And Solomon, too, when he declared that "he that increases in knowledge increaseth in sorrow."

7. But it may be said, in justice to other claims, that States cannot be governed by laws of benevolence. It has been said by my friend from Rockland [Mr. Conger], that money raised for government must be expended for government. Granted. What, then, is government? Is it the Capitol we have left? the State Hall near by? Is it our dead or living statutes? Is it alone 3,000 miles of railroad and 1,000 miles of canals—the $100,000,000 received for canal tolls—the $92,000,000 of legal interest upon the canals? Or is it our system of inland commerce, or our foreign commerce, as connected with boards of emigration—or, to pass to higher themes, is it alone systems of law and jurisprudence, subjects of taxation, legislative enactments, or the execution of the laws? All these, sir, are but parts of the State, and not its best parts, either. The supreme law is the Constitution, the supreme source of political power is the people of the State, and the greatest good is whatever contributes most to the general welfare.

"We, the people of the United States," is the beginning of the federal Constitution. "We, the people of the State of New York," is the beginning of the State Constitution. The people, then, are the government, and the power they authorize through the organic law is not only theirs, but they are the best judges of what is right. All governments, from the foundation of the world, have recognized the duty of the State to the poor. Charity, in deeds, and in noble sentiments put in practice, is a part, if not the best part, of a well-constituted commonwealth, and of a free and intelligent people. Some States, as we know, go so far as to have a State religion of their own, as in Great Britain, where the Church establishment makes, most unjustly, sectarians of all who, as in Scotland, belong to the Presbyterian faith, and in Ireland to the Roman Catholic Church. So the Turks adhere to their system of Moslem worship, Russia and Greece to the Greek Church, Northern Germany and other States to the Lutheran Church. The United States government is, happily, free from all these alliances, but they are not free from obligations imposed by justice, morality, society, suffering, and, in a sentence, the requirements of the people. Let us now, in brief, consider

WHAT CAUSES POVERTY.

1. Often it is ourselves, but almost as frequently it is the State. The federal government, by wars, which, as at present, inflate and expand the currency, demoralize the people, and which in the end leave men like a ship which has passed through a hurricane at sea, torn, wrecked, and greatly disabled.

2. By laws through which often the rich are made richer, and the poor poorer, through monopolies, tariffs, partial legislation, as in exemptions of class property from taxes, by driving small tradesmen out of the market. As "much will make more," so the little is apt to become less.

3. In the depreciation of labor by the protection of certain arts, inventions, machinery, favoring large capital, and throwing thousands out of employ.

4. Sometimes, even by a system of charity which compels those who have, to support those who have nothing. A rich man may be taxed even unto poverty.

5. In England the rich and poor are often a distinct class in language. The one class are taught of books and of the schools, while the other almost speak the Saxon tongue of their ancestors. We must be careful here to prevent all such distinctions. Let us now look to

THE REFORMS NEEDED.

1. There must be a better character of superintendents in our public and private institutions. The recent exposures at Rochester, in this State, in Paterson, N. J., and in the State of Illinois, in the treatment of the insane, call for a wise system of reform. There must be fewer employed for mere hire, and more from good will.

2. The cities should be cleared of bad boys, if possible. Of this number, 35,000 are reported in New York city alone. They do not like the country, and they do not like any system of farm labor, or any coercive occupation which takes them from the city.

3. Some place, too, is needed between the house of refuge and the penitentiary, for those between, say seventeen and twenty-one years of age, and these should be taught trades, or sent to an institution like that of the Methay Agricultural School in France, where of 856 inmates, 223 joined the army, and where large numbers take to the sea, and finally to mechanical trades. If the pursuits common to country life are not liked, let the inmates be compelled to do something toward self-maintenance. If there are no moral reasons for pressing these subjects upon the Convention, ample cause for doing so is found in the economy of what is proposed.

OUR COMMON SCHOOLS

cost a tax of one mill and a quarter, and the Legislature increased this tax last year about half a million of dollars, though the people were paying two millions per annum before. In New York city alone, $2,900,000 is raised this year for school purposes. These are noble institutions, where all are received from the age of five to the age of twenty-one years. They provide instruction for between nine hundred thousand and one million of children annually, besides some 26,400 taught in our academies, and nearly 1,000 in our colleges. The rate bill in twenty years has produced $20,627,426, while the school property in the State is valued at $12,254,957, the cities owning $6,720,535, and the counties $5,534,422. Nobody proposes to destroy this system, though many believe the tax might be more equitably levied than it is.

OUR STATE PRISONS

have cost the people in twenty years $5,340,372, and the following excess above receipts:

At Auburn,	$294,229 86
At Sing Sing,	1,192,964 55
At Clinton,	727,955 03
A total at the three prisons of,	$2,215,099 43
And adding salaries, traveling expenses, etc., a total cost to the people in these prisons for twenty years, beyond all receipts,	$2,733,112 54

Each convict at Sing Sing, for twenty years, cost annually $1,000; at Auburn, same time, $690; at Clinton, same time, $296; average number in all the prisons for 20 years, 1,926; total average cost of each prisoner at the three prisons, above earnings, for 20 years, $1,376.19. The wretched mismanagement of these institutions is proved from the fact that at the penitentiary in this city, where the sentences are short (from three months to ten days) and where criminals are employed at a disadvantage, they earn in excess of their support $20.08 each. I have read with great interest, the report of the Committee on Prisons on this subject, and commend its statements of fact to the members of the Convention, as it shows where enough may be saved annually to support nearly every hospital, asylum and academy in the State. It is to the credit of the prison association that in twenty years it has aided morally and mentally no less than 130,000 persons, and in doing so, it has no doubt saved large sums to the Commonwealth. Let me now briefly give some conclusions drawn from the reports of others before us.

IMMIGRANTS FROM ABROAD.

In twenty years the returns show the following results:

Arrived,	3,833,574
Cared for,	1,027,953
Relieved by counties,	121,159 for which the counties received $1,000,000, from head money imposed upon the immigrants, which is in no sense a State tax. These people have paid into the commissioners' fund, in twenty years, some $5,373,861, and foreigners, as they are, let us remember this when disposed to complain of the cost to which sometimes as a class they put the State.

Expense in temporary relief,	765,640
Number of persons aided,	265,168
County paupers aided,	242,542
Number of persons temporarily relieved,	220,294
Of 33,963 received, there was Dec. 31, 1865,	14,321
The average weekly expense of each pauper,	1.12½
Amount received from pauper labor,	34,055

BIRTHPLACES OF THE POOR.

United States,	94,967
Ireland,	132,970
Germany,	25,331
England,	5,360

Besides those from Scotland, France, Canada, and elsewhere.

The native females over males were,	46,160
Irish females over males,	21,518
Of the children under sixteen years, the total number in the poor-houses was,	26,251

CAUSES OF PAUPERISM.

Under this head, we have a total in persons of 296,896, with an excess of 8,346 males. The more direct cause is intemperance, and of these there are reported:

Males,	15,586
Females,	9,723

besides 7,995 children of intemperate parents, and 1,469 wives of intemperate husbands, and the very natural sequence of 1,183 cases of debauchery.

There is also before me another and natural record from the above of 510 illegitimate children, and 428 parents born out of wedlock. Old age, children with poor parents, orphans, etc., also furnish their sad record in the general distress of poverty and crime; the whole footing up:

Males,	56,460
Females,	103,947

There are other institutions already named which deserve more than a passing notice. In the New York hospital more than sixty-two and a half per cent are seamen, and in no just sense, therefore, can such an institution be regarded as a local charity. In the foundling hospital, a large majority of the unfortunate mothers went from the country to the city of New York. In the nursery and child's hospital, an institution akin to this, and almost a part of it, most of the mothers are foreign born, but not a few come from other States, and the interior counties of this State. For a dozen years and more, sir, my warmest sympathies have been enlisted in this institution, perhaps from the agency I had in securing $10,000 from the State for its first edifice, perhaps, as one naturally feels a deep interest in those he serves, and I hope mainly from this consideration, that no doors were then open to receive the infant young, and perhaps, also, from the fact that these helpless little ones were, and are, the victims of one of the greatest sins known to the civilized world. I shall ask no apology for pausing to present the claims of such an institution upon the Convention and the people. In the State, before the foundation of this charity, infant children, confined in institutions supported by local governments, disappeared almost as rapidly as the snow beneath the rain. The mortality of infants has been frightful, the crime of child murder appalling and the effect upon society alarming.

THE NURSERY AND CHILD'S HOSPITAL had its origin in a state of facts deeply interesting in themselves, but mainly in the circumstance that the destitute mother of, if possible, its still more destitute offspring, was obliged to give the nutriment of its own bosom to the child of a rich woman, while its own little one was almost starved, literally clothed in filth and rags, and consigned to one of the most wretched tenement houses in the city, and cared for by still more wretched inmates, at a cost of a few shillings a week. Imagine, sir, the child of this poor woman literally buried in a bundle of rags, under a miserable bed, on which one child lay dead of small-pox, with its mother beside it, all as poor as poverty could make the scene, and the absent mother living in elegance and luxury, and surrounded by every blessing that wealth, art and taste could bestow. You will cry out 'Oh, most unnatural parent, thus to desert its own flesh and blood!" And the spirit of a still greater indignation, perhaps, will rise within you when I add that the mother, who has thus parted with her own little one, had come under a compact not to see her own child while feeding the babe who was now dandled in all the comforts which abundance could give. But pause for a moment, let me beg you, in your condemnation. To be dependent upon charity is to be miserable, while the rich are a law unto themselves. The poor must live and often have no choice of living, and to the honor of the mother I have named, tears fell like rain from her eyes as she contemplated this contrast and the wide and deep gulf between the child she nursed and the child she brought into the world. It was this incident, sir, seen by one good woman and told to another in fashionable life, but full of all the instincts of the truest womanhood that led first, and mainly by her intelligent, earnest zeal and labor, to the establishment of a Nursery Hospital, and secondly to the Foundling Hospital, now in early but successful organization in the city of New York. I told you the other day of the origin of the Idiotic Asylum in this State, and also of its wonderful success in giving intellect to the enfeebled mind, strength to the feeble knees, comeliness and beauty to human forms which were once most horrible to behold. Such an institution redeems misfortune of half its terrors, the human heart of half its sorrows, and shows in how many ways God tempers the wind to His shorn lambs. So of the institution for the education of the deaf and dumb. When I first heard of it, practically, it was through one of the most impressive lessons ever taught by the young, not excepting the little children which the Saviour of the world took in His own arms and blessed. The common question put by a visitor to a child standing at the black-board was this: "My child, who made you?" No common answer came to this common question, but one written in a fair, full, confident handwriting upon the black-board, and here it is: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." Then came the second question: "What do you know of the Saviour of the world?" The child paused a second, and then, its countenance full of light, wrote out these impressive words: "It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners." The astonished visitor looked in wonder upon this mature teacher, though of youthful years, and then ventured upon the most trying question of all: "Why were you born deaf and dumb, while God has blessed me with hearing and with speech?" The child's countenance, for a second of time, but no more, seemed saddened by the question, and then the little hands wrote out these words, worthy to be inscribed in letters of light upon every sorrowing mind and heart in the world: "Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight." How true it is of these people, whose intellectual capabilities are almost unsurpassed, and who owe so much to God and the State, that they have neither language nor speech, but their voice is heard! Two thousand deaf and dumb children have been educated at this institution since 1817, and teachers and pupils are found to-day on the shores of the Pacific, and in about every State of the Union. One more illustration, and this of the beginning of one of our State institutions, and I will relieve your patience of so many details.

THE NEW YORK HOUSE OF REFUGE

had its origin in the defense of a fine-looking boy, of respectable parents and some fourteen years old. He was put upon trial before the mayor for stealing a bird, and the counsel for the boy, Mr. Girard, in his history of the case, says:

"I took every legal ground in the defense that my ingenuity could devise, that a bird was an animal ferœ naturæ, and could not be considered in law as property, and consequently could not be the subject of larceny, though taken from a cage. My legal grounds were overruled by the mayor, who told me I might go to the jury, to see if they could find any good reason why the punishment of the law awarded to theft should not be visited upon the young offender. I then urged upon the jury that, if they convicted this youth for this, his first offense, and sent him to prison, his ruin for life would be the inevitable consequence; that as there was little or no separation in our prisons, of the young from the old offenders, imprisonment, by a thoughtless act of depredation upon property, would expose him to the corrupting intercourse of old and hardened offenders, and, at the termination of his imprisonment, he would graduate from our prison an adept at crime. The force of this plea prevailed, and the jury, having a loophole through which their consciences might creep, found him not guilty. Mark the sequel. This boy had been badly brought up; no good seed had been planted in his breast, and no good examples at home had been held out to him to follow. He was bad in grain; and but a few years ago I read in the public journals that he had died in prison—a felon, confined for stealing in mature life, and that while in prison a fortune of $80,000 had been left to him."

It was the belief of counsel that a house of refuge, with proper moral and religious education, would have eradicated this vice and worked a complete reform; and the incident I have named led to the establishment of the New York House of Refuge. It has cost the State, it is true, nearly $650,000 in twenty years, but it has saved ten times this expense, first, by keeping hundreds of boys from the penitentiary; and, secondly, by making them good citizens. Let me add, just here, and upon the evidence of a full and free discussion in England and in this country, that it is now generally admitted that one dollar is more effectually bestowed in preventing pauperism than ten in relieving it; and, to quote one of the reports before me, "that the public energies, and funds had much better be directed to the saving individuals from mendicity, than in building edifices and raising funds to support them as paupers." It is also true, that no taxes are more cheerfully paid than those which prevent crime, and that this class of charities result in the double advantage of securing a moral and material good in the community. I attribute not a little of the increased vice of the day to the absence of means of preventing it. You have seen what the three State prisons cost, but of the four score jails in the State, some of them in their inmates and by their mismanagement a disgrace to civilization, the same story of waste and excess may be told. Carlyle tells of a poor man in London, who could get no one to recognize his claims till he had taken fever, spread the infection, died, killed a dozen of his well-to-do neighbors, and at last in this way managed to establish the fact of his humanity. It is the same with children. They will make it abundantly evident, in time, in one way or another, that society cannot afford to neglect them—and it is a costly way of doing this to employ policemen, prisons, judges, and very possibly the hangman at last. These poor pinched-faced little dependents, tumbling in the gutter, swearing, thieving, mischief making, cannot be ignored, and must not be despised. Children, sir, now go to ruin by thousands because there are no parents to care for them, and as they are fatherless the State must to some extent act the part of a parent. We may pass by on the other side and put it off upon the priest, upon the Levite, and upon the neighbor, but the work must be done by some one, and the important question is —"who shall do it?" Let it be done by the counties, says the honorable gentleman from Cayuga [Mr. Rathbun]. Let it be done by the towns, responds my friend from Montgomery [Mr. Baker]. Let it be done by all, is my answer, and by the State, in a manner regulated by law, so that none shall escape punishment who deserve punishment, nor any fail of mercy who deserve to be relieved. Let no one ask for bread only to receive a stone, for a fish to secure a serpent, for an egg to be offered a scorpion. It was by no such rebuff that the hungry were fed by the Giver of every good and perfect gift. The mercy of the father who forgave his prodigal son, who fell upon his neck, kissed him and wept, excited the anger and jealousy of the more deserving brother; but in our charities, for the evil they save, and the good they do, as with this forgiving father, it is enough for us to know that he who was lost is found, and he who was dead is alive again.

I wish, sir, it was in my power to picture that vision of the lazar house recorded by the immortal Milton, in the interview of Adam with the Archangel Michael:

* * * Wherein were laid
Numbers of all diseased; all maladies;
Convulsions, epilepsies, fierce catarrhs
And moonstruck madness, pining atrophy,
Marasmus and wide wasting pestilence.
Sights so deformed, what heart of rock could long
Dry-eyed behold; Adam could not, but wept,
Though not of woman born: compassion quelled
His best of man, and gave him up to tears,
A space, till firmer thoughts restrained excess.

Again, as we know, to some considerable extent, those of mature years are cared for, while the young are sacrificed by thousands. The report of your Committee on Charities shows how, even in New England, life is destroyed. Sir, there is no longer any danger of the fears of Malthus, that population will be increased faster than food can be provided for them. The Social Science Association in Boston, after carefully investigating the records in some towns in Massachusetts for two hundred years and over, whose history included from six to eight generations, found that families comprising the first three generations had an average of eight to ten children each; those of the second three between seven and eight; the fifth five, and the sixth less than three to each family. In the olden time the majority of married women had ten or twelve; now nearly ten per cent have absolutely no children there, and more than thirty per cent but one or two; while the average to each family is about three and a half! To be a prosperous state the birthrate should be one to every thirty of the population. Massachusetts formerly came up to this standard; from 1860 to 1865, of the native American population it was less than one to sixty. But in Old England, dogmatic and boastful as she is, it is the same, for their judicial statistics prove that the number of deceased infant children upon whom inquests were held in one year was 6,872. Of these, 5,523 were legitimate, and 1,349 were illegitimate, which would seem to disprove the assertion that illegitimate children are the usual subjects of infanticide. To this crying sin of child murder, I feel called upon to draw your attention. It is not new among us, but has grown with fearful rapidity. The comments of Addison upon it read like a lesson of to-day, though the punishment is mild now compared with what it was then, though now not one offender in a thousand is discovered. Says the Spectator:

"One does not know how to speak on such a subject without horror, but what multitudes of infants have been made away with by those who brought them into the world, and were afterward ashamed or unable to provide for them! There is scarcely an assizes where some unhappy wretch is not executed for the murder of a child. And how many more of these monsters of inhumanity may we suppose to be wholly undiscovered or cleared for want of legal evidence, not to mention those who by unnatural practices do in some measure defeat the intentions of Providence. * * It robs the commonwealth of its full number of citizens, and certainly deserves the utmost application and wisdom of a people to prevent it."

And Addison then points out the hospitals at Paris, Madrid, Lisbon and Rome for prevention, and he closes his one hundred and fifth paper by saying:

"This, I think, is a subject that deserves our most serious consideration, for which reason I hope I shall not be thought impertinent in laying it before my readers."

The waste of young life is also every way and everywhere alarming. In Great Britain, of 1,730,076 born in one year, 373,053 died. In New York, four-fifths of the mortality is of those under two years. In a series of years in the city of New York, of 552,539 deaths, 178,307 were under two years, and 222,618 under five years. In the ten years, from 1845 to 1856, of 228,355 who died, 110,887 were under five years, and until recently this ratio was upon the increase. And yet some of us daily thank God for our creation and preservation, as well as all the blessings of this life. The little waifs rest upon their mother earth like snow-flakes now falling around us, and disappear as soon, or they pass away as the morning mist before the breath of day.

"My heart leaps up when I behold
A rainbow in the sky;
So was it when my life began,
So is it now I am a man;
So let it be when I grow old,
Or let me die—
The child is father of the man."

The subject of infanticide brings me to the question of

FOUNDLING HOSPITALS,

as one of the proper remedies for the prevention of the evil. Since we have been in session I have regretted to hear these institutions assailed, and I deem it a duty to show, very briefly, the good and the evil they do. King Herod's order to go forth and slay the infants of Judea, like King Ptolemy's decree to destroy the children of the Jews is one of the marvels of history and revelation. So is the decree of the Tarquins to save only the male children and the eldest daughter. The old Roman law went so far as to say that children could be put to death at pleasure So also, the Spartan law to destroy weakly and deformed infants—a law even approved by Aristotle and Plato, and defended under the practice of Justinian. The Chinese destroy their offspring without remorse and by tens of thousands. The Greenlander and the Esquimaux pay no regard to infant life, while the Mangua Bushman, when the mother dies, whose infant cannot find its natural nourishment, is burned with the mother. We do nothing, of course, like this in the United States, but how much better is a system which so orders, governs, or permits, as to take off by death 85 per cent of infant life, even when professedly cared for, and which beholds with almost indifference the destruction of thousands by literal sacrifice. In considering the subject of foundling hospitals, we must distinguish between those which are established in different countries. They are common to all Europe. The treasury of the Church in Rome supports 3,000 inmates yearly; Naples not less than 2,000, Madrid 4,000, Lisbon 3,000, and Moscow and St. Petersburg each about 25,000. In France, where there were 40,000 foundlings in 1784, there are now over 300,000. There, under the Code Napoleon, each arrondissement now maintains a separate hospital, instead of crowding the children all upon Paris, as was the case before 1811. But, sir, it is said foundling hospitals are nurseries for crime, and that the great majority in them are born out of wedlock. This is true of half the children of Sweden and of a portion of all Northern and Central Europe, but it is no argument against the existence of these institutions, unless we mean that children, because they are illegitimate, shall bear the double curse of a false parentage, and if possible the greater misfortune of being set adrift as upon a stormy sea without chart, compass or pilot to guide them. I shall not disguise the fact that in Italy illegitimate births have increased 100 per cent, and that the same is almost relatively true of Russia, Sweden and Germany. But, sir, against these truths let me also state the fact that there are no foundling hospitals in Scotland, and that their absence does not prevent an illicit life, but rather impels to further crimes, many infants there being either strangled, thrown into the river, or very commonly left at the doors of the church. Per contra, these institutions have existed in Dublin for more than a century, and yet seductions and criminal offenses are there branded as flagitious offenses. It is, as has been said, rather their absence than their presence, that has led to the commission of more serious crimes, such as intentional abortion, child murder, and all the evils—frequently death itself resulting to the woman who has no asylum in which to hide her shame and amend her life. But again, in Guthrie's Standard Geographical Work, it is stated that the Scottish women are most prone to infanticide. In France the famous turning table used for so many years is now falling into disuse. The frequent promises to shield from punishment, inculcates contempt for the most sacred law. France in this respect, encourages vice in the name of misfortune. There is another and better method which seeks light, in order to bestow the benefits of the State more wisely. In the nursery and child's hospital, the mother's sorrow is only told to one female in authority. The erring woman is surrounded by good influences, and encouraged instead of being shut out from all virtuous associations, and is in every way aided in obtaining the means of decent support. "Many women," says Fielding, in the character of Allworthy, "have become abandoned, and have sunk to the last degrees of vice, by being unable to retrieve the first slip"—a lesson eminently worthy of remembrance, study, and practice. The assertion that the foundling hospitals have only a tendency to promote licentiousness is but assertion, and one fact is worth a thousand theories. The evidence of the treasurer of the London institution is very conclusive on this subject. The history of one hundred and three girls, after leaving the hospital, is given very specifically. Of this number seventy-seven received, at the expiration of their apprenticeship in decent families, gratuities, varying from two to five guineas, for good conduct, such gratuities being awarded only on certificates of the employer. Four died, three became invalids or insane, seven forfeited the gratuity for obstinacy, without vice, three committed offenses, but afterward reformed, four never came for the gratuity, and of the whole number, one hundred and three, only three turned out bad characters. Two were taken out by their mothers, whose history is unknown. At the nursery, four have remained a year nursing their own infants, and obtained a certificate of excellent behavior, while more than eighty were placed in situations where they gave entire satisfaction. Several have been married and are leading virtuous lives. Comment on such facts but weakens their force, since no reformatory schools produce a more hopeful result. The evils of emigrant ships are often brought to our notice, and there also many hitherto virtuous girls have been ruined by violent and shameful intrigue and assault. It was not until the time of Vincent de Paul, in the 17th century, that the civil existence of foundlings was acknowledged, although foundling hospitals have been known since 1070. Louis XIV regarded their establishment as a Christian duty, because of the feebleness and misfortune of their inmates and because they might be useful in the country's service. The brilliant yet gentle Marie Antoinette took the deepest interest both in the mothers and their children, and founded, I believe, the first lying-in asylum in the old world, certainly the first one in France. The good they have done—and, sir, there is in this life hardly any good unmixed with evil—is almost beyond calculation. They have had both the support of the State and the labors and prayers of those sisters of mercy whose mission it is to visit the sick, to plunge into the infection of hospitals, to redeem vice of half its horrors and sorrow of half its grief, by giving to virtue its most dignified excellence and grace. One other subject is treated in the report of the Committee on Charities which I shall leave to the lawyers of the Convention and committee. It is that which relates to charitable gifts, devises and bequests. It proposes to make what is now inconstant and uncertain in the law permanent, and to remove, under proper limitations for the protection of families, all hinderances to the bestowment of individual wealth upon institutions of benevolence and learning; and this is the more necessary, since, if the recommendations herewith submitted are adopted, the State cannot hereafter make charitable donations except for purposes absolutely in the public interest and declared to be so by a board of State commissioners, and then only upon examination and evidence that what is asked for is really meritorious. Having thus, sir, discussed the question before us in all its relations to the State and the people, I now leave it to the Convention. You have it before you under the lights afforded by history, experience at home and abroad, by statistical facts, constitutional power, and public duty, and the wish neareast my heart to-day is, that I am not pleading in vain for a principle which even the least enlightened nations have esteemed it a privilege to maintain, and which no people, honoring God, serving the State, or respecting the misfortunes of their fellow men, can rightfully deny.

Mr. CURTIS—I wish to offer the following amendment to the first section:

The SECRETARY read the amendment as follows:

In section 1, line 3, after the word "shall," insert "not be members of one denomination, and five of whom shall—" so that it will read "the Legislature shall establish a board of commissioners of charities, consisting of eight persons, a majority of whom shall not be members of one religious denomination, and five of whom shall constitute a quorum, etc."

Mr. CURTIS—Of course, Mr. Chairman, should the recommendation suggested in my amendment prevail in the committee, I shall also propose a change in the second paragraph in the third section, which states that this proposed board "shall examine the circumstances of the case, and report the institutions claiming such aid as tends to relieve the State from expense with the amount of such relief, and that it is not religious or sectarian in its character, and that a majority of its managers are not members of one religious denomination." I presume it was the intention of the committee, since the Convention had already decided it would give aid only to institutions for education and charitable purposes, to avoid any possibility of connection between the State and the Church. In other words, they desire, as absolutely as possible, to do away with the influence of sectarian feeling in the management of State charities. I have listened with interest to the discourse which was pronounced by the chairman of the Committee on Charities [Mr. E. Brooks]. I think there is no question but that it is for the interest of the State to retain the power of charitable assistance in various directions, and that it is indispensable that that power of assistance should be supervised by a board having all the solemnity of the State behind it. But, sir, the committee will see that as the section now stands in the article reported, the eight persons who are to constitute this board may be of one religious denomination. There is no reason, so far as it appears in this section, why they should not be all Methodists, all Episcopalians, all Presbyterians or all Romanists. If such should, by any possibility, be the constitution of the State board, then, sir, the safeguard which is provided in the second paragraph in the third section, that no institution claiming to be religious shall have the majority of the members of one religious denomination, would unquestionably fail. Such a board would find ways enough to escape the limitation. If, however, we establish at the outset that this board shall be free from any sectarian bias, knowing that there are many charitable institutions which are of the greatest service although they are under sectarian management, it will be for the board so constituted in recommending State assistance, to report that such institutions although sectarian in management are not sectarian in purpose and tendency. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, from the great number of petitions which have been presented to the Convention upon this subject, that there is unquestionably, in the State of New York, which is essentially a Protestant State, an apprehension that the State aid has been given too much in one direction. Various statistics have been given to us to show that most of the local aid has been granted to institutions which are managed by the Roman Catholics. But, unquestionably, sir, if the State, as we have determined, is to aid charities, it cannot avoid, at least proportionately, helping those institutions which are under the care of the Roman Church. It is impossible not to recognize the fact, that the charitable foundations of the Roman Church are the most comprehensive, the most vigorous and the most efficient known in history. It is still further true, as the chairman of the committee has told us, that the great majority of those who must be relieved by State charities in certain sections of the State, are members of that church, and will naturally fall to the care of that church. I cannot stop to speak of the various forms of the charity of that church, but it is to one of its saints that civilization owes the institution of the sisters of charity, whose benign service is known even in the hospitals of other denominations, and any system which this State should adopt which should strike at the very root of such institutions would necessarily bring the State to this question, "Are you willing to do, absolutely and to the utmost, what is now done by the institutions already in existence?" I do not believe, sir, that the State is willing to do it. I believe that the experience of this State to be that of Massachusetts. Massachusetts, in the year 1863, established a board of charity. In the very first report which that board made, after looking over the whole ground, they announced that in their judgment the true policy of the State was to give assistance to the private foundations, of whatever sect, that already existed, rather than to establish new public institutions. All that we want is to subordinate all institutions which are managed by the various sects to the great purposes of charity, and to have a board so constituted that such institutions shall receive proper assistance.
